CONTENTS OF VOL. 11.

BOOK XVI.

THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

SECT. I. Troubles which followed the death of Alexander. The partition of the provinces among the generals. Aridæus elected king. Perdiccas appointed his guardian, and regent of the empire, 11.

SECT. II. The revolt of the Greeks in Upper Asia. The impressions occasioned by the news of Alexander's death at Athens. The expedition of Antipater into Greece. He is first defeated, and afterwards victorious. Makes himself master of Athens, and leaves a garrison there. The flight and death of Demosthenes, 13.

SECT. III. Procession at the funeral of Alexander. His body is conveyed to Alexandria. Eumenes is put into possession of Cappadocia by Perdiccas. Ptolemy, Craterus, Antipater, and Antigonus, form a confederacy against each of them. The death of Craterus. The unfortunate expedition of Perdiccas into Egypt. He is slain there, 17.

SECT. IV. The regency is transferred to Antipater. Eumenes besieged by Antigonus in Nora. Jerusalem besieged and taken by Ptolemy. Demades put to death by Cassander. Antipater on his death-bed nominates Polyperchon for his successor in the regency. The latter recalls Olympias. Antigonus becomes very powerful, 20.

SECT. V. The Athenians condemn Phocion to die. Cassander makes himself master of Athens, where he establishes Demetrius Phalerius in the government of that republic. His prudent administration. Eumenes quits Nora. Various expeditions of Antigonus, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and other generals against him. Olympias causes Aridæus to be slain, and is murdered in her turn by the orders of Cassander. The war between him and Polyperchon. The re-establishment of Thebes. Eumenes is betrayed by his own troops, delivered up to Antigonus, and put to death, 22.

SECT. VI. Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, form a confederacy against Antigonus. He deprives Ptolemy of Syria and Phœnicia, and makes himself master of Tyre, after a long siege. Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, begins to distinguish himself in Asia Minor. He loses a first battle and gains a second. Seleucus takes Babylon. A treaty of peace between the princes is immediately broken. Cassander causes the young king Alexander and his mother Roxana, to be put to death. Hercules, another son of Alexander the Great, is likewise slain, with his mother Barsina, by Polyperchon. Antigonus causes Cleopatra, the sister of the same Alexander, to be put to death. The revolt of Ophellas in Libya, 31.

SECT. VII. Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, besieges and takes Athens, and establishes a democracy in that city. Demetrius Phalerius, who commanded there, retires to Thebes. He is condemned to suffer death, and his statues are thrown down. He retires into Egypt. The excessive honours paid by the Athenians to Antigonus and his son Demetrius. This latter obtains a great naval victory over Ptolemy, takes Salamina, and makes himself master of all the island of Cyprus. Antigonus and Demetrius assume the title of kings after this victory, and their example is followed by the other princes. Antigonus forms an enterprise against Egypt, which proves unsuccessful, 36.

SECT. VIII. Demetrius forms the siege of Rhodes, which he raises a year after, by concluding a treaty much to the honour of the city. Heliopolis, a famous machine. The Solossus of Rhodes. Protogenes, a celebrated painter, spared during the siege, 40.

SECT. IX. The expedition of Seleucus into India. Demetrius compels Cassander to raise the siege of Athens. The excessive honours paid him in that city. A league between Ptolemy, Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, against Antigonus and Demetrius. The battle of Ipsus, a city of Phrygia, wherein Antigonus is slain, and Demetrius put to flight, 45.

BOOK XVII.

THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

CHAP. I.

SECT. I. The four victorious princes divide the empire of Alexander the Great into as many kingdoms. Seleucus builds several cities. Athens shuts her gates against Demetrius. He reconciles himself with Seleucus, and afterwards with Ptolemy. The death of Cassander. The first exploits of Pyrrhus. Athens taken by Demetrius. He loses almost at the same time, all he possessed, 47.

SECT. II. Dispute between the two sons of Cassander for the crown of Macedonia: Demetrius being invited to the assistance of Alexander, finds means to destroy him, and is proclaimed king by the Macedonians. He makes great preparations for the conquest of Asia. A powerful confederacy is formed against him. Pyrrhus and Lysimachus deprive him of Macedonia, and divide it between themselves. Pyrrhus is soon obliged to quit those territories. Sad end of Demetrius, who dies in prison, 50.

SECT. III. Ptolemy Soter resigns his kingdom to his son Ptolemy Philadelphus. The tower of Pharos built. The image of Serapis conveyed to Alexandria. The celebrated library founded in that city, with an academy of learned men. Demetrius Phalerius presides over both. Death of Ptolemy Soter, 53.

SECT. IV. The magnificent solemnity at the inauguration of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, 55.

SECT. V. The first transactions of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The death of Demetrius Phalerus. Seleucus resigns his queen and part of his empire to his son Antiochus. The war between Seleucus and Lysimachus; the latter of whom is slain in a battle. Seleucus is assassinated by Ptolemy Ceraunus, on whom he had conferred a multitude of obligations. The two sons of Arsinoe are murdered by their uncle Ceraunus, who also banishes that princess. Ceraunus is soon punished for those crimes by the irruption of the Gauls, by whom he is slain in a battle. The attempt of that people against the temple of Delphos. Antigonus establishes himself in Macedonia, 58.

SECT. VI. Ptolemy Philadelphus causes the books of the Holy Scripture, preserved by the Jews with the utmost care, to be translated into the Greek language as an ornament to his library. This is called the version of the Septuagint, 63.

SECT. VII. The various expeditions of Pyrrhus: first, into Italy; where he fights two battles with the Romans. The character and conduct of Cineas: secondly, into Sicily; and then into Italy again. His third engagement with the Romans wherein he is defeated. His expedition into Macedonia; of which he makes himself master for some time, after having overthrown Antigonus. His expedition into Peloponnesus. He forms the siege of Sparta, but without success. Is slain at that of Argos. The deputation from Philadelphus to the Romans, and from the Romans to Philadelphus, 64.

SECT. VIII. Athens besieged and taken by Antigonus. The just punishment inflicted on Sotades, a satiric poet. The revolt of Magas from Philadelphus. The death of Philæterus, founder of the kingdom of Pergamus. The death of Antiochus Soter. He is succeeded by his son Antiochus, surnamed Theos. The wise measures taken by Ptolemy for the improvement of commerce. An accommodation effected between Magas and Philadelphus. The death of the former. The war between Antiochus and Ptolemy. The revolt of the East against Antiochus. Peace restored between the two kings. The death of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 74.

SECT. IX. Character and qualities of Ptolemy Philadelphus 79.

CHAP. II.

SECT. I. Antiochus Theos is poisoned by his queen Laodice, who causes Seleucus Callinicus to be declared king. She also destroys Berenice and her son. Ptolemy Euergetes avenges their death, by that of Laodice, and seizes part of Asia. Antiochus Hierax, and Seleucus his brother, unite against Ptolemy. The death of Antigonius Gonatus, king of Macedonia. He is succeeded by his son Demetrius. The war between the two brothers, Antiochus and Seleucus. The death of Eumenes, king of Pergamus. Attalus succeeds him. The establishment of the Parthian empire by Arsaces. Antiochus is slain by robbers. Seleucus is taken prisoner by the Parthians. Credit of Joseph, the nephew of Onias, with Ptolemy. The death of Demetrius, king of Macedonia. Antigonus seizes the throne of that prince. The death of Seleucus, 79, 80.

SECT. II. The establishment of the republic of the Achaëans. Aratus delivers Sicyon from tyranny. The character of that young Grecian. He is enabled by the liberality of Ptolemy Evergetes, to check a sedition ready to break out in Sicyon. Takes Corinth from Antigonus, king of Macedonia. Prevails on the cities of Megara, Træzene, Epidaurus, and Megalopolis, to accede to the Achæan league; but is not successful with respect to Argos, 84.

SECT. III. Agis king of Sparta, attempts to reform the state, and endeavours to revive the ancient institutions of Lycurgus, in which he partly succeeds; but finds an entire change in Sparta at his return from a campaign in which he had joined Aratus against the Ætoliens. He is at last condemned to die, and executed accordingly, 89.

SECT. IV. Cleomenes ascends the throne of Sparta, and engages in a war against the Achæans, over whom he obtains several advantages. He reforms the government of Sparta, and re-establishes the ancient discipline. Acquires new advantages over Aratus and the Achæans. Aratus applies for succour to Antigonus, king of Macedonia, by whose aid the Achæans obtain repeated victories, and take several places from the enemy, 94.

SECT. V. The celebrated battle of Silasia, wherein Antigonus defeats Cleomenes, who retires to Egypt. Antigonus makes himself master of Sparta, and treats that city with great humanity. The death of that prince, who is succeeded by Philip, the son of Demetrius. The death of Ptolemy Evergetes, to whose throne Ptolemy Philopator succeeds. A great earthquake at Rhodes. The noble generosity of those princes and cities who contributed to the reparation of the losses which the Rhodians had sustained by that calamity. The fate of the famous Colossus, 99.

BOOK XVIII.

THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

SECT. I. Ptolemy Philopator reigns in Egypt. The short reign of Seleucus Ceraunus. He is succeeded by his brother Antiochus, surnamed the Great. Achæus's fidelity to him. Hermias, his chief minister, first removes Epigenes, the ablest of all his generals, and afterwards puts him to death, 102.

SECT. II. The Ætoliens declare against the Achæans. Battle of Caphysa lost by Aratus. The Achæans have recourse to Philip, who undertakes their defence. Troubles break out in Lacedæmonia. The unhappy death of Cleomenes in Egypt. Two kings are elected in Lacedæmonia. That republic joins with the Ætoliens, 110.

SECT. III. Various expeditions of Philip against the enemies of the Achæans. Apelles, his prime minister, abuses his confidence in an extraordinary manner. Philip makes an inroad into Ætolia. Thermæ taken without opposition. Excesses of Philip's soldiers in that city. Prudent retreat of that prince. Tumults in the camp. Punishment of those who had occasioned them. Inroad of Philip into Læconia. The conspirators form new cabals. Punishment inflicted on them. A peace is proposed between Philip and the Achæans on the one side and the Ætoliens on the other, which is at last concluded, 112.

SECT. IV. Philip concludes a treaty with Hannibal. The Romans gain a considerable victory over him at Apollonia. He changes his conduct. His breach of faith and irregularities. He causes Aratus to be poisoned. The Ætoliens conclude an alliance with the Romans. Attalus king of Pergamus, and the Lacedæmonians, accede to it. Machanides usurps a tyrannical power at Sparta. Various expeditions of Philip and Sulpitius the Roman prætor, in one of which Philopomen signals himself, 119.

SECT. V. Education and great qualities of Philopomen, 123.

SECT. VI. Various expeditions of Philip and Sulpitius. A digression of Polybius upon signals made by fire, 125.

SECT. VII. Philopomen gains a famous victory near Mantinea over Machanidas, tyrant of Sparta. The high esteem in which that general is held. Nabis succeeds Machanidas; some instances of his avarice and cruelty. A general peace concluded between Philip and the Romans, in which the allies on both sides are included, 129.

SECT. VIII. The glorious expeditions of Antiochus into Media, Parthia, Hyrcania, and as far as India. At his return to Antioch, he receives advice of Ptolemy Philopator's death, 131.

BOOK XIX.

SEQUEL OF THE HISTORY OF ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

CHAP. I.

SECT. I. Ptolemy Epiphanes succeeds Philopator his father in the kingdom of Egypt. Antiochus and Philip enter into an alliance to invade his dominions. The Romans become guardians of the young king. Antiochus subdues Palestine and Cœle-syria. The war of Philip against the Athenians, Attalus, and the Rhodians. He besieges Abydos. The unhappy fate of that city. The Romans declare war against Philip. Sulpitius the consul is sent into Macedonia, 133.

SECT. II. Expeditions of the consul Sulpitius in Macedonia. The Ætoliens wait for the event, in order to declare themselves. Philip loses a battle. Villius succeeds Sulpitius. No considerable transaction happens during his government. Flamininus succeeds him. Antiochus recovers Cœle-syria, of which he had been dispossessed by Aristomenes, the prime minister of Egypt. Various expeditions of the consul into Phœcis. The Achæans, after long debates, declare for the Romans, 136.

SECT. III. Flamininus is continued in the command as proconsul. He has a fruitless interview with Philip about concluding a peace. The Ætoliens, and Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, declare for the Romans. Sickness and death of Attalus. Flamininus defeats Philip in a battle near Scotussa and Cynosephale in Thessaly. A peace concluded with Philip, which puts an end to the Macedonian war. The extraordinary joy of the Greeks at the Isthmian games, when proclamation is made that they are restored to their ancient liberty by the Romans, 142.

SECT. IV. Complaints being made, and suspicions arising concerning Antiochus, the Romans send an embassy to him, which has no other effect than to dispose both parties for an open rupture. A conspiracy is formed by Scopas the Ætolian against Ptolemy. He and his accomplices are put to death. Hannibal retires to Antiochus. War of Flamininus against Nabis, whom he besieges in Sparta. He obliges him to sue for peace, and grants it to him. He enters Rome in triumph, 148.

SECT. V. Universal preparations for the war between Antiochus and the Romans. Mutual embassies and interviews on both sides, which come to nothing. The Romans send troops against Nabis, who had infringed the treaty. Philopomen gains a victory over him. The Ætoliens implore the assistance of Antiochus. Nabis is killed. Antiochus goes at last to Greece, 152.

SECT. VI. Antiochus endeavours to bring over the Achæans to his interest, but in vain. He possesses himself of Chalcis and all Eubœa. The Romans proclaim war against him, and send Manius Acilius, the consul, into Greece. Antiochus makes an ill use of Hannibal's counsel. He is defeated near Thermopylæ. The Ætoliens submit to the Romans, 157.

SECT. VII. Polyxenides, admiral of Antiochus's fleet, is defeated by Livius. L. Scipio, the new consul, is appointed to carry on the war against Antiochus. Scipio Africanus, his brother, serves under him. The Rhodians defeat Hannibal in a sea fight. The consul marches against Antiochus and crosses into Asia. He gains a signal victory over him near Magnesia. The king obtains a peace, and gives up, by treaty, all Asia on this side of mount Taurus. Dispute between Eumenes and the Rhodians, in presence of the Roman senate, relating to the Grecian cities of Asia, 160, 161.—Reflections on the conduct of the Romans with regard to the Grecian states, and the kings both of Europe and Asia, 168.

SECT. VIII. Fulvius the consul subdues the Ætoliens. The Spartans are cruelly treated by their exiles. Manilius, the other consul, conquers the Asiatic Gauls. Antiochus, in order to pay the tribute due to the Romans, plunders a temple in Elymais. That monarch is killed. Explication of Daniel's prophecy concerning Antiochus, 170.

SECT. IX. Seleucus Philopator succeeds to the throne of Antiochus his father. The first occurrences of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes in Egypt. Various embassies sent to the Achæans and Romans. Complaints made against Philip. Commissioners are sent from Rome to enquire into those complaints; and at the same time to take cognizance of the ill treatment of Sparta by the Achæans. Sequel of that affair, 175.

SECT. X. Philopomen besieges Messene. He is taken prisoner, and put to death by the Messenians. Messene surrendered to the Achæans. The splendid funeral procession of Philopomen, whose ashes are carried to Megalopolis. Sequel of the affair relating to the Spartan exiles. The death of Ptolemy Epiphanes, who is succeeded by Philometor his son, 179.

CHAP. II.

SECT. I. Complaints made at Rome against Philip. Demetrius his son, who was in that city, is sent back to his father, accompanied by some ambassadors. A secret conspiracy of Perses against his brother Demetrius with regard to the succession of the throne. He accuses him before Philip. Speeches of both those princes. Philip, upon a new impeachment, causes Demetrius to be put to death, but afterwards discovers his innocence and Perses's guilt. Whilst Philip is meditating to punish the latter, he dies, and Perses succeeds him, 183.

SECT. II. The death of Seleucus Philopator, whose reign was short and obscure. He is succeeded by his brother Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes. Causes of the war which afterward broke out between the kings of Egypt and Syria. Antiochus gains a victory over Ptolemy. The conqueror possesses himself of Egypt, and takes the king prisoner. A report prevailing of a general revolt, he goes into Palestine; besieges and takes Jerusalem, where he exercises the most horrid cruelties. The Alexandrians, in the room of Philometor, who was Antiochus's prisoner, raise to the throne his younger brother Ptolemy Euergetes, surnamed also Physcon. Antiochus renews the war with Egypt. The two brothers are reconciled. He marches towards Alexandria, in order to lay siege to it. Popilius, one of the Roman ambassadors, obliges him to quit Egypt, and not to molest the two brothers, 191.

SECT. III. Antiochus, enraged at what had happened to him in Egypt, wreaks his vengeance on the Jews. He endeavours to abolish the worship of the true God in Jerusalem. He exercises the most horrid cruelties in that city. The generous resistance made by Mattathias, who in his expiring moments, exhorts his sons to fight in defence of the law of God. Judas Maccabæus gains several victories over the generals and armies of Antiochus. That prince, who had marched into Persia, in order to amass treasures there, attempts to plunder a rich temple in Elymais, but is shamefully repulsed. Hearing that his armies had been defeated in Judæa, he sets out on a sudden to extirpate all the Jews. In his march he is struck by the hand of Heaven, and dies in the greatest torments, after having reigned eleven years, 196.

SECT. IV. Prophecies of Daniel relating to Antiochus Epiphanes, 202.

BOOK XX.

ARTICLE I.

SECT. I. Perseus prepares secretly for a war against the Romans. He endeavours a reconciliation with the Achæans in vain. His secret measures not unknown at Rome. Eumenes arrives there, and informs the senate of them. Perseus attempts to rid himself of that prince, first by assassination, and afterwards by poison. The Romans break with Perseus. Different opinions and dispositions of the kings and states, in regard to the Macedonian war. After several embassies on both sides, the war is declared in form, 205.

SECT. II. The consul Licinius and king Perseus take the field. They both encamp near the river Peneus, at some distance from each other. Engagement of the cavalry, in which Perseus has considerably the advantage, and makes an ill use of it. He endeavours to make a peace, but ineffectually. The armies on both sides go into winter quarters, 210.

SECT. III. The senate pass a wise decree to put a stop to the avarice of the generals and magistrates, who oppressed the allies. The consul Marcus, after sustaining great fatigue, enters Macedonia. Perseus takes the alarm, and leaves the passes open: he resumes courage afterwards. Insolent embassy of the Rhodians to Rome, 214.

SECT. IV. Paulus Æmilius chosen consul. He sets out for Macedonia with the pretor Cn. Octavius, who commanded the fleet. Perseus solicits aid on all sides. His avarice is the cause of his losing considerable allies. The pretor Anicius's victories in Illyria. Paulus Æmilius's celebrated victory over Perseus near the city of Pydna. Perseus taken with all his children. The command of Paulus Æmilius in Macedonia prolonged. Decree of the senate granting liberty to the Macedonians and Illyrians. Paulus Æmilius, during the winter-quarters, visits the most celebrated cities of Greece. Upon his return to Amphipolis he gives a great feast. He marches for Rome. On his way he suffers his army to plunder all the cities of Epirus. He enters Rome in triumph. Death of Perseus. Cn. Octavius and L. Anicius have also the honour of a triumph decreed them, 219.

ARTICLE II.

SECT. I. Attalus comes to Rome to congratulate the Romans upon their success in Macedonia. The deputies of the Rhodians present themselves before the senate and endeavour to appease their wrath. After long and warm solicitations, they succeed in being admitted into the alliance of the Roman people. Severity exercised against the Ætolians. All of them, in general, who had favoured Perseus, are cited to Rome, to answer for their conduct. A thousand Achæans carried thither; Polybius one of the number. The senate banishes them into several towns of Italy. After seventeen years of banishment, they are sent back into their own country; when only three hundred of them remained, 223.

SECT. II. Mean flattery of Prusias, king of Bithynia, in the senate. Eumenes becoming suspected by the Romans, is not suffered to enter Rome. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, dies, and is succeeded by a son of the same name. Death of Eumenes. Attalus, his brother, succeeds him, as guardian to his son, then very young. War between Attalus and Prusias. The latter having formed the design of putting his son Nicomedes to death, is killed by him. Embassy of three celebrated Athenian philosophers to Rome. Another from the people of Marseilles. Digression upon the city of Marseilles, 233.

SECT. III. Andronicus, who gave himself out for the son of Perseus, makes himself master of Macedonia, and causes himself to be proclaimed king. The pretor Juventius attacks him, and is killed in the battle with part of his army. Metellus, who succeeds him, retrieves that loss. The usurper is overthrown, taken, and sent to Rome. A second and third usurper are also defeated, 237.

SECT. IV. Troubles in Achaia, which declares war against the Lacedæmonians. Metellus sends deputies to Corinth to appease these troubles; they are ill used and insulted. Thebes and Chalcis join the Achæans. Metellus, after having ineffectually exhorted them to peace, gives them battle, and defeats them. The consul Mummius succeeds him, and after having gained a battle takes Corinth, sets it on fire, and entirely demolishes it. Greece is reduced into a Roman province. Various actions and death of Polybius. Triumphs of Metellus and Mummius, 238.

SECT. V. Reflection upon the causes of the grandeur, declension, and ruin of Greece, 241.

ARTICLE III.

SECT. I. A chronological abridgment of the history of the kings of Egypt and Syria, who are mentioned in the third article, 243, 244.

SECT. II. Antiochus Eupator, at the age of nine years, succeeds his father Antiochus Epiphanes, in the kingdom of Syria. Demetrius, who had been long a hostage at Rome, demands in vain permission to return to Syria. Celebrated victories of Judas Maccabæus against the generals of the king of Syria, and the king himself in person. Long differences between the two brothers, the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt, terminated at length by a happy peace, 246.

SECT. III. Octavius, ambassador of the Romans in Syria, is killed there. Demetrius escapes from Rome, puts Eupator to death, ascends the throne of Syria, and assumes the surname of Soter. He makes war against the Jews. Repeated victories of Judas Maccabæus; death of that great man. Demetrius is acknowledged king by the Romans. He abandons himself to drunkenness and debauchery. Alexander Bala forms a conspiracy against him. Demetrius is killed in a battle. Alexander espouses the daughter of Ptolemy Philometor. Temple built by the Jews in Egypt. Demetrius, son of the first of that name, sets up his claim to the throne of Syria. Alexander is destroyed. Ptolemy Philometor dies at the same time, 248.

SECT. IV. Physcon espouses Cleopatra, and ascends the throne of Egypt. Demetrius in Syria abandons himself to all manner of excesses. Diodotus, surnamed Tryphon, causes Antiochus, the son of Alexander Bala, to be proclaimed king of Syria; then kills him, and takes his place. He seizes Jonathan by treachery, and puts him to death. Demetrius undertakes an expedition against the Parthians, who take him prisoner. Cleopatra his wife espouses Antiochus Sidetes, brother of Demetrius, and places him upon the throne of Syria. Physcon's excessive follies and enormities. Attalus Philometor succeeds Attalus his uncle, whom he causes to be regretted by his vices. He dies himself, after having reigned five years, and by his will leaves the Roman people heirs to his dominions. Aristonicus seizes them. He is overthrown, led in triumph, and put to death, 251, 252.

SECT. V. Antiochus Sidetes besieges John Hyrcanus in Jerusalem. That city surrenders by capitulation. He makes war against the Parthians, and perishes in it. Phraates, king of the Parthians, defeated in his turn by the Scythians. Physcon commits more horrid cruelties in Egypt. A general revolt obliges him to quit it. Cleopatra, his first wife, is replaced upon the throne. She implors aid of Demetrius, and is soon reduced to leave Egypt. Physcon returns thither, and re-ascends the throne. By his means Zebina dethrones Demetrius, who is soon after killed. The kingdom is divided between Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius, and Zebina. The latter is defeated and killed. Antiochus Grypus ascends the throne of Syria. The famous Mithridates begins to reign in Pontus. Physcon's death, 257.

SECT. VI. Ptolemy Lathyrus succeeds Physcon. War between Grypus and his brother Antiochus of Cyzicum, for the kingdom of Syria. Hyrcanus fortifies himself in Judæa. His death. Aristobulus succeeds him, and assumes the title of king. He is succeeded by Alexander Jannæus. Cleopatra drives Lathyrus out of Egypt, and places Alexander his youngest brother, on the throne in his stead. War between that princess and her sons. Death of Grypus. Ptolemy Apion leaves the kingdom of Cyrenaica to the Romans. Continuation of the wars in Syria and Egypt. The Syrians choose Tigraues king. Lathyrus is re-established upon the throne of Egypt. He dies. Alexander his nephew succeeds him. Nicomedes king of Bithynia, makes the Roman people his heirs, 261.

SECT. VII. Seleene, sister of Lathyrus, conceives hopes of the crown of Egypt; she sends two of her sons to Rome for that purpose. The eldest, called Antiochus, on his return passes through Sicily. Verres, prætor of that island, takes from him a golden candelabrum, designed for the Capitol. Antiochus, surnamed Asiaticus, after having reigned four years over part of Syria, is dispossessed of part of his dominions by Pompey, who reduces Syria into a province of the Roman empire. Troubles in Judæa and Egypt. The Alexandrians expel Alexander their king and set Ptolemy Auletes on the throne in his stead. Alexander, at his death, makes the Roman people his heirs. In consequence, some years after, they order Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, brother of Auletes, to be deposed, confiscate his property, and seize that island. The celebrated Cato is charged with this commission, 266.

ARTICLE I.

Abridgment of the history of the Jews from Aristobulus, son of Hyrcanus, who first assumed the title of king, to the reign of Herod the Great, the Idumæan, 270.

SECT. I. Reign of Aristobulus the first, which lasted two years, 270.

SECT. II. Reign of Alexander Jannæus, which continued twenty-seven years, 271.

SECT. III. Reign of Alexandra, the wife of Alexander Jannæus, which continued nine years. Hyrcanus, her eldest son, is high-priest during that time, 272.

SECT. IV. Reign of Aristobulus II. which continued six years, 273.

SECT. V. Reign of Hyrcanus II. which continued twenty-four years, 274.

SECT. VI. Reign of Antigonus, of only two years' duration, 275.

ART. II. Abridgment of the history of the Parthians, from the establishment of that empire to the defeat of Crassus, which is related at large, 276.

ART. III. Abridgment of the history of the kings of Cappadocia, from the foundation of that kingdom to the time when it became a province of the Roman empire, 286.

BOOK XXII.

THE HISTORY OF SYRACUSE

ARTICLE I.

SECT. I. Hiero the second chosen captain-general by the Syracusans, and soon after appointed king. He makes an alliance with the Romans in the beginning of the first Punic war, 290.

SECT. II. Hiero's pacific reign. He particularly favours agriculture. He applies the abilities of Archimedes his relation to the service of the public, and causes him to make an infinite number of machines for the defence of a besieged place. He dies very old, and much regretted by the people, 292.

ARTICLE II.

SECT. I. Hieronymus, grandson of Hiero, succeeds him, and causes him to be much regretted by his vices and cruelty. He is killed in a conspiracy. Barbarous murder of the princesses. Hippocrates and Epicydes possess themselves of the government of Syracuse, and declare for the Carthaginians, as Hieronymus had done, 296.

SECT. II. The consul Marcellus besieges Syracuse. The considerable losses of men and ships, occasioned by the dreadful machines of Archimedes, oblige Marcellus to change the siege into a blockade. He takes the city at length by means of his intelligence within it. Death of Archimedes, killed by a soldier, who did not know him, 300.

ARTICLE III.

SECT. I. Tomb of Archimedes discovered by Cicero, 304.

SECT. II. Summary of the history of Syracuse, 304.

SECT. III. Reflections upon the government and character of the Syracusans, 305.

BOOK XXIII.

THE HISTORY OF PONTUS.

SECT. I. Mithridates, at twelve years of age, ascends the throne of Pontus. He seizes Cappadocia and Bithynia, having first expelled their kings. The Romans re-establish them. He causes all the Romans and Italians in Asia Minor to be put to death in one day. First war of the Romans with Mithridates, who had made himself master of Asia Minor and Greece, and had taken Athens. Sylla is charged with this war. He besieges and retakes Athens. He gains three great battles against the generals of Mithridates. He grants that prince peace in the fourth year of the war. Library of Athens, in which were the works of Aristotle. Sylla causes it to be carried to Rome, 308.

SECT. II. Second war against Mithridates, under Mursina, of only three years' duration. Mithridates prepares to renew the war. He concludes a treaty with Sertorius. Third war with Mithridates. Lucullus the consul sent against him. He obliges him to raise the siege of Cyzicum, and defeats his troops. He gains a complete victory over him, and reduces him to fly into Pontus. Tragical end of the sisters and wives of Mithridates. He endeavours to retire to Tigranes, his son-in-law. Lucullus regulates the affairs of Asia, 315.

SECT. III. Lucullus causes war to be declared with Tigranes, and marches against him. Vanity and ridiculous self-sufficiency of that prince. He loses a great battle. Lucullus takes Tigranocerta, the capital of Armenia. He gains a second victory over the joint forces of Tigranes and Mithridates. Mutiny and revolt in the army of Lucullus, 319.

SECT. IV. Mithridates, taking advantage of the discord which had arisen in the Roman army, recovers all his dominions. Pompey is chosen to succeed Lucullus. He overthrows Mithridates in several battles. The latter flies in vain to Tigranes his son-in-law, for refuge, who is engaged in a war with his own son. Pompey marches into Armenia against Tigranes, who comes to him and surrenders himself. Weary of pursuing Mithridates to no purpose, he returns into Syria, makes himself master of that kingdom, and puts an end to the empire of the Seleucide. He marches back to Pontus. Pharnaces makes the army revolt against his father Mithridates, who kills himself. That prince's character. Pompey's expeditions into Arabia and Judæa, where he takes Jerusalem. After having reduced all the cities of Pontus, he returns to Rome, and receives the honour of a triumph, 324.

BOOK XXIV.

THE HISTORY OF EGYPT.

SECT. I. Ptolemæus Auletes having been placed upon the throne of Egypt in the room of Alexander, is declared the friend and ally of the Roman people, by the influence of Cæsar and Pompey, which he purchases at a very great price. In consequence, he loads his subjects with taxes. He is expelled the throne. The Alexandrians make his daughter Berenice queen. He goes to Rome, and, by money, obtains the voices of the heads of the commonwealth for his re-establishment. He is opposed by an oracle of the Sybils; notwithstanding which, Gabinus sets him upon the throne by force of arms, where he remains till his death. The famous Cleopatra, and her brother, very young, succeed him, 330.

SECT. II. Pothinus and Achillas, ministers of the young king, expel Cleopatra. She raises troops to re-establish herself. Pompey, after having been overthrown at Pharsalia, retires into Egypt. He is assassinated there. Cæsar, who pursued him, arrives at Alexandria, where he is informed of his death, which he seems to lament. He endeavours to reconcile the brother and sister, and for that purpose, sends for Cleopatra, of whom he soon becomes enamoured. Great commotions arise at Alexandria, and several battles are fought between the Egyptians and Cæsar's troops, wherein the latter have almost always the advantage. The king having been drowned in flying, after a sea-fight, all Egypt submits to Cæsar. He sets Cleopatra, with her younger brother, upon the throne, and returns to Rome, 333.

SECT. III. Cleopatra causes her younger brother to be put to death, and reigns alone. The death of Julius Cæsar having made way for the triumvirate formed between Antony, Lepidus, and young Cæsar, called also Octavius, Cleopatra declares herself for the triumvirs. She goes to Antony at Tarsus, gains an absolute ascendancy over him, and brings him with her to Alexandria. Antony goes to Rome, where he espouses Octavia. He abandons himself again to Cleopatra, and after some expeditions returns to Alexandria, which he enters in triumph. He there celebrates the coronation of Cleopatra and her children. Open rupture between Cæsar and Antony. The latter repudiates Octavia. The two fleets put to sea. Cleopatra determines to follow Antony. Battle of Actium. Cleopatra flies, and draws Antony after her. Cæsar's victory is complete. He advances some time after to Alexandria, which makes no long resistance. Tragical death of Antony and Cleopatra. Egypt is reduced into a province of the Roman empire, 337.

THE HISTORY

OF

ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

BOOK XVI.

For the Author's Introduction to this Division of the Work, see Preface, page 37.

SECTION I.—TROUBLES WHICH FOLLOWED THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER. THE PARTITION OF THE PROVINCES AMONG THE GENERALS. ARIDÆUS ELECTED KING. PERDICCAS APPOINTED HIS GUARDIAN, AND REGENT OF THE EMPIRE.

IN relating the death of Alexander the Great, I mentioned the many troubles and commotions that arose in the army on the first news of that event. All the troops in general, soldiers as well as officers, had their thoughts entirely taken up at first with the loss of a prince whom they loved as a father, and revered almost as a god, and abandoned themselves without reserve to grief and tears. A mournful silence reigned at first throughout the camp; but this was soon succeeded by dismal sighs and cries, which spoke the true language of the heart, and in which that vain ostentation of sorrow, which is too often paid to custom and decorum on such occasions,¹ had no share.

When the first impressions of grief had given place to reflection, they began to consider, with the utmost consternation, the state in which the death of Alexander had left them. They found themselves at an infinite distance from their native country, and amidst a people lately subdued, so little accustomed to their new yoke, that they were hardly acquainted with their present masters, and had not as yet had sufficient time to forget their ancient laws, and that form of government under which they had always lived. What measures could be taken to keep a country of such vast extent in subjection? how could it be possible to suppress those seditions and revolts which would naturally break out on all sides in that decisive moment? what expedients could be formed to restrain those troops within the limits of their duty, who had so long been habituated to complaints and murmurs, and were commanded by chiefs, whose several views and pretensions were so different?

The only remedy for these various calamities seemed to consist in a speedy nomination of a successor to Alexander; and the troops, as well as the officers, and the whole Macedonian state, seemed at first to be very desirous of this expedient, and, indeed, their common interest and security, with the preservation of their new conquests, amidst the barbarous nations that surrounded them, made it necessary for them to consider this election as their first and most important care, and to turn their thoughts to the choice of a person qualified to fill so arduous a station, and sustain the weight of it in such a manner as to be capable of maintaining general order and tranquillity. But it had already been written,² "that the kingdom of Alexander should be divided and rent asunder after his death," and that it should not be transmitted in the usual manner "to his posterity." No efforts of human wisdom could establish a sole successor to that prince. In vain did they deliberate, consult and decide;³ nothing could be executed contrary to the preordained event, or, at least, nothing short of it could possibly subsist. A superior and invisible Power had already disposed of the kingdom, and divided it by an inevitable decree, as will be evident in the sequel. The circumstances of this partition had been denounced near three centuries before this time; the portions of it had already been assigned to different possessors, and no thing could frustrate that division, which was only to be deferred for a few years. Till the arrival of that period, men indeed might raise commotions, and concert a variety of movements; but, all their efforts would only tend to the accomplishment of what had been ordained by the sovereign Master of kingdoms, and of what had been foretold by his prophet.

Alexander had a son by Barsina, and had conferred the name of Hercules upon him. Roxana, another of his wives, was advanced in her pregnancy when that prince died. He had likewise a natural brother, called Aridæus; but he would not upon his death-bed dispose of his dominions in favour of any heir; for which reason this vast empire, which no longer had a master to sway it, became a source of competition and wars, as Alexander had plainly foreseen, when he declared that his friends would celebrate his funeral with bloody battles.

The division was augmented by the equality among the generals of the army, none of whom was so superior to his colleagues, either by birth or merit, as to induce them to offer him the empire, and submit to his authority. The cavalry were desirous that Aridæus should succeed Alexander. His understanding had been impaired ever since he had been afflicted in his infancy with a violent indisposition, occasioned, as was pretended, by some particular drink which had been given him by Olympias, and which had disordered his senses. This ambitious princess being apprehensive that the engaging qualities she discovered in Aridæus, would be so many obstacles to the greatness of her son Alexander, thought it expedient to have recourse to the criminal precaution already mentioned. The infantry had declared against this prince, and were headed by Ptolemy, and other chiefs of great reputation, who began each to think of their own particular establishment. For a sudden revolution had taken place in the minds of these officers, and caused them to contemn the rank of private persons, and all dependency and subordination, with a view of aspiring to sovereign power, which had never employed their thoughts till then, and to which they never thought themselves qualified to pretend before this conjuncture of affairs.

These disputes, which engaged the minds of all parties, delayed the interment of Alexander for the space of seven days; and, if we may credit some authors, the body continued uncorrupted all that time. It was afterwards delivered to the Egyptians and Chaldeans, who embalmed it after their manner; and Aridaeus, a different person from him I have already mentioned, was charged with the care of conveying it to Alexandria.

After a variety of troubles and agitations had intervened, the principal officers assembled at a conference; where it was unanimously concluded, that Aridaeus should be king, or rather, that he should be invested with the shadow of royalty. The infirmity of mind, which ought to have excluded him from the throne, was the very motive of their advancing him to it, and united all suffrages in his favour. It favoured the hopes and pretensions of all the chiefs, and covered their designs. It was also agreed in this assembly, that if Roxana, who was then in the sixth or eighth month of her pregnancy, should have a son, he should be associated with Aridaeus in the throne. Perdicas, to whom Alexander on his death-bed had left his ring, had the person of the prince consigned to his care as a guardian, and was constituted regent of the kingdom.

The same assembly, whatever respect they might bear to the memory of Alexander, thought fit to annul some of his regulations, which would have been destructive to the state, and have exhausted his treasury. He had given orders for six temples to be erected in particular cities which he had named, and had fixed the expenses of each of these structures at 500 talents, which amount to 500,000 crowns. He had likewise ordered a pyramid to be raised over the tomb of his father Philip, which was to be finished with a grandeur and magnificence equal to that in Egypt, esteemed one of the seven wonders of the world. He had likewise planned other expenses of the like kind, which were prudently revoked by the assembly.

Within a short time after these proceedings,¹ Roxana was delivered of a son who was named Alexander, and acknowledged king, jointly with Aridaeus. But neither of these princes possessed any thing more than the name of royalty, as all authority was entirely lodged in the great lords and generals, who had divided the provinces among themselves.

In Europe; Thrace and the adjacent regions were consigned to Lysimachus; and Macedonia, Epirus, and Greece, were allotted to Antipater and Craterus.

In Africa; Egypt and the other conquests of Alexander in Libya and Cyrenaica, were assigned to Ptolemy the son of Lagos, with that part of Arabia which borders on Egypt. The month of Thoth in the autumn is the epocha from whence the years of the empire of the Lagides in Egypt begin to be computed; though Ptolemy did not assume the title of king, in conjunction with the other successors of Alexander, till about seventeen years after this event.

In the Lesser Asia; Lycia, Pamphylia, and the greater Phrygia, were given to Antigonus; Caria, to Cassander; Lydia, to Menander; the lesser Phrygia, to Leonatus; Armenia, to Neoptolemus; Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, to Eumenes. These two provinces had never been completely subjected by the Macedonians, and Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, continued to govern them as formerly; Alexander having advanced with so much rapidity to his other conquests, as left him no inclination to amuse himself with the entire reduction of that province, contented himself with a slight submission.

Syria and Phoenicia fell to Laomedon; one of the two Medias to Atropates, and the other to Perdicas. Persia was assigned to Peucestes; Babylonia to Archon; Mesopotamia, to Arcesilas; Parthia and Hyrcana, to Phrataphernes; Bactriana and Sogdiana, to Philip; the other regions were divided among generals whose names are now but little known.

Seleucus, the son of Antiochus, was placed at the head of the cavalry of the allies, which was a post of great importance; and Cassander, the son of Antipater, commanded the companies of guards.

The Upper Asia, which extends almost to India, and even India also, were left in the possession of those who had been appointed governors of those countries by Alexander.

The same disposition generally prevailed in all the provinces I have already mentioned; and it is in this sense that most interpreters explain that passage in the Maccabees,² which declares, that Alexander, having assembled the great men of his court who had been brought up with him, divided his kingdom among them in his lifetime. And indeed it was very probable, that this prince, when he saw his death approaching, and had no inclination to nominate a sole successor himself, was contented with confirming each of his officers in the government he had formerly assigned them; which is sufficient to authorize the declaration of the Maccabees, "That he divided his kingdom amongst them whilst he was living."

This partition was only the work of a man, and its duration was but short. That Being, who reigns alone, and is the only King of ages, had decreed a different distribution. He had assigned to each his portion, and marked out its boundaries and extent, and his disposition alone was to subsist.

The partition concluded upon in the assembly was the source of various divisions and wars, as will be evident in the series of this history, each of these governors claiming the exercise of an independent and sovereign power in his particular province. They however paid that veneration to the memory of Alexander,³ as not to assume the title of king, till all the race of that monarch, who had been placed upon the throne, were extinct.

Among the governors of the provinces I have mentioned, some distinguished themselves more than others by their reputation, merit and cabals; and formed different parties, to which the others adhered, agreeably to their particular views, either of interest or ambition. For it is not to be imagined that the resolutions, which are formed in conjunctures of this nature, are much influenced by a devotion to the public good.

Eumenes must,⁴ however, be excepted; for he undoubtedly was the most virtuous man among all the governors, and had no superior in true bravery. He was always firm in the interest of the two kings, from a principle of true probity. He was a native of Cardia, a city of Thrace, and his birth was but obscure. Philip, who had observed excellent qualities in him in his youth, kept him near his own person in the quality of secretary, and reposed great confidence in him. He was equally esteemed by Alexander, who treated him with extraordinary marks of his favour. Barsina, the first lady for whom this prince had entertained a passion in Asia, and by whom he had a son named Hercules, had a sister of the same name with her own, and the king gave her in marriage to Eumenes.⁵ We shall see by the event that this prudent favourite conducted himself in such a manner as justly entitled him to the favour of those two princes, even after their death; and all his sentiments and actions will make it evident that a man may be a plebeian by birth, and yet very noble by disposition.

I have already intimated,⁶ that Sysigambis, who had patiently supported the death of her father, husband, and son, could not survive the loss of Alexander.⁷ The death of this princess was soon followed by that of the two grand-daughters, Statira, the wife of Alexander, and Drypetis, the relict of Hephæstion. Roxana, who was apprehensive lest Statira should be pregnant by Alexander as well as herself, and that the birth of a prince would frustrate the measures which had been taken to secure the succession to the son she hoped to have, prevailed upon the two sisters to visit her, and secretly destroyed them in concert with Perdicas, her only confident in that impious proceeding.

It is now time to enter upon a detail of those actions that were performed by the successors of Alexander. I shall therefore begin with the defection of the Greeks in Upper Asia, and with the war which Antipater had to sustain against Greece; because those transactions are most detached, and in a manner distinct, from the other events.

SECTION II.—THE REVOLT OF THE GREEKS IN UPPER ASIA. THE IMPRESSIONS OCCASIONED BY THE NEWS OF ALEXANDER'S DEATH AT ATHENS. THE EXPEDITION OF ANTIPATER INTO GREECE. HE IS FIRST DEFEATED, AND AFTERWARDS VICTORIOUS. MAKES HIMSELF MASTER OF ATHENS, AND LEAVES A GARRISON THERE. THE FLIGHT AND DEATH OF DEMOSTHENES.

The Greeks,¹ whom Alexander A. M. 3681. had established, in the form of colonies, in the provinces of Upper Asia, continued with reluctance in those settlements, because they did not experience that delight and satisfaction with which they had flattered themselves, and had long cherished an ardent desire of returning to their own country. They had not however dared to discover their uneasiness whilst Alexander was living, but the moment they received intelligence of his death, they openly declared their intentions. They armed 20,000 foot, all warlike and experienced soldiers, with 3000 horse; and having placed Philo at their head, they prepared for their departure, without taking counsel, or receiving orders from any but themselves, as if they had been subject to no authority, and no longer acknowledged any superior.

Perdicas, who foresaw the consequences of such an enterprise, at a time when every thing was in motion, and when the troops, as well as their officers, breathed nothing but independence, sent Pithon to oppose them.

The merit of this officer was acknowledged by all; and he willingly charged himself with this commission, in expectation of gaining over those Greeks, and of procuring himself some considerable establishment in Upper Asia by their means. Perdicas, being acquainted with his design, gave a very surprising order to the Macedonians whom he sent with that general, which was to exterminate the revolters entirely. Pithon, on his arrival, brought over, by money, 3000 Greeks, who turned their backs in the battle, and were the occasion of his obtaining a complete victory. The vanquished troops surrendered, but made the preservation of their lives and liberties the condition of their submitting to the conqueror. This was exactly agreeable to Pithon's design, but he was no longer master of its execution. The Macedonians thinking it incumbent on them to accomplish the orders of Perdicas, inhumanly slaughtered all the Greeks, without the least regard to the terms they had granted them. Pithon being thus defeated in his views, returned with his Macedonians to Perdicas.

This expedition was soon succeeded by the Grecian war.² The news of Alexander's death being brought to Athens, had excited great rumours, and occasioned a joy that was almost universal. The people, who had long sustained with reluctance the yoke which the Macedonians had imposed on Greece, made liberty the subject of all their discourse: they breathed nothing but war, and abandoned themselves to the extravagant emotions of a senseless and excessive joy. Phocion, who was a person of wisdom and moderation, and doubted the truth of the intelligence they had received, endeavoured to calm the turbulency of their minds, and to check these impetuous sallies, which rendered them incapable of counsel and sedate reflection. As the generality of the orators, notwithstanding all his remonstrances, exclaimed that the news was true, and that Alexander was certainly dead,

Phocion rose up, and expressed himself in this manner: "If he be really dead to-day, he will likewise be so to-morrow and the next day, so that we shall have time enough to deliberate in a calm manner, and with a greater security."

Leosthenes, who was the first that published this account at Athens, was continually haranguing the people with excessive arrogance and vanity. Phocion, who was tired with his speeches, said to him, "Young man, your discourse resembles the cypress, which is tall and spreading, but bears no fruit." He gave great offence, by opposing the inclinations of the people in so strenuous a manner, and Hyperides rising up, asked him this question: "When would you advise the Athenians to make war?"—"As soon," replied Phocion, "as I see the young men firmly resolved to observe a strict discipline; the rich disposed to contribute, according to their abilities, to the expense of a war; and when the orators no longer rob the public."

All the remonstrances of Phocion were ineffectual: a war was resolved upon, and a deputation agreed to be sent to all the states of Greece, to engage their accession to the league. This is the war in which all the Greeks, except the Thebans, united to maintain the liberty of their country, under the conduct of Leosthenes, against Antipater; and it was called the Lamian war, from the name of a city where the latter was defeated in the first battle.

Demosthenes,³ who was then in exile at Megara, but who amidst his misfortunes always retained an ardent zeal for the interest of his country and the defence of the common liberty, joined himself with the Athenian ambassadors sent into Peloponnesus, and having seconded their remonstrances in a wonderful manner by the force of his eloquence, he engaged Sicyon, Argos, Corinth, and the other cities of Peloponnesus, to accede to the league.

The Athenians, struck with admiration at a zeal so noble and generous, immediately passed a decree to recall him from banishment. A galley with three ranks of oars was despatched to him at Ægina; and, when he entered the port of Piræus, all the magistrates and priests advanced out of the city, and all the citizens crowded to meet that illustrious exile, and received him with the utmost demonstrations of affection and joy, blended at the same time with an air of sorrow and repentance, for the injury they had done him. Demosthenes was sensibly affected with the extraordinary honours that were rendered him; and whilst he returned as it were in triumph to his country, amidst the acclamations of the people, he lifted up his hands towards heaven to thank the gods for so illustrious a protection, and congratulated himself on beholding a day more glorious to him, than that had proved to Alcibiades, on which he returned from his exile. For his fellow-citizens received him from the pure effect of desire and good will; whereas the reception of Alcibiades was not entirely voluntary, some compulsion being put upon their inclinations.

The generality of those who were far advanced in years,⁴ were extremely apprehensive of the event of a war, which had been undertaken with too much precipitation, and without examining into the consequences with all the attention and sedateness that an enterprise of so much importance required. They were sensible also, that there was no necessity for declaring themselves so openly against the Macedonians, whose veteran troops were very formidable; and the example of Thebes, which was destroyed by the same temerity of conduct, added to their consternation. But the orators, who derived their advantages from the distraction of the public affairs, and to whom, according to the observation of Philip, war was peace, and peace war, would not allow the people time to deliberate maturely on the affairs proposed to their consideration, but drew them into their sentiments by a fallacious eloquence, which presented them with nothing but scenes of future conquest and triumphs.

Demosthenes and Phocion, who wanted neither zeal nor prudence, were of different sentiments on this occasion, which was no extraordinary circumstance with respect to them. It is not my province to determine which of them had reason on his side: but, in such a perplexing conjuncture as this, there is nothing surprising in a contrariety of opinions, though the result of good intentions on both sides. Phocion's scheme was, perhaps, the most prudent, and that of Demosthenes the most glorious.

Be that as it may, a considerable army was raised, and a very numerous fleet fitted out. All the citizens who were under the age of forty, and capable of bearing arms, were drawn out. Of the ten tribes that composed the republic, three were left for the defence of Attica, the rest marched out with the other allies under the command of Leosthenes.

Antipater was far from being indolent during these ransactions in Greece, of which he had been apprized, and he had sent to Leonatus in Phrygia, and to Craterus in Cilicia, to urge them to come to his assistance; but before the arrival of the expected succours, he marched at the head of only 13,000 Macedonians and 600 horse; the frequent recruits which he had sent Alexander, having left him no more troops in all the country.

It is surprising that Antipater should attempt to give battle to the united forces of all Greece with such a handful of men; but he undoubtedly imagined, that the Greeks were no longer actuated by their ancient zeal and ardour for liberty, and that they ceased to consider it as such an inestimable advantage, as ought to inspire them with a resolution to venture their lives and fortunes for its preservation. He flattered himself that they had begun to familiarize themselves with subjection: and indeed this was the disposition of the Greeks at that time; in whom appeared no longer the descendants of those who had so gallantly sustained all the efforts of the East, and fought against a million of men for the preservation of their freedom.

Antipater advanced towards Thessaly, and was followed by his fleet, which cruised along the sea-coasts. It consisted of 110 triremes, or galleys of three benches of oars. The Thessalians declared at first in his favour; but having afterwards changed their sentiments, they joined the Athenians, and supplied them with a strong body of horse.

As the army of the Athenians and their allies was much more numerous than that of the Macedonians, Antipater could not support the charge, and was defeated in the first battle. As he durst not hazard a second, and was in no condition to make a safe retreat into Macedonia, he shut himself up in Lamia, a small city in Thessaly, in order to wait for succours that were to be transmitted to him from Asia, and he fortified himself in that place, which was soon besieged by the Athenians.

The assault was carried on with great bravery against the town, and the resistance was equally vigorous. Leosthenes, after several attempts, despairing to carry it by force, changed the siege into a blockade, in order to conquer the place by famine. He surrounded it with a wall of circumvallation, and a very deep ditch, and by these means cut off all supplies of provision. The city soon became sensible of the growing scarcity, and the besieged began to be seriously disposed to surrender; when Leosthenes, in a sally they made upon him, received a considerable wound, which rendered it necessary for him to be carried to his tent. Upon which the command of the army was consigned to Antiphilus, who was equally esteemed by the troops for his valour and ability.

Leonatus,¹ in the mean time, was A. M. 3682. marching to the assistance of the Ant. J. C. 322. Macedonians besieged in Lamia; and was commissioned, as well as Antigonus, by an agreement made between the generals, to establish Eumenes in Cappadocia by force of arms; but they took other measures, in consequence of some private views. Leonatus, who reposed an entire confidence in Eumenes, declared to him at parting, that the engagement to assist Antipater was a mere pretext, and that his real intention was to advance into Greece, in order to make himself master of Macedonia. He, at the same time, showed him letters from Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander, who invited him to come to Pella, and promised to espouse him. Leonatus being arrived within a little distance of Lamia, marched directly against the enemy, with 20,000 foot and 2500 horse. Prosperity had introduced disorder into the Grecian army; several parties of soldiers draw off, and retired into their own country on various pretexts, which greatly diminished the number of the troops, who were now reduced to 22,000 foot. The cavalry amounted to 3500, two thousand of whom were Thessalians; and as they constituted the main strength of the army, so all hopes of success were founded in them; and accordingly, when the battle was fought, this body of horse had the greatest share in the victory that was obtained. They were commanded by Menon. Leonatus, covered with wounds, lost his life in the field of battle, and was conveyed into the camp by his troops. The Macedonian phalanx greatly dreaded the shock of the cavalry, and had therefore retreated to eminences, whither the Thessalians could not pursue them. The Greeks having carried off their dead, erected a trophy, and retired.

The whole conversation at Athens turned upon the glorious exploits of Leosthenes,² who survived his honours but a short time. A universal joy spread through the city; festivals were celebrated, and sacrifices offered without intermission, to testify their gratitude to the gods for all the advantages they had obtained. The enemies of Phocion, thinking to mortify him in the most sensible manner, and reduce him to an incapacity of justifying his constant opposition to that war, asked him, if he would not have rejoiced to have performed so many glorious actions? "Undoubtedly I would," replied Phocion; "but I would not at the same time have neglected to offer the advice I gave."³ He did not think that a judgment ought to be formed of any particular counsel from mere success, but rather from the nature and solidity of the counsel itself; and he did not retract his sentiments, because those of an opposite nature had been successful, which only proved the latter more fortunate, but not more judicious. And as these agreeable advices came thick upon each other, Phocion, who was apprehensive of the sequel, cried out, "When shall we cease to conquer?"

Antipater was obliged to surrender by capitulation, but history has not transmitted to us the conditions of the treaty. The event only makes it evident, that Leosthenes compelled him to surrender at discretion, and he himself died a few days after of the wounds he had received at the siege. Antipater having quitted Lamia the day after the battle, for he seems to have been favourably treated, joined the remains of the army of Leonatus, and took upon him the command of those troops. He was extremely cautious of hazarding a second battle, and kept with his troops, like a judicious and experienced general, on eminences inaccessible to the enemy's cavalry. Antiphilus, the general of the Greeks, remained with his troops in Thessaly, and contented himself with observing the motions of Antipater.

Clitus, who commanded the Macedonian fleet, obtained, much about the same time, two victories near the islands of Echinades, over Eetion the admiral of the Athenian navy.

Craterus,⁴ who had long been expected, arrived at last in Thessaly, and halted at the river Peneus. He resigned the command to Antipater, and was contented to serve under him. The troops he had brought thither amounted, in conjunction with those of Leonatus, to above 40,000 foot, 3000 archers or slingers, and 5000 horse. The army of the allies was much inferior in number, and consisted of no more than 25,000 foot and 3500 horse. Military discipline had been much neglected among them, after the victories they had obtained. A considerable battle was fought near Cranon in which the Greeks were defeated; they, however, lost but few troops, and even that disadvantage was occasioned by the licentious conduct of the soldiers, and the small authority of the chiefs, who were incapable of enforcing obedience to their commands.

Antipater and Menon, the two generals of the Grecian army, assembled a council the next day, to deliberate, whether they should wait the return of those troops who had retired into their own country, or propose terms of accommodation to the enemy. The council declared in favour of the latter; upon which deputies were immediately despatched to the enemy's camp in the name of all the allies. Antipater replied, that he would enter into a separate treaty with each of the cities, persuading himself that he should facilitate the accomplishment of his designs by this proceeding; and he was not deceived in his opinion. His answer broke off the negotiation; and the moment he presented himself before the cities of the allies, they disbanded their troops, and surrendered up their liberties in the most pusillanimous manner, each city being solely attentive to its separate advantage.

This circumstance is a sufficient confirmation of what I have formerly observed with relation to the present disposition of the people of Greece. They were no longer animated with the noble zeal of those ancient assertors of liberty, who devoted their whole attention to the good of the public and the glory of the nation; who considered the danger of their neighbours and allies as their own, and marched with the utmost expedition to their assistance upon the first signal of their distress. Whereas now, when a formidable enemy appeared at the gates of Athens, all the republics of Greece had neither activity nor vigour; Peloponnesus continued without motion, and Sparta was as little heard of as if she had never existed; unhappy effects of the mutual jealousy which those people had conceived against each other, and of their disregard to the common liberty, in consequence of a fatal lethargy into which they were sunk amidst the greatest dangers! These are symptoms which prognosticate and prepare the way for approaching decline and ruin.

Antipater improved this desertion to his own advantage,¹ and marched immediately to Athens, which saw herself abandoned by all her allies, and consequently in no condition to defend herself against a powerful and victorious enemy. Before he entered the city, Demosthenes, and all those of his party, who may be considered as the last true Greeks, and the defenders of expiring liberty, retired from that place; and the people, in order to transfer from themselves to those great men the reproach resulting from their declaration of war against Antipater, and likewise to obtain his good graces, condemned them to die by a decree which Demades prepared. The reader has not forgot, that these are the same people who had lately recalled Demosthenes by a decree so much for his honour, and had received him in triumph.

The same Demades procured a second decree for sending ambassadors to Antipater, who was then at Thebes, and that they should be invested with full powers to negotiate a treaty of peace with him. Phocion himself was at their head; and the conqueror declared, that he expected the Athenians should entirely submit the terms to his regulation, in the manner as he himself had acted, when he was besieged in the city of Lamia, and had conformed to the capitulation imposed upon him by Leosthenes their general.

Phocion returned to acquaint the Athenians with this answer, and they were compelled to acquiesce in the conditions, however rigid they might appear. He then came back to Thebes with the rest of the ambassadors, with whom Xenocrates had been associated, in hopes that the appearance alone of so celebrated a philosopher would inspire Antipater with respect, and induce him to pay homage to his virtue. But surely they must have been little acquainted with the spirit of man, and particularly with the violent and inhuman disposition of Antipater, to be capable of flattering themselves, that an enemy, with whom they had been engaged in an open war, would renounce his advantage through any inducement of respect for the virtue of a single man, or in consequence of a harangue uttered by a philosopher who had declared against him. Antipater would not even condescend to cast his eyes upon him; and when he was preparing to enter upon the conference, for he was commissioned to be the speaker on this occasion, he interrupted him in a very abrupt manner; and perceiving that he continued his discourse, commanded him to be silent. But he did not treat Phocion in the same manner; for after he had attended to his discourse, he replied, "That he was disposed to contract a friendship and alliance with the Athenians on the following conditions: They should deliver up Demosthenes and Hyperides to him; the government should be restored to its ancient plan, by which all employments in the state were to be conferred upon the rich; that they should receive a garrison in the port of Munychia; that they should defray all the expenses of the war, and also pay a large sum, the amount of which should be settled." Thus according to Diodorus, none but those whose yearly income exceeded 2000 drachmas were to be admitted into any share of the government for the future, or to have any right to vote. Antipater intended to make himself absolute master of Athens by this regulation, being very sensible that the rich men, who enjoyed public employments, and had large revenues, would become his dependants much more effectually than a poor and despicable populace, who had nothing to lose, and who would be only guided by their own caprice.

All the ambassadors but Xenocrates were well contented with these conditions, which they thought were very moderate, considering their present situation; but that philosopher judged otherwise. "They are very moderate for slaves," said he, "but extremely severe for freemen."

The Athenians therefore were compelled to receive into Munychia a Macedonian garrison, commanded by Menyllus, a man of probity, and one of Phocion's particular friends. The troops took possession of the place during the festival of the Great Mysteries and the very day on which it was usual to carry the god Iacchus in procession from the city to Eleusis. This was a melancholy conjuncture for the Athenians, and affected them with the most sensible affliction. "Alas!" said they, when they compared the past times with those they then saw, "the gods amidst our greatest adversities, would formerly manifest themselves in our favour during this sacred ceremonial, by mystic visions and audible voices to the great astonishment of our enemies, who were terrified by them. But now, when we are even celebrating the same solemnities, they cast an unpitied eye on the greatest calamities that can happen to Greece. they behold the most sacred of all days in the year, and that which is most agreeable to us, polluted and distinguished by the most dreadful of calamities, which will even transmit its name to this sacred season through all succeeding generations."

The garrison, commanded by Menyllus, did not offer the least injury to any of the inhabitants; but there were more than 12,000 of them excluded from employments in the state, by one of the stipulations in the treaty, in consequence of their poverty. Some of these unfortunate persons continued in Athens, and lingered on a wretched life, amidst the contempt and insults they had justly drawn upon themselves; for the generality of them were seditious and mercenary in their dispositions, had neither virtue nor justice, but flattered themselves with a false idea of liberty, which they were incapable of using aright, and had no knowledge of either its bounds, duties or end. The other poor citizens departed from the city, in order to avoid that opprobrious condition, and retired into Thrace, where Antipater assigned them a city and lands for their habitation.

Demetrius Phalereus² was obliged to have recourse to flight, and retired to Nicanor; in whom Cassander, the son of Antipater, reposed much confidence, and made him governor of Munychia after the death of his father, as will appear immediately. This Demetrius had been not only the disciple, but the intimate friend of the celebrated Theophrastus; and, under the conduct of so learned a master, had perfected his natural genius for eloquence, and rendered himself expert in philosophy, politics, and history. He was in great esteem at Athens,¹ and began to enter upon the administration of affairs, when Harpalus arrived there, after he had declared against Alexander. He was obliged to quit that city at the time of which we are now speaking, and was soon after condemned there, though absent, under a vain pretext of irreligion.

The whole weight of Antipater's displeasure fell chiefly upon Demosthenes,² Hyperides, and some other Athenians, who had been their adherents; and when he was informed that they had eluded his vengeance by flight, he despatched a body of men with orders to seize them, and placed one Archias at their head, who had formerly played in tragedies. This man having found at Ægina the orator Hyperides, Aristonicus, of Marathon, and Himereus the brother of Demetrius Phalereus, who had all three taken sanctuary in the temple of Ajax; he dragged them from their asylum, and sent them to Antipater, who was then at Cleonæ, where he condemned them to die. Some authors have even declared, that he caused the tongue of Hyperides to be cut out.

The same Archias having received intelligence, that Demosthenes, who had retired into the island of Calauria, was become a suppliant in the temple of Neptune, he sailed thither in a small vessel, and landed with some Thracian soldiers: after which he spared no pains to persuade Demosthenes to accompany him to Antipater, assuring him, that he should receive no injury. Demosthenes was too well acquainted with mankind to rely on his promise; and was sensible that those venal souls, who have hired themselves into the service of iniquity, those infamous ministers in the execution of orders equally cruel and unjust, have as little regard to sincerity and truth as their masters. To prevent therefore his falling into the hands of a tyrant, who would have satiated his fury upon him, he swallowed poison, which he always carried about him, and which soon produced its effect. When he found his strength declining, he advanced a few steps, by the aid of some domestics who supported him, and fell down dead at the foot of the altar.

The Athenians, soon after this event, erected a statue of brass to his memory, as a testimonial of their gratitude and esteem, and made a decree, that the eldest branch of his family should be brought up in the Prytæum, at the public expense, from generation to generation: and at the foot of the statue they engraved this inscription, which was couched in two elegiac verses: "Demosthenes, if thy power had been equal to thy wisdom, the Macedonian Mars would never have triumphed over Greece." What regard is to be entertained for the judgment of a people, who are capable of being hurried into such opposite extremes, and who one day passed sentence of death on a citizen, and loaded him with honours and applause the next?

What I have already said of Demosthenes, on several occasions, makes it unnecessary to enlarge upon his character in this place. He was not only a great orator, but an accomplished statesman. His views were noble and exalted; his zeal for the honour and interest of his country was superior to every temptation; he firmly retained an irreconcilable aversion to all measures which had any resemblance to tyranny; and his love for liberty was such as may be imagined in a republican, as implacable an enemy to all servitude and dependency as ever lived. A wonderful sagacity of mind enabled him to penetrate into future events, and presented them to his view with as much perspicuity, though remote, as if they had been actually present. He seemed as much acquainted with all the designs of Philip, as if he had been admitted into a participation of his councils; and if the Athenians had followed his advice, that prince would not have attained that height of power which proved destructive to Greece, as Demosthenes had frequently foretold.

He was perfectly acquainted with the disposition of Philip,³ and was very far from praising him, like the generality of orators. Two colleagues, with whom he had been associated in an embassy to that great prince, were continually praising the king of Macedonia at their return, and saying, that he was a very eloquent and handsome prince, and a most extraordinary drinker. "What strange commendations are these!" replied Demosthenes. "The first is the accomplishment of a rhetorician; the second of a woman; and the third of a sponge; but none of them the qualification of a king."

With relation to eloquence, nothing can be added to what Quintilian has observed, in the parallel he has drawn between Demosthenes and Cicero. After having shown that the great and essential qualities of an orator are common to them both, he marks out the particular difference observable between them with respect to style and elocution. "The one,"⁴ says he, "is more precise, the other more luxurious. The one crowds all his forces into a smaller compass when he attacks his adversary, the other chooses a larger field for the assault. The one always endeavours in a manner to transfix him with the vivacity of his style, the other frequently overwhelms him with the weight of his discourse. Nothing can be retrenched from the one, and nothing can be added to the other. In Demosthenes we discover more labour and study, in Cicero more nature and genius."

I have elsewhere observed another mark of difference between these two great orators,⁵ which I beg leave to insert in this place. That which characterizes Demosthenes more than any other circumstance, and in which he has never been imitated, is such an absolute oblivion of himself, and so scrupulous and constant a solicitude to suppress all ostentation of wit; in a word, such a perpetual care to confine the attention of the auditor to the cause, and not to the orator, that he never suffers any one turn of thought or expression to escape him, which has no other view than merely to please and shine. This reserve and moderation in so fine a genius as Demosthenes, and in matters so susceptible of grace and elegance, adds perfection to his merit, and renders him superior to all praises.

Cicero was sensible of all the estimation due to the eloquence of Demosthenes, and experienced all its force and beauty. But as he was persuaded, that as orator, when he is engaged in any points that are not strictly essential, ought to form his style by the taste of his audience; and did not believe that the genius of his times was consistent with such a rigid exactness; he therefore judged it necessary to accommodate himself in some measure to the taste and delicacy of his auditors, who required more grace and elegance in an oration. For which reason, though he never lost sight of any important point in the cause he pleaded, he yet paid some attention to what might captivate and please the ear. He even thought that this was conducive to promote the interest of his client; and he was not mistaken, as to please is one of the most certain means of persuading: but at the same time he laboured for his own reputation, and never forgot himself.

The death of Demosthenes and Hyperides caused the Athenians to regret the reign of Philip and Alexander, and recalled to their remembrance the magnanimity, generosity, and clemency, which those two princes retained, even amidst the emotions of their displeasure; and how inclinate they had always been to pardon offences, and treat their enemies with humanity. Whereas Antipater, under the mask of a private man, in a shabby cloak, with all the appearance of a plow and frugal life, and without affecting any title to authority, discovered himself to be a rigid and imperious master.

Antipater was, however, prevailed upon by the prayers of Phocion, to recall several persons from banishment, notwithstanding all the severity of his disposition; and there is reason to believe, that Demetrius was one of this number. At least, it is certain that he had a considerable share in the administration of the republic from that time. As for those whose recall to Athens Phocion was unable to obtain, he procured for them more commodious situations, that were not so remote as their former settlements; and took his measures so effectually, that they were not banished, according to the first sentence, beyond the Cætanian mountains and the promontory of Tenarus; nor lived sequestered from the pleasures of Greece, but obtained a settlement in Peloponnesus. Who can help admiring, on the one hand, the amiable and generous disposition of Phocion, who employed his credit with Antipater, in order to procure for the unfortunate some alleviation of their calamities; and, on the other hand, a kind of humanity in a prince, who was not very desirous of distinguishing himself by that quality, but was sensible, however, that it would be extremely rigid in him, to add new mortifications to the inconveniences of banishment.

Antipater in other respects exercised his government with great justice and moderation over those who continued in Athens; he bestowed the principal posts and employments on such persons as he imagined were the most virtuous and honest men: and contented himself with removing from all authority, such as he thought were most likely to excite troubles. He was sensible, that this people could neither support a state of absolute servitude, nor of entire liberty; for which reason he thought it necessary to take from the one, whatever was too rigid; and from the other, all that was excessive and licentious.

The conqueror after so glorious a campaign, set out for Macedonia, to celebrate the nuptials of his daughter Phila with Craterus, and the solemnity was performed with all imaginable grandeur. Phila was one of the most accomplished princesses of her age, and her beauty was the least part of her merit. The lustre of her charms was heightened by the sweetness and modesty that beamed upon her countenance, and by an air of complacency, and a natural disposition to oblige, which won the hearts of all who beheld her. These engaging qualities were rendered still more amiable by the brightness of a superior genius, and a prudence uncommon in her sex, which made her capable of the greatest affairs. It is even said, that young as she then was, her father Antipater, who was one of the most able politicians of his age, never engaged in any affair of importance without consulting her. This princess never made use of the influence she had over her two husbands (for after the death of Craterus she espoused Demetrius the son of Antigonus,) but to procure some favour for the officers, their daughters, or sisters. If they were poor, she furnished them with portions for their marriage: and if they were so unhappy as to be calumniated, she herself was very active in their justification. So generous a liberality gave her an absolute power among the troops. All cabals were dissolved by her presence, and all revolts gave way and were appeased by her engaging conduct.

SECTION III.—PROCESSION AT THE FUNERAL OF ALEXANDER. HIS BODY IS CONVEYED TO ALEXANDRIA. EUMENES IS PUT INTO POSSESSION OF CAPADOCIA, BY PERDICCAS. PTOLEMY, CRATERUS, ANTIPATER, AND ANTIGONUS, FORM A CONFEDERACY AGAINST EACH OF THEM. THE DEATH OF CRATERUS. UNFORTUNATE EXPEDITION OF PERDICCAS INTO EGYPT. HE IS SLAIN THERE.

MUCH about this time¹ the funeral obsequies of Alexander were performed.² Arideus having been deputed by all the governors and grandees of the kingdom to take upon himself the care of that solemnity, had employed two years in preparing every thing that could possibly render it the most pompous and splendid funeral that had ever been seen. When all things were ready for the celebration of this mournful but superb æremonial, orders were given for the procession to begin. This was preceded by a great number of pioneers and other workmen, whose office was to make all the ways practicable through which the procession was to pass.

As soon as these were levelled, that magnificent chariot, the invention and design of which raised as much admiration as the immense riches that glittered all over it, set out from Babylon. The body of the chariot rested upon two axletrees, that were inserted into four wheels, made after the Persian manner; the naves and spokes of which were covered with gold, and the fellos plated over with iron. The extremities of the axletrees were made of gold, representing the muzzles of lions biting a dart. The chariot had four poles, to each of which were harnessed four sets of mules, each set consisting of four of those animals; so that this chariot was drawn by sixty-four mules. The strongest of those creatures, and the largest, were chosen on this occasion. They were adorned with crowns of gold, and collars enriched with precious stones and golden bells.

On this chariot was erected a pavilion of entire gold, twelve feet wide and eighteen in length, supported by columns of the Ionic order, embellished with the leaves of acanthus. The inside was adorned with jewels, disposed in the forms of shells. The circumference was beautified with a fringe of golden network: the threads that composed the texture were an inch in thickness, and to those were fastened large bells, whose sound was heard to a great distance.

The external decorations consisted of four groups in basso relievo.

The first represented Alexander seated in a magnificent chariot, with a splendid sceptre in his hand, and surrounded on one side with a troop of Macedonian arms; and on the other, with an equal number of Persians armed in their own manner. These were preceded by the king's equeuries.

In the second were seen elephants completely harnessed, with a band of Indians seated on the forepart of their bodies; and on their hinder another band of Macedonians, armed as in the day of battle.

The third exhibited to the view several squadrons of horse arranged in military array.

The fourth represented ships preparing for a battle. At the entrance into the pavilion were golden lions, that seemed to guard the passage.

The four corners were adorned with statues of massy gold, representing victories, with trophies of arms in their hands.

Under the pavilion was placed a throne of gold of a square form, adorned with the heads of animals,³ whose necks were encompassed with circlets of gold a foot and a half in breadth; to these were hung crowns, that glittered with the liveliest colours, such as were carried in procession at the celebration of sacred solemnities.

At the foot of the throne was placed the coffin of Alexander, formed of beaten gold, and half filled with aromatic spices and perfumes, as well to exhale an agreeable odour, as for the preservation of the corpse. A pall of purple, brocaded with gold, covered the coffin.

Between this and the throne, the arms of that monarch were disposed in the manner he wore them when living.

The outside of the pavilion was likewise covered with purple, flowered with gold. The top ended in a very large crown of the same metal, which seemed to be a composition of olive-branches. The beams of the sun which darted on this diadem, in conjunction with the motion of the chariot, caused it to emit a kind of rays like those of lightning.

clear and intelligible manner than I have done: but that was not possible for me to effect, though I had recourse to persons of greater capacity than myself.

² I could have wished it had been in my power to have explained several passages of this description in a more

It may easily be imagined, that in so long a procession, the motion of a chariot, laden like this, would be liable to great inconveniences. In order, therefore, that the pavilion, with all its appendages, might, when the chariot moved in any uneven ways, constantly continue in the same situation, notwithstanding the inequality of the ground, and the shocks that would frequently be unavoidable, a cylinder was raised from the middle of each axletree, to support the pavilion; by which expedient the whole machine was preserved steady.

The chariot was followed by the royal guards, all in arms and magnificently arrayed.

The multitude of spectators in this solemnity is hardly credible; but they were drawn together as well by their veneration for the memory of Alexander, as by the magnificence of this funeral pomp, which had never been equalled in the world.

There was a current prediction, that the place where Alexander should be interred would be rendered the most happy and flourishing part of the whole earth. The governors contested with each other for the disposal of a body that was to be attended with such a glorious prerogative. The affection Perdiccas entertained for his country, made him desirous that the corpse should be conveyed to Ægæ in Macedonia, where the remains of its kings were usually deposited. Other places were likewise proposed, but the preference was given to Egypt. Ptolemy, who had such extraordinary and recent obligations to the king of Macedonia, was determined to signalize his gratitude on this occasion. He accordingly set out, with a numerous guard of his best troops, in order to meet the procession, and advanced as far as Syria. When he had joined the attendants on the funeral, he prevented them from interring the corpse in the temple of Jupiter Ammon, as they had proposed. It was therefore deposited first in the city of Memphis, and from thence was conveyed to Alexandria. Ptolemy raised a magnificent temple to the memory of this monarch, and rendered him all the honours which were usually paid to demigods and heroes by Pagan antiquity.

Freinsheims,¹ in his supplement to Livy, relates, after Leo,² the African, that the tomb of Alexander the Great was still to be seen in his time, and that it was revered by the Mahomedans as the monument not only of an illustrious king, but of a great prophet.

In the partition of the several governments of Alexander's empire,³ Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, which bordered on the Pontic Sea, were allotted to Eumenes; and it was expressly stipulated by the treaty, that Leonatus and Antigonus should march with a great body of troops to establish Eumenes in the government of those dominions, and dispossess king Ariarathes of the sovereignty. This general resolution of sending troops and experienced commanders into the several provinces of the empire, was formed with great judgment; and the intention of it was, that all those conquered territories should continue under the dominion of the Macedonians, and that the inhabitants, being no longer governed by their own sovereigns, should have no future inclination to recover their former liberty, nor be in a condition to set each other the example of throwing off the new yoke of the Greeks.

But neither Leonatus nor Antigonus were very solicitous to execute this article of the treaty; and, as they were entirely attentive to their own particular interest and aggrandizement, they took other measures. Eumenes seeing himself thus abandoned by those who ought to have established him in his government, set out with all his equipage, which consisted of 300 horse and 200 of his domestics well armed; with all his riches, which amounted to about 5000 talents of gold; and retired to Perdiccas, who gave him a favourable reception. As he was much esteemed by that commander, he was admitted into a participation of all his councils. Eumenes was indeed a man of great firmness and resolution, and the most able of all the captains of Alexander.

Within a short time after this event he was conducted into Cappadocia by a great army which Perdiccas thought fit to command in person. Ariarathes had made the necessary preparations for a vigorous defence, and had raised 30,000 foot and a great body of horse; but he was defeated and taken prisoner by Perdiccas, who destroyed his whole family, and invested Eumenes with the government of his dominions. He intended, by this instance of severity, to intimidate the people, and extinguish all seditions, a mode of conduct very judicious, and absolutely necessary in the conjunction of a new government, when the state is in a general ferment, and all things are usually disposed for commotions. Perdiccas, after this transaction, advanced with his troops to chastise Isaura and Laranda, cities of Pisidia, which had massacred their governors, and revolted from the Macedonians. The last of these cities was destroyed in a very surprising manner; for the inhabitants finding themselves in no condition to defend it, and despairing of any quarter from the conqueror, shut themselves up in their houses, with their wives, children, and parents, and all their gold and silver; set fire to their several habitations, and, after they had fought with the fury of lions, threw themselves into the flames. The city was abandoned to plunder; and the soldiers, after they had extinguished the fire, found a very great booty, for the place was filled with riches.

Perdiccas,⁴ after this expedition, marched into Cilicia, where he passed the winter. During his residence in that country, he formed a resolution to divorce Nicaea, the daughter of Antipater, whom he had espoused at a time when he thought that marriage subservient to his interest. But when the regency of the empire had given him a superior credit, and caused him to conceive more exalted hopes, his thoughts took a different turn, and he was desirous of espousing Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander the Great. She had been married to Alexander king of Epirus; and, having lost her husband in the wars of Italy, she had continued in a state of widowhood and was then at Sardis in Lydia. Perdiccas despatched Eumenes thither, to make proposals of marriage to that princess, and endeavour to render him agreeable to her. This alliance with a lady who was the sister of Alexander by the same father and mother, and exceedingly beloved by the Macedonians, opened him a way to the empire through the favour of that people, which he might naturally expect from his marriage with Cleopatra.

Antigonus penetrated into his design, and evidently foresaw that his own destruction was to be the foundation of the intended success. He, therefore, passed into Greece with the greatest expedition, in order to find Antipater and Craterus, who were then engaged in a war with the Ætolians, and disclosed to them the whole plan that Perdiccas had formed. Upon this intelligence they immediately came to an accommodation with the Ætolians, and advanced towards the Hellespont, to observe the motions of the new enemy; and in order to strengthen their own party, they engaged Ptolemy, governor of Egypt, in their interest.

Craterus, one of the greatest of Alexander's captains, had the largest share of the affection and esteem of the Macedonians. Alexander, a little before his death, had ordered him to conduct into Macedonia the 10,000 veteran troops he intended to send thither on account of their age, wounds, or other infirmities, which rendered them incapable of the service. The king had likewise conferred upon him at the same time the government of Macedonia in the room of Antipater, whom he recalled to Babylon. Greece, Macedonia, and Epirus, having been consigned to Craterus and Antipater after the death of Alexander, they governed them in concert, and Craterus always conducted himself like a good and faithful associate; especially in the operations of this war, in which they were unavoidably engaged by the discovery of the designs Perdiccas was forming.

Perdiccas sent Eumenes back to his provinces not only to regulate the state of a fair in that country, but more particularly to keep a watchful eye on the motions of Neoptolemus his next neighbour, who was governor of Armenia; and whose conduct was suspected by Perdiccas, not without sufficient reason, as will be evident in the sequel.

This Neoptolemus was a man remarkable for his strident pride,¹ and the insupportable arrogance he had contracted, from the vain hopes with which he fed his imagination. Eumenes endeavoured to retain him in his duty by reason and gentle measures; and when he saw that the troops of the Macedonian phalanx, who were commanded by Neoptolemus, were grown very insolent and audacious, he made it his care to assemble a body of horse strong enough to oppose their designs, and keep them within the bounds of respect and obedience. With this view he granted all sorts of immunities and exemptions from imposts, to those of the inhabitants who were in a condition to appear on horseback. He likewise purchased a great number of horses, and bestowed them on those of his court in whom he confided the most; and inflamed their courage by the honours and rewards he conferred upon them. He disciplined and habituated them to labour and fatigue by reviews, exercises, and continual movements. Every body was surprised to see him assemble, in so short a time, a body of 6000 horse, capable of good service in the field.

Perdiccas, having caused all his A. M. 3683. troops to file off the next spring to Ant. J. C. 321. wards Cappadocia, held a council with his friends on the operations of the intended war. The subject of their deliberations was, whether they should march first into Macedonia against Antipater and Craterus, or into Egypt against Ptolemy. The majority of voices declared in favour of the last; and it was concluded, at the same time, that Eumenes, with part of the army, should guard the Asiatic provinces against Antipater and Craterus; and, in order to engage him more effectually to espouse the common cause, Perdiccas added the provinces of Caria, Lycia, and Phrygia, to his government. He likewise declared him generalissimo of all the troops in Cappadocia and Armenia, and ordered all the governors to obey him. Perdiccas after this advanced towards Egypt through Damascus and Palestine. He also took the two minor kings with him in this expedition, in order to cover his designs with the royal authority.

Eumenes spared no pains to have a good army on foot,² in order to oppose Antipater and Craterus, who had already passed the Hellespont, and were marching against him. They left nothing unattempted to disengage him from the party he had espoused, and promised him the addition of new provinces to those he already possessed; but he was too steady to be shaken by those offers,³ in breach of his engagements to Perdiccas. They succeeded better with Alcetas and Neoptolemus; for they engaged the former, though the brother of Perdiccas, to observe a neutrality, and the other declared in their favour. Eumenes attacked and defeated the latter at a narrow pass, and even took all his baggage. This victory was owing to his cavalry, whom he had formed with so much care. Neoptolemus escaped with 300 horse, and joined Antipater and Craterus; but the rest of his troops went over to Eumenes.

Antipater entered Cilicia with an intention to advance into Egypt, in order to assist Ptolemy, if his affairs should require his aid; and he detached Craterus and Neoptolemus with the rest of his army against Eumenes, who was then in Cappadocia. A great battle was fought there, the success of which is entirely to be ascribed to the wise and vigilant precaution of Eumenes, which Plutarch justly considers as the masterpiece of a great commander. The reputation of Craterus was very great, and the generality of the Macedonians were desirous of having him for their leader after the death of Alexander, remembering that his affection for them, and his desire to support their interest, had caused him to incur the displeasure of that prince. Neoptolemus had flattered him, that as soon as he should appear in the field, all the Macedonians of the opposite party would list themselves under his banners: and Eumenes himself was very apprehensive of that event. But in order to avoid this misfortune, which would have occasioned his inevitable ruin, he caused the avenues and narrow passes to be so carefully guarded, that his army were entirely ignorant of the enemy against whom he was leading them, as he had caused a report to be spread, that it was only Neoptolemus, who was preparing to attack him a second time. In the dispositions he made for the battle, he was careful not to oppose any Macedonian against Craterus; and issued an order, with very severe penalties, that no herald from the enemy should be received on any account whatever.

The first charge was very violent; the lances were soon shivered on both sides, and the two armies attacked sword in hand. Craterus did not behave unworthy of his master Alexander on this last day of his life, for he killed several of the enemy with his own hand, and frequently bore down all who opposed him; till, at last, a Thracian wounded him in the side, when he fell from his horse. All the enemy's cavalry rode over him without knowing who he was, and did not discover him till he was breathing his last.

As to the other wing, Neoptolemus and Eumenes, who personally hated each other, having met in the battle, and their horses charging with a violent shock, they seized each other; and their horses springing from under them, they both fell on the earth, where they struggled like two implacable wrestlers, and fought for a considerable time with the utmost fury and rage, till at last Neoptolemus received a mortal wound, and immediately expired.

Eumenes then remounted his horse, and pushed on to his left wing, where he believed the enemy's troops still continued unbroken. There, when he was informed that Craterus was killed, he spurred his horse to the place where he lay, and found him expiring. When he beheld this melancholy spectacle, he could not refuse his tears to the death of an ancient friend whom he had always esteemed; and he caused the last honours to be paid him with all possible magnificence. He likewise ordered his bones to be conveyed to Macedonia, in order to be given to his wife and children. Eumenes gained this second victory ten days after the first.

In the mean time Perdiccas had advanced into Egypt,⁴ and began the war with Ptolemy, though with very different success. Ptolemy, from the time he was constituted governor of that country, had conducted himself with so much justice and humanity, that he entirely gained the hearts of all the Egyptians. An infinite number of people, charmed with the lenity of so wise an administration, came thither from Greece and other parts to enter into his service. This additional advantage rendered him extremely powerful; and even the army of Perdiccas had so much esteem for Ptolemy, that they marched with reluctance against him, and great numbers of them deserted daily to his troops. All these circumstances were fatal to the views of Perdiccas, and he lost his life in that country. Having unfortunately taken a resolution to make his army pass an arm of the Nile, which formed an island near Memphis, in passing he lost 2000 men, half of whom were drowned, and the remainder devoured by crocodiles. The Macedonians were exasperated to such a degree of fury, when they saw themselves exposed to such unnecessary dangers, that they mutinied against him; in consequence of which he was abandoned by 100 of his principal officers, of whom Pithon was the most considerable, and was assassinated in his tent with most of his intimate friends.

Two days after this event, the army received intelligence of the victory obtained by Eumenes: and had this account come two days sooner, it would certainly have prevented the mutiny, and consequently the revolution that soon succeeded it, which proved so favourable to Ptolemy and Antipater, and all their adherents.

SECTION IV.—THE REGENCY IS TRANSFERRED TO ANTIPATER. EUMENES BESIEGED AND TAKEN BY PTOLEMY. DEMADES PUT TO DEATH BY CASSANDER. ANTIPATER ON HIS DEATH-BED NOMINATES POLYSPERCHON FOR HIS SUCCESSOR TO THE REGENCY. THE LATTER RECALLS OLYMPIAS. ANTIGONUS RECOVERS VERY POWERFUL.

PTOLEMY passed the Nile the day after the death of Perdiccas,¹ and entered the Macedonian camp; where he justified his own conduct so effectually, that all the troops declared in his favour. When the death of Craterus was known, he so ably took advantage of their affliction and resentment, that he induced them to pass a decree, whereby Eumenes, and fifty other persons of the same party, were declared enemies to the Macedonian state, and this decree authorized Antipater and Antigonus to carry on a war against them. Although this prince perceived the troops had a general inclination to offer him the regency, which was become vacant by the death of Perdiccas, he had the precaution to decline that office, because he was very sensible that the royal pupils had a title without a reality; that they would never be capable of sustaining the weight of that vast empire, nor be in a condition to reunite, under their authority, so many governments accustomed to independency; that there was an inevitable tendency to dismember the whole, as well from the inclinations and interest of the officers, as the situation of affairs; that all his acquisitions in the interim would redound to the advantage of his pupils; that while he appeared to possess the first rank, he should in reality enjoy nothing fixed and solid, or that could any way be considered as his own property; that, upon the expiration of the regency, he should be left without any government or real establishment, and that he should neither be master of an army to support him, nor of any retreat for his preservation: whereas all his colleagues would enjoy the richest provinces in perfect tranquillity, and he be the only one who had not derived any advantages from the common conquests. These considerations induced him to prefer the post he already enjoyed, to the new title that was offered him, as the former was less hazardous, and rendered him less obnoxious to envy: he therefore caused the choice to fall on Pithon and Aridaeus.

The first of these persons had commanded with distinction in all the wars of Alexander, and had embraced the party of Perdiccas, till he was a witness of his imprudent conduct in passing the Nile, which induced him to quit his service, and go over to Ptolemy.

With respect to Aridaeus, history has taken no notice of him before the death of Alexander, when the funeral solemnities of that prince were committed to his care; and we have already seen in what manner he acquitted himself of that melancholy but honourable commission, after he had employed two years in the preparations for it.

The honour of this guardianship did not long continue with them. Eurydice, the consort of king Aridaeus, whom we shall distinguish for the future by the name of Philip, being fond of interfering in all affairs, and being supported in her pretensions by the Macedonians; the two regents were so dissatisfied with their employment, that they voluntarily resigned it, after they had conducted the army back to Triparadis in Syria; and it was then conferred upon Antipater.

As soon as he was invested with his authority, he made a new partition of the provinces of the empire, in which he excluded all those who had espoused the interest of Perdiccas and Eumenes, and re-esta-lished every person of the other party, who ~~had~~ been dispossessed. In this new division of the empire, Seleucus, who had great authority from the command of the cavalry, as we have already intimated, had the government of Babylon, and became afterwards the most powerful of all the successors of Alexander. Pithon had the government of Media, but Atropates, who at that time enjoyed the government of that province, supported himself in one part of the country, and assumed the regal dignity, without acknowledging the authority of the Macedonians and this tract of Media was afterwards called Media Atropatena. Antipater, after this regulation of affairs, sent Antigonus against Eumenes, and then returned into Macedonia; but left his son Cassander behind him, in quality of general of the cavalry, with orders to be near the person of Antigonus, that he might the better be informed of his designs.

Jaddus,² the high-priest of the Jews, died this year, and was succeeded by his son Onias, whose pontificate continued for the space of twenty-one years. I make this remark, because the history of the Jews will, in the sequel of this work, be very much intermixed with that of Alexander's successors.

Antigonus appeared early in the field against Eumenes;³ and a battle was fought at Orcynium in Cappadocia, wherein Eumenes was defeated, and lost 8000 men by the treachery of Apollonides, one of the principal officers of his cavalry; who was corrupted by Antigonus, and marched over to the enemy in the midst of the battle. The traitor was soon punished for his perfidy,⁴ for Eumenes took him, and caused him to be hanged upon the spot.

A conjuncture which happened soon after this defeat,⁵ would have enabled Eumenes to seize the baggage of Antigonus and all his riches, with a great number of prisoners; and his little troop already cast an eager eye on so considerable a booty. But whether his apprehensions that so rich a prey would enervate the courage of his soldiers, who were then constrained to wander from place to place; or whether his regard for Antigonus, with whom he had formerly contracted a particular friendship, prevented him from improving this opportunity; it is certain, that he sent privately a letter to that commander, to inform him of the danger that threatened him; and when he afterwards made a feint to attack the baggage, it was all removed to a place of better security.

Eumenes, after his overthrow, was obliged, for his preservation, to employ most of his time in changing the place of his retreat; and he was highly admired for the tranquillity and steadiness of mind he discovered in the wandering life to which he was reduced; for, as Plutarch observes, adversity alone can place greatness of soul in its full light, and render the real merit of men conspicuous; whereas prosperity frequently casts a veil of false grandeur over real meanness and imperfections. Eumenes, having at last disbanded most of his remaining troops, shut himself up with 500 men, who were determined to share his fate, in the castle of Nora, a place of extraordinary strength on the frontiers of Cappadocia and Lycania, where he sustained a siege of twelve months.

He was soon sensible that nothing incommoded his garrison so much as the small space they possessed being shut up in little close houses, and on a tract of ground whose whole circuit did not exceed 200 fathoms; where they could neither walk nor perform the least exercise, and where their horses, having scarce any room for motion, became sluggish and incapable of service. To remedy this inconvenience he had recourse to the following expedient. He converted the largest house in the place, the extent of which did not exceed twenty-one feet, into a kind of hall for exercise. This he consigned to the men, and ordered them to walk in it very gently at first; they were afterwards to quicken their pace by degrees and at last were to exert the most vigorous motions. The horses he suspended, one after another, in strong slings, which were disposed under their breasts, and from thence inserted into rings fastened to the roof of the stable; after which he caused them to be raised into the air by the aid of pulleys, in such a manner, that only their hinder feet rested on the ground, whilst the hoofs of their fore feet could hardly touch it. In this condition the grooms lashed them severely with their whips, which made the horses bound to such a degree, and struggle so violently to set their fore feet on the ground, that their bodies were all covered with sweat and foam. After this exercise, which was finely calculated to strengthen and keep them in wind, and likewise to render their limbs supple and pliant; their barley was given to them very clean, and winnowed from all the chaff, that they might eat it the sooner, and with less difficulty. The ailities of a good general extend to every thing about him, and are seen in the minutest particulars.

A. M. 3685. The siege, or more properly the blockade of Nora, did not prevent Ant. J. C. 319. Antigonus from undertaking a new expedition into Pisidia, against Al-cetas and Attalus; the last of whom was taken prisoner in a battle, and the other slain by treachery in the place to which he had retired.

During these transactions in Asia, Ptolemy,¹ seeing of what importance Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea were, as well for covering Egypt, as for making proper dispositions from that quarter for the invasion of Cyprus, which he had then in view, determined to make himself master of those provinces, which were governed by Laomedon. With this intention he sent Nicanor into Syria with a body of land forces, while he himself set out with a fleet to attack the coasts. Nicanor defeated Laomedon, and took him prisoner; in consequence of which he soon conquered the inland country. Ptolemy had the same advantages on the coasts, by which means he became absolute master of those provinces. The princes in alliance with him were alarmed at the rapidity of these conquests; but Antipater was at too great a distance, being then in Macedonia; and Antigonus was too much employed against Eumenes, to oppose these great accessions to the power of Ptolemy, who gave them no little jealousy.

After the defeat of Laomedon,² the Jews were the only people who made any resistance. They were duly sensible of the obligation they were under by the oath they had taken to their governor, and were determined to continue faithful to him. Ptolemy advanced into Judea, and formed the siege of Jerusalem. The city was so strong by its advantageous situation, in conjunction with the works of art, that it would have sustained a long siege, had it not been for the religious fear the Jews entertained of violating the law, if they should defend themselves on the sabbath. Ptolemy was not long unacquainted with this particular; and in order to improve the great advantage it gave him, he chose that day for the general assault; and as no individual among the Jews would presume to defend himself, the city was taken without any difficulty.

Ptolemy at first treated Jerusalem and Judea with great severity, for he carried about 100,000 of the inhabitants captives into Egypt; but when he afterwards considered the steadiness with which they had persisted in the fidelity they had sworn to their governors, on this and a variety of other occasions, he was convinced that this quality rendered them more worthy of his confidence; and he accordingly chose 50,000 of the most distinguished among them, who were most capable of serving him, and appointed them to guard the most important places in his dominions.

Much about this time Antipater fell sick in Macedonia.³ The Athenians were greatly dissatisfied with the garrison he had left in their city, and had frequently pressed Phocion to go to the court of that prince, and solicit him to recall those troops; but he always declined that commission, either through a despair of not succeeding, or else because he was conscious that the fear of this garrison was the best expedient for keeping them within the bounds of their duty. Demades, who was not so difficult to be prevailed upon, undertook the commission with pleasure, and immediately set out with his son for Macedonia. But his arrival in that country could not have happened at a more fatal conjuncture for himself. Antipater, as I have already intimated, was seized with a severe illness; and his son Cassander, who was absolute master of all affairs, had lately intercepted a letter which Demades had written to Antigonus in Asia, pressing him to come as soon as possible, and make himself master of Greece and Macedonia. "which," as he expressed himself, "were held together only by a thread, and even an old and rotten thread," ridiculing Antipater by those expressions. As soon as Cassander saw them appear at court, he caused them both to be arrested, and he himself seizing the son first, stabbed him before the face of his father, and at so little distance from him, that he was covered with his blood. After which he reproached him with his perfidy and ingratitude, and when he had loaded him with insults, he killed him also with his own hands, on the dead body of his son. It is impossible not to detest so barbarous a proceeding; but we are not much disposed to pity such a wretch as Demades, who had dictated the decree by which Demosthenes and Hyperides were condemned to die.

The indisposition of Antipater proved fatal to him, and his last attention was employed in filling up the two great stations which he enjoyed. His son Cassander was very desirous of them, and expected to have them conferred upon him; notwithstanding which, Antipater bestowed the regency of the kingdom, and the government of Macedonia, on Polyperchon, the oldest of all the surviving captains of Alexander, and thought it sufficient to associate Cassander with him in those employments.

I am at a loss to determine, whether any instance of human conduct was ever greater, or more to be admired, than this which I have now related in few words; nothing certainly is more uncommon, and history affords us few instances of the same nature. It was necessary to appoint a governor over Macedonia, and a regent of the empire. Antipater, who knew the importance of those stations, was persuaded that his own glory and reputation, and, what was still more prevalent with him, the interest of the state, and the preservation of the Macedonian monarchy, required him to nominate a man of authority, and one respected for his age, experience, and past services. He had a son, who was not void of merit; how rare and difficult therefore, but, at the same time, how amiable and glorious, was it to select, on such an occasion, no man but the most deserving, and best qualified to serve the public effectually; to stifle the voice of nature, turn a deaf ear to all her remonstrances, and not suffer the judgment to be seduced by the impressions of paternal affection; in a word, to continue so much master of one's discernment, as to render justice to the merit of a stranger, and openly prefer it to that of a son, and sacrifice all the interest of one's own family to the public welfare! History has transmitted to us an expression of the Emperor Galba, which will do honour to his memory throughout all ages. "Augustus,"⁴ said he, "chose a successor out of his own family; and I one from the whole empire."

Cassander was extremely enraged at the gross affront, which, as he pretended, had been offered him by this choice, and thought in that respect like the generality of men, who are apt to look upon offices as hereditary, who consider the state as of no consequence in comparison with themselves; never examining what are the duties required by the posts they aspire to, or whether they have competent abilities to discharge them, but considering only whether those posts would be conducive to their fortune. Cassander, not being able to digest his father's preferring a stranger before him, endeavoured to form a party against the new regent. He secured to himself all the strong places he could in his government, as well in Greece as in Macedonia, and proposed nothing less than to divest Polysperchon of the whole.

For this purpose he endeavoured to engage Ptolemy and Antigonus on his side;¹ and they readily espoused it with the same views, from the same motives. It was equally their interest to destroy this new regent, as well as the regency itself, which always kept them in apprehensions, and reminded them of their state of dependency. They likewise imagined, that it secretly reproached them for aspiring at sovereignty, while it cherished the rights of the two pupils; and left the governors in a situation of uncertainty, in consequence of which they were perpetually in fear of being divested of their power. Both the one and the other believed it would be easy for them to succeed in their designs, if the Macedonians were once engaged at home in a civil war.

The death of Antipater had rendered Antigonus the most powerful of all the captains of Alexander. His authority was absolute in all the provinces of Asia Minor, with the title of generalissimo, and an army of 70,000 men and thirty elephants, which no power in the empire was, at that time, capable of resisting. It cannot, therefore, be thought surprising, that this superiority should inspire him with the design of engrossing the whole monarchy, and, in order to succeed in that attempt, he began with making a reformation in all the governments of the provinces within his jurisdiction, displacing all those persons whom he suspected, and substituting his creatures in their room. In the conduct of this scheme, he removed Arideus from the government of Lesser Phrygia, and the Hellespont, and Clitus from that of Lydia.

Polysperchon² neglected nothing, on his part, that was necessary to strengthen his interest; and thought it advisable to recall Olympias, who had retired into Epirus under the regency of Antipater, with the offer of sharing his authority with her. This princess despatched a courier to Eumenes, to consult him on the proposals she had received; and he advised her to wait some time, in order to see what turn affairs would take: adding, that if she determined to return to Macedonia, he would recommend it to her in particular, to forget all the injuries she thought she had received: that it would also be her interest to govern with moderation, and to make others sensible of her authority by benefactions, and not by severity. As to all other particulars, he promised an inviolable attachment to herself and the royal family. Olympias did not conform to these judicious counsels in any respect, but set out as soon as possible for Macedonia; where, upon her arrival, she consulted nothing but her passions, and her insatiable desire of dominion and revenge.

Polysperchon, who had many enemies upon his hands, endeavoured to secure Greece, of which he foresaw Cassander would attempt to make himself master. He also took measures with relation to other parts of the empire, as will appear by the sequel.

In order to engage the Greeks in his interest,³ he issued a decree, by which he recalled the exiles, and reinstated all the cities in their ancient privileges. He acquainted the Athenians in particular by letters, that the king had re-established their democracy and ancient form of government, by which the Athenians were admitted without distinction into public offices. This was a strain of policy calculated to ensnare Phocion; for Polysperchon intending to make himself master of Athens, as was evident in a short time, despaired of succeeding in that design, unless he could find some expedient to procure the banishment of Phocion, who had favoured and introduced oligarchy under Antipater; and he had, therefore, no doubt that he would be immediately banished, as soon as those, who had been excluded from the government, should be reinstated in their ancient rights.

EUMENES QUITS NORA. VARIOUS EXPEDITIONS OF ANTIGONUS, SELEUCUS, PTOLEMY AND OTHER GENERALS AGAINST HIM. OLYMPIAS CAUSES ARIDEUS TO BE SLAIN, AND IS MURDERED IN HER TURN BY THE ORDERS OF CASSANDER. THE WAR BETWEEN HIM AND POLYSPERCHON. THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF THEBES. EUMENES IS BETRAYED BY HIS OWN TROOPS, DELIVERED UP TO ANTIGONUS, AND PUT TO DEATH.

CASSANDER,⁴ before the death of Antipater was known at Athens, had sent Nicanor thither, to succeed Menyllus in the government of the fortress of Munychia, soon after which he had made himself master of the Piræus. Phocion, who placed too much confidence in the probity and fidelity of Nicanor, had contracted a strict intimacy, and conversed frequently with him, which caused the people to suspect him more than ever.

In this conjuncture, Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, arrived with a great body of troops, under pretext of succouring the city against Nicanor, but in reality to seize it himself, if possible, by taking advantage of the divisions which then reigned within it. A tumultuous assembly was convened, in which Phocion was divested of his employment; while Demetrius Phalereus, with several other citizens, who were apprehensive of the same fate, immediately retired from the city. Phocion, who had the grief to see himself accused of treason, took sanctuary with Polysperchon, who sent him back to be tried by the people. An assembly was immediately convoked, from which neither slaves, foreigners, nor any in famous persons whatever, were excluded, although this proceeding was contrary to all the established rules. Phocion and the other prisoners were presented to the people. Most persons of any merit in the assembly, cast down their eyes to the earth at this spectacle, and covering their heads, wept abundantly. One among them having the courage to move, that the slaves and foreigners might be ordered to withdraw, was immediately opposed by the populace, who cried out that they ought rather to stone those advocates for oligarchy, and enemies of the people. Phocion frequently attempted to plead his own cause, and vindicate his conduct, but was always interrupted. It was customary at Athens, for the person accused to declare, before sentence passed against him, what punishment he ought to suffer. Phocion answered aloud, that he condemned himself to die, but desired the assembly to spare the rest. Upon this, the suffrages were demanded, and they were unanimously sentenced to suffer death previous to which they were conveyed to the dun geon. Demetrius Phalereus, and some others, though absent, were included in the same condemnation. The companions of Phocion were so affected by the sorrow of their relations and friends, who came to embrace them in the streets, with the melancholy tender of the last farewell, that they proceeded on their way, lamenting their unhappy fate in a flood of tears: but Phocion still retained the same air and countenance as he had formerly shown when he quitted the assembly to take upon him the command of armies, and when the Athenians attended him in crowds to his own house with the voice of praises and acclamations.

One of the populace, more insolent than the rest, advanced up to him, and spat in his face. Phocion only turned to the magistrates, and said, "Will no body hinder this man from acting so unworthily?" When he arrived at the prison, one of his friends having asked him if he had any message to send to his son? "Yes, certainly," replied he, "it is to desire that he would never remember the injustice o the Athenians." When he had uttered these words, he took the hem ock, and died.

On that day was also a public procession; and as it passed before the prison, some of the persons who composed it took their crowns from their heads: others turned their eyes to the gates of the prison, and burst into tears; and all who had any remains of humanity and religion, and whose souls were not entirely depraved and blinded by rage or envy, acknowledged it to be an instance of unnatural barbarity, as well as a great impiety, with regard to the city, not to have abstained, on such a solemn day, from the infliction of death on a citizen so universally esteemed, and whose admirable virtues had procured him the appellation of The Good.¹

To punish the greatest virtues as the most flagitious crimes,² and to repay the best of services with the most inhuman treatment, is an offence worthy of condemnation in all places, but especially in Athens, where ingratitude was punishable by the law. The regulations of her sage legislator still subsisted at that time, but they were wrested to the condemnation of her citizens, and only became an evidence, how much that people were degenerated in their manners.

The enemies of Phocion, not satisfied with the punishment they had caused him to suffer, and fancying that something more was still wanting to complete their triumph, obtained an order from the people, that his body should be carried out of the territory of Attica, and that none of the Athenians should furnish fire to honour his funeral pile: these last offences were, therefore, rendered to him in the territories of Megara. A lady of the country, who accidentally assisted at his funeral with her servants, caused a cenotaph, or vacant tomb, to be erected to his memory on the same spot; over which she made the customary libations; and collecting into her robe the bones of that great man, which she had carefully gathered up, she conveyed them into her house by night, and buried them under her hearth, with these expressions: "Dear and sacred hearth, I here confide to thee, and deposit in thy bosom, these precious remains of a worthy man. Preserve them with fidelity, in order to restore them hereafter to the monument of his ancestors, when the Athenians shall become wiser than they are at present."

Though it may possibly be thought, that a variety of irregular, tumultuous, unjust, and cruel sentences, denounced in Athens against virtuous citizens at different times, might have prepared us for this last; it will, however, be always thought surprising, that a whole people, of whom one naturally conceives a noble idea, after such a series of great actions, should be capable of such a strange perversity. But it ought to be remembered, that the dregs of a vile populace, entirely void of honour, probity, and morals, predominated at that time at Athens. And there is sufficient foundation for the sentiments of Plato and Plutarch, who declare, that the people, when they are either destitute of guides, or no longer listen to their admonitions; and when they have thrown off the reins by which they once were checked, and are entirely abandoned to their impetuosity and caprice; ought to be considered as a blind, furious, intractable, and blood-thirsty monster, ready to launch in a moment into the most fatal and opposite extremes, and infinitely more formidable than the most inhuman tyrants. What can be expected from such a tribunal? When people resolve to be guided by nothing but mere passion; to have no regard to decorum, and to run headlong into an open violation of all laws; the best, the justest, and most innocent of mankind, will sink under an implacable and prevailing cabal. This Socrates experienced almost a hundred years before Phocion perished by the same fate.

This last was one of the greatest men that Greece ever produced, in whose person every kind of merit was united. He had been educated in the school of Plato and Xenocrates, and formed his manners upon the most perfect plan of Pagan virtue, to which his conduct was always conformable.

It would be difficult for any person to carry disinterestedness higher than this extraordinary man; which appeared from the extreme poverty in which he died, after the many great offices he had filled. How many opportunities of acquiring riches has a general always at the head of armies, who acts against rich and opulent enemies; sometimes in countries abounding with all things, and which seem to invite the plunderer! But Phocion would have thought it infamous, had he returned from his campaigns laden with any acquisition, but the glory of his exalted actions, and the grateful benedictions of the people he had spared.

This excellent person, amidst all the severity which rendered him in some measure intractable, when the interests of the republic were concerned, had so much natural softness and humanity, that his enemies themselves always found him disposed to assist them. It might even have been said, that he was a composition of two natures, whose qualities were entirely opposite to each other in appearance. When he acted as a public man, he armed himself with fortitude, and steadiness, and zeal; he could sometimes assume even the air of a rigid indignation, and was inflexible in supporting discipline in its utmost strictness. If, on the other hand, he appeared in a private capacity, his conduct was a perpetual display of mildness and affability, condescension and patience, and was graced with all the virtues that can render the commerce of life agreeable. It was no inconsiderable merit, and especially in a military man, to be capable of uniting two such different characters in such a manner, that as the severity which was necessary for the preservation of good order, was never seen to degenerate into the rigour that creates aversion, so the gentleness and complacency of his disposition never sunk into that softness and indifference which occasions contempt.

He has been greatly applauded for reforming the modern custom of his country, which made war and politics two different professions; and also for restoring the manner of governing which Pericles and Aristides adopted, by uniting each of those talents in himself.

As he was persuaded that eloquence was essential to a statesman, especially in a republican government, he applied himself to the attainment of it with great assiduity and success. His was concise, solid, full of force and sense, always keeping close to the point in question. He thought it beneath a statesman to use a poignant and satiric style, and his only answer to those who employed such language against him, was silence and patience. An orator having once interrupted him with many injurious expressions,³ he suffered him to continue in that strain as long as he pleased, and then resumed his own discourse with as much coolness as if he had heard nothing.

It was highly glorious for Phocion, that he was forty-five times elected general by a people to whose caprice he was so little inclinable to accommodate his conduct; and it is remarkable that these elections always happened when he was absent, without any previous solicitations on his part. His wife was sufficiently sensible how much this redounded to his glory; and one day when an Ionian lady of considerable rank, who lodged in her house, showed her with an air of ostentation and pleasure, her ornaments of gold, with a variety of jewels and bracelets, she answered her with a modest tone, "For my part, I have no ornament but Phocion, who for these twenty years has always been elected general of the Athenians."

His regular and frugal life contributed not a little to the vigorous and healthy old age he enjoyed.

Val. Max. l. v. c. 3.

When he was in his eightieth year, he commanded the forces, and sustained all the fatigues of war, with the vivacity of a young officer.

One of the great principles in the politics of Phocion was, that peace ought always to be the aim of every wise government, and with this view he was a constant opposer of all wars that were either imprudent or unnecessary. He was even apprehensive of those that were most just and expedient; because he was sensible, that every war weakened and impoverished a state, even amidst a series of the greatest victories, and that whatever the advantage might be at the commencement of it, there was never any certainty of terminating it, without experiencing the most tragical vicissitudes of fortune.

The interest of the public never gave way to him to any domestic views; he constantly refused to solicit, or set in favour of his son-in-law, Charicles, who was summoned before the republic, to account for the sums he had received from Harpalus; and he then addressed himself to him with this admirable expression—"I have made you my son-in-law, but only for what is honest and honourable." It must indeed be acknowledged, that men of this character seem very unaccommodating and insupportable in the common transactions of life: they are always starting difficulties,¹ when any affair is proposed to them; and never perform any good offices with entire ease and grace. They must always deliberate, whether what is requested of them be just or not. Their friends and relations have as little influence over them as utter strangers; and they always oppose, either their conscience, or some particular duties to ancient friendship, affinity, or the interest of their families. To this height of delicacy did Phocion carry the Pagan propriety.

One may justly apply to him what Tacitus said of a celebrated Roman, I mean Helvidius Priscus.² Phocion, who had as solid a genius as that person, applied himself at first to philosophy, not to cover his indolence with the pompous title of a sage, but to qualify himself for entering upon the conduct of affairs with more vigour and resolution against all unexpected accidents. He concurred in opinion with those who acknowledge no other good or evil than virtue and vice, and who rank all externals, as fortune, power, nobility, in the class of indifferent things. He was a firm friend, a tender husband, a good senator, a worthy citizen, and discharged all the offices of civil life with equal integrity. He preserved a steadiness of mind in prosperity that resembled stiffness and severity, and despised death as much as riches.

These are part of the great qualities of Phocion, who merited a happier end; and they were placed in their most amiable light by his death. The constancy of mind, the mildness of disposition, and the forgetfulness of wrongs, conspicuous in his conduct on that occasion, are above all his other praises, and infinitely enhance their lustre, especially as we shall see nothing comparable to him from henceforth in the Grecian history.

His infatuated and ungrateful country was not sensible of their unworthy proceeding till some time after his death. The Athenians then erected a statue of brass to his memory, and honourably interred his bones at the public expense. His accusers also suffered a punishment suitable to their desert; but did not his judges themselves deserve to be treated with greater severity? They punished their own crime in others, and thought themselves acquitted by erecting a brazen statue. They were even ready to relapse into the same injustice against others who were equally innocent, whom they condemned during their lives, and had never the equity to acquit till after their death.

Cassander was careful to take advantage of the disorder that reigned in Athens,³ and entered the Piræus with a fleet of thirty-five vessels, which he had received from Antigonus. The Athenians, when they beheld themselves destitute of all succours, unanimously resolved to send deputies to Cassander, in order to know the conditions on which they might obtain a peace; and it was mutually agreed that the Athenians should continue masters of the city, with its territories, and likewise of the revenues and ships. But it was stipulated that the citadel should remain in the power of Cassander, till he had ended the war with the kings. And as to what related to the affairs of the republic, it was agreed that those whose income amounted to ten mine, or a thousand drachmæ, should have a share in the government, which was a less sum by half than that which was the qualification for public employments, when Antipater made himself master of Athens. In a word, the inhabitants permitted Cassander to choose what citizen he pleased to govern the republic; and Demetrius Phalereus was elected to that dignity about the close of the third year of the 115th Olympiad. The ten years' government, therefore, which Diodorus and Diogenes have assigned Demetrius, is to be computed from the beginning of the following year.

He governed the republic in peace: constantly treated his fellow-citizens with mildness and humanity; and historians acknowledge that the government was never better regulated than under Cassander. This prince seemed inclinable to tyranny; but the Athenians were not sensible of its effects. And though Demetrius, whom he had constituted chief of the republic, was invested with a kind of sovereign power; yet instead of abolishing the democracy, he may rather be said to have re-established it. He acted in such a manner, that the people scarce perceived that he was master. As he united in his person the politician and the man of letters; his soft and persuasive eloquence demonstrated the truth of an expression he frequently used, that discourse had as much power in a government as arms in war. His abilities in political affairs were equally conspicuous;⁴ for he drew forth speculative philosophy from the shade and inactivity of the schools, exhibited her in full light, and knew how to familiarize her precepts with the most tumultuous affairs. It would have been difficult, therefore, to have found a person capable of excelling like him at the same time, in the art of government, and in the study of the sciences.

He acquired, during these ten years of his government, that reputation which has caused him to be considered as one of the greatest men Athens has produced. He augmented the revenues of the republic, and adorned the city with noble structures; he was likewise industrious to diminish luxury, and all expenses calculated only for ostentation. For which reason he disapproved of those that were laid out on theatres,⁵ porticoes, and new temples, and openly censured Pericles, for having bestowed such a prodigious sum of money on the magnificent porticoes of the temple of Pallas, called Propylæa. But in all public feasts which had been consecrated by antiquity, or when the people were inclinable to be expensive in the celebration of any sacred solemnities, he permitted them to use their riches as they pleased.

The expense was excessive at the death of great persons,¹ and their sepulchres were as sumptuous and magnificent as those of the Romans in the age of Cicero. Demetrius made a law to abolish this abuse, which had passed into a custom, and inflicted penalties on those who disobeyed it. He also ordered the ceremonies of funerals to be performed by night, and none were permitted to place any other ornaments on tombs, than a column three cubits high, or a plain tablet, mensæ; and appointed a particular magistrate to enforce the observation of this law.

He likewise made laws for the regulation of manners,² and commanded young persons to testify respect to their parents at home; and in the city to those whom they met in their way, and to themselves when they were alone.

The poor citizens were likewise the objects of his attention.³ There were at that time in Athens some of the descendants of Aristides, that Athenian general, who, after he had possessed the greatest offices in the state, and governed the affairs of the treasury for a very considerable time, died so poor, that the public was obliged to defray the charges of his funeral. Demetrius took care of those descendants who were poor, and assigned them a daily sum for their subsistence.

Such, says Ælian,⁴ was the government of Demetrius Phalereus, till the spirit of envy, so natural to the Athenians, obliged him to quit the city, in the manner we shall soon relate.

The advantageous testimonials rendered him by ancient authors of the greatest repute, not only with respect to his extraordinary talents and ability in the art of government, but likewise to his virtue, and the wisdom of his conduct, furnish a full refutation of all that has been advanced by Athenæus, on the authority of the historian Duris, with relation to the irregularity of his deportment; and strengthens the conjecture of Mr. Bonamy, who supposes that Duris, or Athenæus, has imputed that to Demetrius Phalereus, which related only to Demetrius Poliorcetes, the son of Antigonus, to whom Ælian ascribes the very particulars which Athenæus had cited from Duris. The reader may have recourse to the dissertation of Mr. Bonamy,⁵ which has been very useful to me in the course of this work.

During the 115th Olympiad,⁶ Demetrius Phalereus caused the inhabitants of Attica to be numbered, and they amounted to 21,000 citizens,⁷ 10,000 strangers,⁸ and 40,000⁹ domestics.¹⁰

We now return to Polysperchon.¹¹ When he had received intelligence that Cassander had made himself master of Athens, he immediately hastened to besiege him in that city; but as the siege took up a great length of time, he left part of his troops before the place, and advanced with the rest into Peloponnesus, to force the city of Megalopolis to surrender. The inhabitants made a long and vigorous defence, which compelled Polysperchon to employ his attention and forces on those quarters to which he was called by more pressing necessities. He despatched Clitus to the Hellespont, with orders to prevent the enemy's troops from passing out of Asia into Europe. Nicanor set sail, at the same time, from the port of Athens, in order to attack him, but was himself defeated near Byzantium. Antigonus having advanced in a very seasonable juncture, made himself amends for this loss, beat Clitus, and took all his fleet, except the vessel which Clitus was aboard, which escaped with great difficulty.

Antigonus was most embarrassed in his endeavours to reduce Eumenes,¹² whose valour, wisdom, and great ability in the art of war, were more formidable to him than all the rest, though he had besieged and blocked him up for twelve months in the castle of Nora. He therefore made a second attempt to engage him in his interest, for he had taken measures to that effect before he formed that siege. He accordingly consigned this commission to Jerom of Cardia his countryman, and a famous historian of that time,¹³ who was authorized by him to make overtures of accommodation to his adversary. Eumenes conducted this negotiation with so much dexterity and address that he extricated himself from the siege at the very juncture wherein he was reduced to the last extremities, and without entering into any particular engagements with Antigonus. For the latter having inserted in the oath which Eumenes was to swear in consequence of this accommodation, that he would consider all those as his friends and enemies, who should prove such to Antigonus; Eumenes changed that article, and swore that he would regard all those as his friends and enemies, who should be such to Olympias and the kings, as well as to Antigonus. He consented that the Macedonians who assisted at the siege, should determine which of these two forms was best; and as they were guided by their affection for the royal family, they declared, without the least hesitation, for the form drawn up by Eumenes; upon which he swore to it, and the siege was immediately raised.

When Antigonus was informed of the manner in which this affair was concluded, he was so dissatisfied with it, that he refused to ratify the treaty, and gave orders for the siege to be instantly renewed. These orders, however, came too late, for as soon as Eumenes saw the enemy's forces were withdrawn from before the place, he quitted it without delay, with the remains of his troops, which amounted to 500 men, and retired to Cappadocia, where he immediately assembled 2000 of his veteran soldiers, and made all the necessary preparations for sustaining the war, which he foresaw would soon be revived against him.

The revolt of Antigonus from the kings having occasioned a great alarm, Polysperchon the regent despatched to Eumenes, in the name of the kings, a commission by which he was constituted captain-general of Asia Minor; orders were likewise sent to Teutames and Antigænes, colonels of the Argyraspides, to join, and serve under him, against Antigonus. The necessary orders were also transmitted to those who had the care of the king's treasures, to pay him 500 talents, for the re-establishment of his own affairs, and likewise to furnish him with all the sums that would be necessary to defray the expenses of the war. All these were accompanied with letters from Olympias to the same purport.

Eumenes was very sensible that the accumulation of all these honours on the head of a foreigner,¹⁴ Ant. J. C. 318. would infallibly excite a violent envy against him, and render him odious to the Macedonians: but as he was incapable of acting to any effect without them, and since the good of the service itself made it necessary for him to employ all his efforts to gain them, he began with refusing the sums which were granted him for his own use, declaring that he had no occasion for them, because he was not intent on any particular advantage of his own, nor on any enterprise of that tendency. He was studious to treat every person about him, the officers, and even the soldiers, with an obliging civility, in order to extinguish, as much as possible, or at least to weaken, by an engaging conduct, the jealousy to which his condition, as a foreigner, afforded a plausible pretext, though he endeavoured not to draw it upon himself by any conduct of his own.

But an impediment, still more invincible in appearance, threw him under a restraint, and created him very cruel anxiety. Antigænes and Teutames, who commanded the Argyraspides, thought it dishonourable ble to their nation to submit to a foreigner, and refused to attend him in council. On the other hand, he could not, without derogating from the prerogatives of his post, comply with them in that point, and consent to his own degradation. An ingenious fiction disengaged him from this perplexity; and he had recourse to the aids of religion, or rather superstition, which has always a powerful influence over the minds of men, and seldom fails to take effect. He assured them, "That Alexander, arrayed in his royal robes, had appeared to him in his slumber, and shown him a magnificent tent, in which a throne was erected, and that the monarch declared to him, that while they held their councils in that tent, to deliberate on their affairs, he himself would be always present, seated on that throne; from whence he would issue his orders to his captains, and that he would conduct them in the execution of all their designs and enterprises, provided they would always address themselves to him." This discourse was sufficient, and the minds of all who heard it were wrought upon by the profound respect they entertained for the memory of that prince: in consequence of which they immediately ordered a splendid tent to be erected, and a throne placed in it, which was to be called the throne of Alexander; and on it were to be laid his diadem and crown, with his sceptre and arms; that all the chiefs should resort thither every morning to offer sacrifices; that their consultations should be held near the throne, and that all orders should be received in the name of the king, as if he were still living, and taking care of his kingdom. Eumenes calmed the dispute by this expedient, which met with unanimous approbation. No one raised himself above the others; but each competitor continued in the enjoyment of his privileges, till new events decided them in a more positive manner.

As Eumenes was sufficiently supplied with money, he soon raised a very considerable body of troops, and had an army of 20,000 men in the spring. These forces, with Eumenes at their head, were sufficient to spread terror among his enemies. Ptolemy sailed to the coasts of Cilicia, and employed all sorts of expedients to corrupt the Argyraspides. Antigonus, on his part, made the same attempts by the emissaries he had in his camp; but neither the one nor the other could then succeed; so much had Eumenes gained upon the minds of his soldiers, and so great was the confidence they reposed in him.

He advanced, with these troops, thus favourably disposed, into Syria and Phœnicia, to recover those provinces which Ptolemy had seized with the greatest injustice. The maritime force of Phœnicia, in conjunction with the fleet, which the regent had already procured, would have rendered them absolute masters by sea, and they might likewise have been capable of transmitting all necessary succours to each other. Could Eumenes have succeeded in this design, it would have been a decisive blow; but the fleet of Polysperchon having been entirely destroyed by the misconduct of Clitus, who commanded it, that misfortune rendered his project ineffectual. Antigonus, who had defeated him, marched by land, immediately after that victory, against Eumenes, with an army much more numerous than his own. Eumenes made a prudent retreat through Cœle-syria, passed the Euphrates, and took up his winter-quarters at Carrhæ, in Mesopotamia.

During his continuance in those parts,¹ he sent to Pithon, governor of Media, and to Seleucus, governor of Babylon, to press them to join him with their forces against Antigonus, and caused the orders of the kings to be shown them, by which they were enjoined to comply with his demand. They answered, that they were ready to assist those monarchs; but that, as to himself, they would have no transactions with a man who had been declared a public enemy by the Macedonians. This was only a pretext, and they were actuated by a much more prevalent motive. If they had acknowledged the authority of Eumenes, and had obeyed him by advancing to him, and subjecting their troops to his command, they must also have acknowledged the sovereign power of the regent, as well as of those who were masters of the royal pupils, and made use of their name, to render their own power more extensive. Pithon and Seleucus, must, therefore, by inevitable consequence, have owned that they held their governments only from those kings, and might be divested of them at their pleasure by the first order which might be issued to that effect; and this would have destroyed all their ambitious pretences with a single stroke.

Most of the officers of Alexander, who had shared the governments of the empire among themselves after his death, were solicitous to secure to themselves the supreme power in their several provinces for which reason they had chosen a person of a mean capacity, and an infant, on whom they conferred the title of sovereign, in order to have sufficient time to establish their usurpations under so weak a government. But all these measures would have been disconcerted, if they had allowed Eumenes an ascendancy over them, with such an air of superiority as subjected them to his orders. He issued them, indeed, in the name of the kings; but this was a circumstance they were desirous of evading, and this it was that created him so many enemies and obstructions. They were also apprehensive of the merit and superior genius of Eumenes, who was capable of the greatest and most difficult enterprises. It is certain that of all the captains of Alexander, he had the greatest share of wisdom and bravery, and was also the most steady in his resolutions, and the most faithful in his engagements; for he never violated those which he had made with any of those commanders, though they did not observe the same fidelity with respect to him.

Eumenes marched in the direction of Babylonia the following spring, and was in danger of losing his army by a stratagem of Seleucus. The troops were encamped in a plain near the Euphrates; and Seleucus, by cutting the banks of that river, laid all the neighbouring country under water. Eumenes, however, was so expeditious as to gain an eminence with his troops, and found means, the next day, to drain off the inundation so effectually, that he pursued his march almost without sustaining any loss.

Seleucus was then reduced to the necessity of making a truce with him,² and of granting him a peaceable passage through the territories of his province, in order to arrive at Susa, where he disposed his troops into quarters of refreshment while he solicited all the governors of the provinces in Upper Asia for succours. He had before notified to them the order of the kings; and those whom he had charged with that commission, found them all assembled, at the close of a war they had undertaken in concert against Pithon the governor of Media. This Pithon having pursued the very same measures in the Upper Asia, which Antigonus had formed in the Lower, had caused Philotas to be put to death, and made himself master of his government. He would likewise have attempted to treat the rest in the same manner, if they had not opposed him by this confederacy, which the common interest had formed against him. Peucestes, governor of the province of Persia, had the command in chief conferred upon him, and defeated Pithon, drove him out of Media, and obliged him to go to Babylon to implore the protection of Seleucus. All the confederates were still in the camp after this victory, when the deputies from Eumenes arrived and they immediately marched from Susa to join him; not that they were really devoted to the royal party, but because they were more apprehensive than ever of being subjected to the victorious Antigonus, who was then at the head of a powerful army, and either divested of their employments all such governors as he suspected, or reduced them to the state of mere officers, liable to be removed and punished at his pleasure.

They joined Eumenes, therefore, with all their forces, which composed an army of above 25,000 men. With this reinforcement he saw himself not only in a condition to oppose Antigonus, who was then advancing to him, but even much superior in the number of his troops. The season was too far advanced when Antigonus arrived at the banks of the Tigris, and was obliged to take winter-quarters in Mesopotamia; where, with Seleucus and Pithon, who were then of his party, he concerted measures for the operations of the next campaign.

During these transactions,¹ Macedonia was the scene of a great revolution. Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, whom Polysperchon had recalled, had made herself mistress of affairs, and caused Aridaeus, or Philip, who had enjoyed the title of king for six years and four months, to be put to death. Eurydice his consort shared the same fate; for Olympias sent her a dagger, a cord, and a bowl of poison, and only allowed her the liberty of choosing her death. She accordingly gave the preference to the cord, and then strangled herself, after she had uttered a thousand imprecations against her enemy and murderess. Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, and a hundred of the principal friends of this latter, likewise suffered death.

These repeated barbarities did not long remain unpunished. Olympias had retired to Pydna with the young king Alexander, and his mother Roxana, with Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander the Great, and Deidamia, the daughter of Æacides, king of Epirus, and sister of Pyrrhus. Cassander did not lose any time, but besieged them by sea and land. Æacides prepared to assist the princesses, and was already upon his march; but the greatest part of his forces, who were averse to that expedition, revolted from the king, and condemned him to banishment when they returned to Epirus. They likewise massacred all his friends; and Pyrrhus the son of Æacides, who was then but an infant, would have suffered the same fate, if a set of faithful domestics had not happily withdrawn him from their rage. Epirus then declared in favour of Cassander, who sent Lyciscus thither to take upon him the government in his name. Olympias had then no resource but in Polysperchon alone, who was then in Pherrhœbia, a small province on the confines of Ætolia, and was preparing to succour her; but Cassander sent Callas, one of his generals, against him, who corrupted the greatest part of his troops, and obliged him to retire into Naxia, a city of Pherrhœbia, where he besieged him. Olympias, who had supported all the miseries of famine with an invincible courage, having now lost all hopes of relief, was compelled to surrender at discretion.

Cassander, in order to destroy her in a manner that might give the least offence, prompted the relations of the principal officers, whom Olympias had caused to be slain during her regency, to accuse her in the assembly of the Macedonians, and to sue for vengeance for the cruelties she had committed. The request of all these persons was granted; and when they had all been heard, she was condemned to die, though absent, and no one interposed his good offices in her defence. After sentence of death had thus passed, Cassander proposed to her, by some friends, to retire to Athens, promising to accommodate her with a galley to convey her thither, whenever she should be so disposed. His intention was to destroy her in the passage by sea, and to publish through all Macedonia that the gods, amidst their displeasure at her horrible cruelties, had abandoned her to the mercy of the waves; for he was apprehensive of a retaliation from the Macedonians, and was, therefore, desirous of casting upon Providence all the odious circumstances of his own perfidy.

Olympias, whether she had been advertised of Cassander's design, or whether she was actuated by sentiments of grandeur, so natural to persons of her rank, imagined her presence alone would calm the storm, and answered with an imperious air, that she was not a woman who would have recourse to flight, and insisted on pleading her own cause in the public assembly; adding, this was the least favour that could be granted a queen, or rather that it was an act of justice, which could not be refused to persons of the lowest rank. Cassander had no inclination to consent to this demand, having reason to be apprehensive that the remembrance of Philip and Alexander, for whom the Macedonians retained the utmost veneration, would create a sudden change in their resolutions; he, therefore sent 200 soldiers, entirely devoted to his will, with orders to destroy her; but resolute as they were, they were incapable of supporting the air of majesty which appeared in the eyes and aspect of that princess; and retired without executing their commission. It became necessary, therefore, to employ in this murder, the relations of those whom she had caused to suffer death; and they were transported at the opportunity of gratifying their own vengeance, and at the same time making their court to Cassander. Thus perished the famous Olympias, the daughter, the sister, the wife, and mother of kings, who really merited so tragical a period of her days, in consequence of all her crimes and cruelties; but whom it is impossible to see perish in this manner, without detesting the wickedness of a prince who deprived her of life in so unworthy a manner.

Cassander already beheld an assured passage to the Macedonian throne opened to his ambition,² but he thought it incumbent on him to have recourse to other measures, in order to secure himself against the vicissitudes of time, the inconstancy of the Macedonians, and the jealousy of his competitors. Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander the Great, being qualified by her illustrious birth, and authority in Macedonia, to conciliate to him the friendship of the grandees and people of that kingdom, he hoped, by espousing her, to attach them in a peculiar manner to himself, in consequence of the esteem and respect he should testify for the royal family.

There was still one obstacle more to be surmounted, without which Cassander would have always been deemed an usurper and a tyrant. The young prince Alexander, the son of Alexander the Great, by Roxana, was still living, and had been acknowledged king, and the lawful heir to the throne. It became necessary, therefore, to remove this prince and his mother out of the way. Cassander,³ emboldened by the success of his former crime, was determined to commit a second, from whence he expected to derive all the fruits of his hopes. Prudence, however, made it necessary for him to sound the disposition of the Macedonians, with respect to the death of Olympias; for if they showed themselves insensible of the loss of that princess, he might be certain that the death of the young king and his mother would affect them as little. He, therefore, judged it expedient to proceed with caution, and advanced by moderate steps, to the execution of his scheme. He began with causing Alexander and Roxana to be conducted to the castle of Amphipolis, by a strong escort, commanded by Glaucias, an officer entirely devoted to his interest. When they arrived at that fortress, they were divested of all regal honours, and treated rather like private persons, whom important motives of state made it necessary to secure.

He intended, by his next step, to make it evident that he claimed the sovereign power in Macedonia. With this view, and in order to render the memory of Olympias still more odious, he gave orders for performing with great magnificence the funeral obsequies of king Philip, or Aridaeus, and queen Eurydice his wife, who had been murdered by the directions of Olympias. He commanded such mourning to be used as was customary in solemnities of that nature, and caused the bodies to be deposited in the tombs appropriated to the sepulture of the Macedonian kings; affecting by these exteriors of dissembled sorrow to manifest his zeal for the royal family, at the same time that he was meditating the destruction of the young king.

Polysperchon, in consequence of the information he received of the death of Olympias, and the measures which Cassander was adopting in order to raise himself to the throne of Macedonia, had sheltered himself in Naxia, a city of Perrhebia, where he had sustained a siege, and from whence he retreated with a very inconsiderable body of troops to pass into Thessaly, in order to join some forces of Æacides; after which he advanced into Ætolia, where he was greatly respected. Cassander followed him closely, and marched his army into Bœotia, where the ancient inhabitants of Thebes were seen wandering from place to place, without any fixed habitation or retreat. He was touched with the calamitous condition of that city, which was once so powerful, and had been razed to its very foundations by the command of Alexander. After a period of twenty years, he endeavoured to reinstate it in its primitive splendour; the Athenians offered to rebuild part of the walls at their own expense, and several towns and cities of Magna Græcia, Italy, Sicily, and Greece Proper, bestowed considerable sums on that occasion by voluntary contributions. By which means, Thebes, in a short space of time, recovered its ancient opulence, and became even richer than ever, by the care and magnificence of Cassander, who was justly considered as the father and restorer of that city.

Cassander, after he had given proper orders for the re-establishment of Thebes, advanced into Peloponnesus, against Alexander, the son of Polysperchop, and marched directly to Argos, which surrendered without resistance; upon which all the cities of the Messenians, except Ithome, followed that example. Alexander, terrified at the rapidity of his conquests, endeavoured to check them by a battle; but Cassander, who was much inferior to him in troops, was unwilling to hazard a battle, and thought it more advisable to retire into Macedonia, after he had left good garrisons in the places he had taken.

As he knew the merit of Alexander,¹ he endeavoured to disengage him from the party of Antigonius, and attach him to his own, by offering him the government of all Peloponnesus, with the command of the troops stationed in that country. An offer so advantageous was accepted by Alexander without any hesitation; but he did not long enjoy it, being unfortunately slain soon after by some citizens of Sicyon, where he then resided, who had combined to destroy him. This conspiracy, however, did not produce the effects expected from it; for Cratesipolis, the wife of Alexander, whose heart was a composition of grandeur and fortitude, instead of manifesting any consternation at the sight of this fatal accident, as she was beloved by the soldiers and honoured by the officers, whom she had always obliged and served, assumed the command of the troops, repressed the insolence of the Sicyonians and defeated them in a battle; after which she caused thirty of the most mutinous among them to be hung up; appeased all the troubles which had been excited by the seditions in the city, re-entered it in a victorious manner, and governed it with a wisdom that acquired her the admiration of all those who heard her conduct mentioned.

Whilst Cassander was employing all his efforts to establish himself on the throne of Macedonia, Antigonius was concerting measures to rid himself of a dangerous enemy: and having taken the field the ensuing spring, he advanced to Babylon, where he augmented his army with the troops he received from Pithon and Seleucus, and then passed the Tigris to attack Eumenes, who had neglected nothing on his part to give him a warm reception. He was much superior to Antigonius in the number of his troops, and yet more in the abilities of a great commander; though the other was far from being defective in those qualifications: for, next to Eumenes, he was undoubtedly the best general and ablest statesman of his time.

One disadvantage on the side of Eumenes was, that his army being composed of different bodies of troops, which the governors of provinces had supplied, each of these governors pretended to the command in chief. Eumenes not being a Macedonian but a Thracian by birth, every one of them thought himself, for that reason, his superior. We may add to this, that the pomp, splendour, and magnificence, affected by them, seemed to leave an infinite distance between him and them, who assumed the air of real Satrapæ. They imagined in consequence of a mistaken and ill-timed ambition,² but very customary with great men, that to give sumptuous repasts, and add to them whatever may heighten pleasure and gratify the senses, were part of the duties of a soldier of rank; and estimating their own merit by the largeness of their revenues and expenses, they flattered themselves that they had acquired, by their means, an extraordinary credit, and a great authority over the troops, and that the army had all the consideration and esteem for them imaginable.

A circumstance happened which ought to have undeceived them. A. M. 3689. Ant. J. C. 315. As the soldiers were marching in the quest of the enemy, Eumenes, who was seized with a dangerous indisposition, was carried in a litter, at a considerable distance from the army, to be more remote from the noise, and that he might enjoy the refreshment of slumber, of which he had long been deprived. When they had advanced some way, and began to perceive the enemy appear on the rising grounds, they halted on a sudden, and began to call for Eumenes. At the same time they cast their bucklers on the ground, and declared to their officers that they would not proceed on their march till Eumenes came to command them. He accordingly came with all expedition, hasting the slaves who carried him, and opening the curtains on each side of his litter: he then stretched out his hands to the soldiers, and made them a declaration of his joy and gratitude. When the troops beheld him, they immediately saluted him in the Macedonian language, resumed their bucklers, clashed upon them with their pikes, and broke forth into loud exclamations of victory and defiance to their enemies, as if they feared nothing, so they had but their general at their head.

When Antigonius received intelligence that Eumenes was ill,³ and caused himself to be carried in a litter to the rear of the army, he advanced, in hopes that his distemper would deliver his enemies into his hands; but when he came near enough to take a view of them, and beheld their cheerful aspects, the disposition of their army, and particularly the litter, which was carried from rank to rank, he burst into a loud vein of laughter in his usual manner, and addressing himself to one of his officers—"Take notice," said he, "of yonder litter; it is that which has drawn up those troops against us, and is now preparing to attack us." And then, without losing a moment's time, he caused a retreat to be sounded, and returned to his camp.

Plutarch remarks, that the Macedonians made it very evident, on this occasion, that they judged all the other satrapæ exceedingly well qualified to give splendid entertainments, and arrange great feasts, but that they esteemed Eumenes alone capable of commanding an army with great ability. This is a solid and sensible reflection, and affords room for a variety of applications; and points out the false taste for glory, and the injudiciousness of those officers and commanders, who are only studious to distinguish themselves in the army by magnificent entertainments, and place their principal merit in surpassing others in luxury, and frequently in ruining themselves without thanks, by those ridiculous expenses. I say without thanks, because nobody thinks himself obliged to them for their profusion, and they are always the worst servants of the state.

The two armies having separated without engaging,⁴ encamped at the distance of three furlongs from each other, with a river and several gullies between them; and as they sustained great inconveniences, because the whole country was eaten up, Antigonus sent ambassadors to the Satrapæ and Macedonians of the army of Eumenes, to prevail upon them to quit that general and join him, making them, at the same time, the most magnificent promises to induce their compliance. The Macedonians rejected his proposals, and dismissed the ambassadors with severe menaces, in case they should presume to make any such offers for the future. Eumenes, after having commended them for their fidelity, related to them this very ancient fable: "A lion entertaining a passion for a young virgin, demanded her one day in marriage of her father, whose answer was that he esteemed this alliance a great honour to him, and was ready to present his daughter to him; but that his large nails and sharp teeth made him apprehensive lest he should employ them a little too rudely upon her, if the least difference should arise between them with relation to their household affairs. The lion, who was passionately fond of the maid, immediately suffered his claws to be pared off, and his teeth to be drawn out. After which the father caught up a strong cudgel, and soon drove away his proffered son-in-law. This," continued Eumenes, "is the aim of Antigonus. He accuses you with mighty promises, in order to make himself master of your forces; but when he has accomplished that design, he will soon make you sensible of his teeth and claws."

A few days after this event, some deserters from the army of Antigonus having acquainted Eumenes that that general was preparing to decamp the next night, about the hour of nine or ten in the evening, Eumenes at first suspected that his intention was to advance into the province of Gabene, which was a fertile country, capable of subsisting numerous armies, and very commodious and secure for the troops, by reason of the rivers and gullies with which it was intersected, and therefore he resolved to prevent his execution of that design. With this view he prevailed, by sums of money, upon some foreign soldiers, to go like deserters into the camp of Antigonus, and acquaint him that Eumenes intended to attack him at night-fall. In the mean time he caused the baggage to be conveyed away, and ordered the troops to take some refreshment, and then march. Antigonus, upon this false intelligence, caused his troops to continue under arms, while Eumenes in the mean time advanced on his way. Antigonus was soon informed by his scouts that Eumenes had decamped, and finding that he had been overreached by his enemy, he still persisted in his first intention; and having ordered his troops to strike their tents, he proceeded with so much expedition, that his march resembled a pursuit. But when he saw that it was impossible to advance with his whole army up to Eumenes, who had the start of him, at least six hours, in his march, he left his infantry under the command of Pithon, and proceeded with the cavalry, on a full gallop, and came up by break of day with the rear-guard of the enemy, who were descending a hill. He then halted upon the top, and Eumenes, who discovered this body of cavalry, imagined it to be the whole army; upon which he discontinued his march, and formed his troops in order of battle. By these means Antigonus played off a retaliation upon Eumenes, and amused him in his turn; for he prevented the continuance of his march, and gave his own infantry sufficient time to come up.

The two armies were then drawn up: that of Eumenes consisted of 35,000 foot, with above 6000 horse, and 114 elephants. That of Antigonus was composed of 28,000 foot, 8500 horse, and sixty-five elephants. The battle was fought with great obstinacy till the night was far advanced, for the moon was then in the full, but the slaughter was not very considerable on either side. Antigonus lost 3700 of his infantry, and fifty-four of his horse, and above 4000 of his men were wounded. Eumenes lost 540 of his infantry, and a very inconsiderable number of his cavalry, and had above 900 wounded. The victory was really on his side; and as his troops, notwithstanding all his entreaties, would not return to the field of battle to carry off the dead bodies, which among the ancients was an evidence of victory, it was in consequence attributed to Antigonus, whose army appeared again in the field, and buried the dead. Eumenes sent a herald the next day to desire leave to inter his slain. This was granted him, and he rendered them funeral honours with all possible magnificence.

A very singular dispute arose at the performance of this ceremony.³ The men happened to find among the slain the body of an Indian officer, who had brought his two wives with him, one of whom he had but lately married. The law of the country, which is said to be still subsisting, would not allow a wife to survive her husband; and if she refused to be burnt with him on the funeral pile, her character was for ever branded with infamy, and she was obliged to continue in a state of widowhood the remainder of her days. She was even condemned to a kind of excommunication, as she was rendered incapable of assisting at any sacrifice, or other religious ceremony. This law, however, mentioned only one wife; but in the present instance there were two; each of whom insisted on being preferred to the other. The eldest pleaded her superiority of years, to which the youngest replied, that the law excluded her rival, because she was then pregnant; and the contest was accordingly determined in that manner. The first of them retired with a very dejected air, her eyes bathed in tears, and tearing her hair and garments, as if she had sustained some great calamity. The other, on the contrary, with a mien of joy and triumph, amidst a numerous retinue of her relations and friends, and arrayed in her richest ornaments, as on the day of her nuptials, advanced with a solemn pace, where the funeral ceremonies were to be performed. She there distributed all her jewels among her friends and relations; and, having taken her last farewell, she placed herself on the funeral pile, by the assistance of her own brother, and expired amidst the praises and acclamations of most of the spectators; but some of them, according to the historian, disapproved of this strange custom, as barbarous and inhuman. The action of this woman was undoubtedly a real murder, and might justly be considered as a violation of the most express law of nature, which prohibits all attempts on a person's own life; and commands us not to dispose of it in compliance with the dictates of caprice, nor forget that it is a trust, which ought to be resigned to none but that Being from whom we receive it. Such a sacrifice is so far from deserving to be enumerated among the instances of respect and fondness due to a husband, that it rather treats him as an unrelenting and bloody idol, by the immolation of such precious victims.

During the course of this campaign, the war was maintained with obstinacy on both sides, and Persia and Media were the theatre of its operations. The armies traversed those two great provinces by marches and countermarches, and each party had recourse to all the art and stratagems that the greatest capacity, in conjunction with a long series of experience in the profession of war, could supply. Eumenes, though he had a mutinous and untractable army to govern, obtained however several advantages over his enemies in this campaign; and when his troops grew impatient for winter quarters, he had still the dexterity to secure the best in all the province of Gabene, and obliged Antigonus to seek his to the north in Media, where he was incapable of arriving, till after a march of twenty-five days.

The troops of Eumenes were so ungovernable, that he could not prevail upon them to post themselves near enough to each other, to be assembled in haste on any emergency. They absolutely insisted on very distant quarters, which took in the whole extent of the province, under pretence of being more commodiously stationed, and of having every thing in greater abundance. In a word, they were dispersed at such a distance from each other, that it required several days for reassembling them in a body. Antigonus, who was informed of this circumstance, marched from a very remote quarter, in the depth of winter, in hopes to surprise these different bodies so dispersed.

Eumenes, however, was not a man that would suffer himself to be surprised in such a manner, but had had the precaution to despatch, to various parts, spies mounted on dromedaries, the swiftest of all animals, to gain timely intelligence of the enemy's motions; and he had posted them so judiciously, that he received information of their march, before Antigonus could arrive at any of his quarters; this furnished him with an expedient to save his army by a stratagem, when all the other generals looked upon it as lost. He posted the troops who were nearest to him on the mountains that rose toward the quarter from whence the enemies were advancing, and ordered them, the following night, to kindle as many fires as might cause it to be imagined all the army were encamped in that situation. Antigonus was soon informed, by his advanced guard, that those fires were seen at a great distance, upon which he concluded that Eumenes was there encamped with all his forces, and in a condition to receive him. In order, therefore, not to expose his men, who were fatigued by long marches, to an engagement with fresh troops, he caused them to halt, that they might have time to recover themselves a little; by which means Eumenes had all the opportunity that was necessary for assembling his forces, before the enemy could advance upon him. Antigonus, finding his scheme defeated, and extremely mortified at being thus overreached, determined to come to an engagement.

The troops of Eumenes being all assembled about him, were struck with admiration at his extraordinary prudence and ability, and resolved that he should exercise the sole command. Antigones and Teutames, the two captains who led the Argyraspides, were so exceedingly mortified at a distinction so glorious for Eumenes, that they formed a resolution to destroy him, and drew most of the Satrapæ and principal officers into their conspiracy. Envy is a malady that seldom admits of a cure, and is generally heightened by the remedies administered to it. All the precautions of prudence, moderation, and condescension, which Eumenes employed, were incapable of mollifying the hearts of those barbarians, and extinguishing their jealousy, and he must have renounced his merit and virtue, which alone occasioned it, to have been capable of appeasing them. He frequently lamented to himself his unhappiness in being fated to live, not with men, as his expression was, but with savage beasts. Several conspiracies had already been formed against him, and he daily beheld himself exposed to the same danger. In order to frustrate their effects, if possible, he had borrowed, on various pretexts of pressing necessity, many considerable sums of those who appeared most inveterate against him, that he, at least, might restrain them by the consideration of their own interest, and an apprehension of losing the sums they had lent him, should he happen to perish.

His enemies, however, being now determined to destroy him, held a council, in order to deliberate on the time, place, and means of accomplishing their intentions. They all agreed to protract his fall, till after the decision of the impending battle, and then to destroy him immediately afterwards. Eudamus, who commanded the elephants, went immediately, with Phedimus, to acquaint Eumenes with this resolution, not from any affection to his person, but only from their apprehensions of losing the money he had borrowed of them. Eumenes returned them his thanks, and highly applauded their affection and fidelity.

When he returned to his tent, he immediately made his will, and then burnt all his papers, with the letters that had been written to him, because he was unwilling that those who had favoured him with any secret intelligence should be exposed to any accusation or calumny after his death. When he had thus disposed of his affairs, and found himself alone, he deliberated on the conduct he ought to pursue. A thousand contrary thoughts agitated his mind. Could it possibly be prudent in him to repose any confidence in those officers and generals who had sworn his destruction? Might he not lawfully arm against them the zeal and affection of the soldiers, who were inviolably devoted to him? On the other hand, would it not be his best expedient, to pass through Media and Armenia, and retire to Cappadocia, the place of his residence, where he might hope for a sure asylum from danger? Or, in order to avenge himself on those traitors, would it not be better for him to abandon them in the crisis of the battle, and resign the victory to his enemies? For in a situation so desperate as his own, what thoughts will not rise up in the mind of a man reduced to the last extremity by a set of perfidious traitors! This last thought, however, infused a horror into his soul; and as he was determined to discharge his duty to his latest breath, and to combat, to the close of his life, for the prince who had armed him in his cause, he resigned his destiny, says Plutarch, to the will of the gods, and thought only of preparing his troops for the battle.

He had 36,700 foot, and above 6000 horse, with 114 elephants. The army of Antigonus was composed of 22,000 foot, 9000 horse, with a body of Median cavalry, and sixty-five elephants. This general posted his cavalry on the two wings, his infantry he disposed in the centre, and formed his elephants into a first line, which extended along the front of the army, and he filled up the intervals between the elephants with light-armed troops. He gave the command of the left wing to Pithon; that of the right he assigned to his son Demetrius, and here he himself was to act in person, at the head of a body of chosen troops. Eumenes drew up his army almost in the same manner; his best troops he disposed into the left wing, and placed himself in their front, in order to oppose Antigonus, and gave the command of the right to Philip.

Before the armies began to charge, he exhorted the Greeks and Barbarians to perform their duty well; for as to his phalanx, and the Argyraspides, they so little needed any animating expressions, that they were the first to encourage him with assurances, that the enemy should not wait a moment for them. They were the oldest troops, who had served under Philip and Alexander, and were all veteran champions, whom victory had crowned in a hundred combats; they had hitherto been reputed invincible, and had never been foiled in any action; for which reason they advanced to the troops of Antigonus, and charged them fiercely with this exclamation: "Villains! you now fight with your fathers!" They then broke in upon the infantry with irresistible fury; not one of the battalions could sustain the shock, and most of them were cut to pieces.

The event was different with respect to the cavalry, for as the engagement between them began on a sandy soil, the motion of the men and horses raised such a thick cloud of dust, as made them incapable of seeing to the distance of three paces. Antigonus, befriended by this darkness, detached from his cavalry a body of troops superior to that of the enemy, and carried off all their baggage, without their perceiving it, and at the same time broke in upon their horse Peucestes, who commanded them, and till then had given a thousand proofs of true bravery, fell back, and drew all the rest after him. Eumenes employed all his efforts to rally them, but in vain; the confusion was universal in that quarter, as the advantage had been complete in the other. The capture of the baggage was of more importance to Antigonus, than the victory could be to Eumenes; for the soldiers of this latter, finding, at their return, all their baggage carried off, with their wives and children, instead of employing their swords against the enemy, in order to recover them which would have been very practicable at that time, and was what Eumenes had promised to accomplish, turned all their fury against their own general.

Having chosen their time they fell upon him forced his sword out of his hand, and bound his hands behind him with his own belt. In this condition they led him through the Macedonian phalanx, then drawn up in lines under arms, in order to deliver him up to Antigonus, who had promised to restore them all their baggage on that condition. "Kill me, O soldiers," said Eumenes, as he passed by them, "Kill me yourselves, I conjure you in the name of all the gods! for though I perish by the command of Antigonus, my death will, however, be as much your act as if I had fallen by your swords. If you are unwilling to do me that office with your own hands permit me, at least, to discharge it by one of mine. That shall render me the service which you refuse me. On this condition I absolve you from all the severities you have reason to apprehend from the vengeance of the gods, for the crime you are preparing to perpetrate on me."

Upon this they hastened him along to prevent the repetition of such pathetic addresses, which might awaken the affection of the troops for their general.

Most of the soldiers of Antigonus went out to meet him, and scarce a single man was left in his camp. When that illustrious prisoner arrived there, Antigonus had not the courage to see him, because his presence alone would have reproached him in the highest degree. As those who guarded him asked Antigonus in what manner he would have him kept: "As you would an elephant," replied he, "or a lion;" which are two animals most to be dreaded. But within a few days he was touched with compassion, and ordered him to be eased of the weightiest of his chains; he likewise appointed one of his own domestics to serve him, and permitted his friends to see him, and pass whole days in his company. They were also allowed to furnish him with all necessary refreshments.

Antigonus deliberated with himself for some time, in what manner he should treat his prisoner. They had been intimate friends, when they served under Alexander, and the remembrance of that amity rekindled some tender sentiments in his favour, and combated for awhile against his interest. His son Demetrius also solicited strongly in his favour; passionately desiring, through mere generosity, that the life of so great a man might be saved. But Antigonus, who was well acquainted with his inflexible fidelity for the family of Alexander, and knew what a dangerous enemy he had in him, and how capable he was of disconcerting all his measures, should he escape from his hands, was too much afraid of him to grant him his life, and therefore ordered him to be destroyed in prison.

Such was the end of the most accomplished man of his age, in every particular, and the worthiest to succeed Alexander the Great. He had not, indeed, the fortune of that monarch, but he, perhaps, was not his inferior in merit. He was truly brave, without temerity; and prudent, without weakness. His descent was but mean, though he was not ashamed of it; and he gradually rose to the highest stations, and might even have aspired to a throne, if he had either had more ambition or less probity. At a time when intrigues and cabals, inspired by a motive most capable of affecting the human heart, I mean the thirst of empire, knew neither sincerity nor fidelity, nor had any respect to the ties of blood or the rights of friendship, but trampled on the most sacred laws, Eumenes always retained an inviolable fidelity and attachment to the royal family, which no hopes or fears, no vicissitude of fortune, nor any elevation, had power to shake. This very character of probity rendered him insupportable to his colleagues; for it frequently happens, that virtue creates enmities and aversions, because it seems to reproach those who think in a different manner, and places their defects in too near a view.

He possessed all the military virtues in a supreme degree; complete skill in the art of war, valour, foresight, firmness, a wonderful fertility of invention for stratagems and resources in the most unexpected dangers, and most desperate conjunctures: but I place far above these that character of probity, and those sentiments of honour, which prevailed in him, and which do not always accompany the other shining qualities I have mentioned.

A merit so illustrious and universal, and at the same time so modest, which ought to have excited the esteem and admiration of the other commanders, only gave them offence, and inflamed their envy; a defect too frequently visible in person of high rank. These satrapes, full of themselves, saw with jealousy and indignation, that an officer of no birth, but much better qualified, and more brave and experienced than themselves, had ascended by degrees to the most exalted stations, which they imagined due only to those who were dignified with great names, and descended from ancient and illustrious families: as if true nobility did not consist in merit and virtue.²

Antigonus and the whole army celebrated the funeral obsequies of Eumenes with great magnificence, and willingly paid him the utmost honours; his death having extinguished all their envy and fear. They deposited his bones and ashes in an urn of silver, and sent it to his wife and children in Cappadocia, a poor compensation for a desolate widow and her helpless orphans!

SECTION VI.—SELEUCUS, PTOLEMY, LYSIMACHUS, AND CASSANDER, FORM A CONFEDERACY AGAINST ANTIGONUS. HE DEPRIVES PTOLEMY OF SYRIA AND PHENICIA, AND MAKES HIMSELF MASTER OF TYRE, AFTER A LONG SIEGE. DEMETRIUS, THE SON OF ANTIGONUS, BEGINS TO DISTINGUISH HIMSELF IN ASIA MINOR. HE LOSES A FIRST BATTLE, AND GAINS A SECOND. SELEUCUS TAKES BABYLON. A TREATY OF PEACE BETWEEN THE PRINCES IS IMMEDIATELY BROKEN. CASSANDER CAUSES THE YOUNG KING ALEXANDER, AND HIS MOTHER ROXANA, TO BE PUT TO DEATH. HERCULES, ANOTHER SON OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT, IS LIKEWISE SLAIN, WITH HIS MOTHER BARSIDA, BY POLYSPERCHON. ANTIGONUS CAUSES CLEOPATRA, THE SISTER OF THE SAME ALEXANDER, TO BE PUT TO DEATH. THE REVOLT OF OPHELLAS IN LIBYA.

ANTIGONUS,³ looking upon himself as master of the empire of Asia for the future, made a new regulation in the eastern provinces, for his better security. He discarded all the governors he suspected, and advanced to their places those persons in whom he thought he might confide. He even destroyed several who had rendered themselves formidable to him by their too great merit. Pithon, governor of Media, and Antigenes, general of the Argyraspides, were among these latter. Seleucus, governor of Babylon, was likewise minuted down in his list of proscriptions, but he found means to escape the danger, and threw himself under the protection of Ptolemy in Egypt. As for the Argyraspides, who had betrayed Eumenes, he sent them into Arachosia, the remotest province in the empire; and ordered Syburtius, who governed there, to take such measures as might destroy them all, and that not one of them might ever return to Greece. The just horror he conceived at the infamous manner in which they betrayed their general, contributed not a little to this resolution, though he enjoyed the fruit of their treason without the least scruple or remorse; but a motive, still more prevalent, determined him chiefly to this proceeding. These soldiers were mutinous, untractable, licentious, and averse to all obedience; their example, therefore, was capable of corrupting the other troops, and even of destroying him, by a new instance of treachery: he therefore was resolved to exterminate them without hesitation.

Seleucus knew how to represent the formidable power of Antigonus so effectually to Ptolemy,⁴ that he engaged him in a league with Ly-sumachus and Cassander, whom he had also convinced, by the information which he had sent them, of the danger they had reason to apprehend from the power of that prince. Antigonus was very sensible that Seleucus would not fail to solicit them into measures against his interest, for which reason he sent an embassy to each of the three, to renew the good intelligence between them, by new assurances of his friendship. But what confidence could be reposed in such assurances from a perfidious man, who had lately destroyed so many governors, from no inducement but the ambition of reigning alone at the expense of all his colleagues? The answers therefore which he received, made him sufficiently sensible, that it was incumbent on him to prepare for war: upon which he quitted the East, and advanced to Cilicia with very considerable treasures which he had drawn from Babylon and Susa. He there raised new levies, regulated several affairs in the provinces of Asia Minor, and then marched into Syria and Phœnicia.

His design was to dispossess Ptolemy of those two provinces,¹ and make himself master of their maritime forces, which was absolutely necessary for him in the war he was preparing to undertake against the confederates. For unless he could be master at sea, and have at least the ports and vessels of the Phœnicians at his disposal, he could never expect any success against them. He, however, arrived too late to surprise the ships; for Ptolemy had already sent to Egypt all that could be found in Phœnicia, and it was even with difficulty that Antigonus made himself master of the ports; for Tyre, Joppa, and Gaza, opposed him with all their forces. The two last, indeed, were soon taken, but a considerable length of time was necessary for the reduction of Tyre.

However, as he was already master of all the other parts of Syria and Phœnicia, he immediately gave orders for building vessels; and a vast number of trees were cut down, for that purpose, on mount Libanus, which was covered with cedar and cypress trees of extraordinary beauty and height, and they were conveyed to the different ports where the ships were to be built, in which work he employed several thousand men. At length, with these ships, and others that joined him from Cyprus, Rhodes, and some other cities with which he had contracted an alliance, he formed a considerable fleet, and rendered himself master of the sea.

His ardour for this work was redoubled by an affront he had received from Seleucus, who with 100 ships that Ptolemy had sent him, sailed up to Tyre, in sight of all the forces of Antigonus, with an intention to brave him whilst he was engaged in the siege of that city. And in reality this insult had greatly discouraged his troops, and given his allies such an impression of his weakness as was very injurious to him. In order, therefore, to prevent the effect of those disadvantageous opinions, he sent for the principal allies, and assured them he would have such a fleet at sea that summer, as should be superior to the naval forces of all his enemies, and he was punctual to his promise before the expiration of the year.

But when he perceived, that A. M. 3691. while he was thus employed in Ant. J. C. 313. Phœnicia, Cassander gained upon him in Asia Minor, he marched thither with part of his troops, and left the rest with his son Demetrius, who was then but twenty-two years of age, to defend Syria and Phœnicia against Ptolemy. This Demetrius will be much celebrated in the sequel of this history, and I shall soon point out his particular character.

Tyre was then reduced to the last extremities;² the fleet of Antigonus cut off all communication of provisions, and the city was soon obliged to capitulate. The garrison which Ptolemy had there, obtained permission to march out with all their effects, and the inhabitants were promised the enjoyment of theirs without molestation. Andronicus, who commanded at the siege, was transported with gaining a place of such importance on any condition whatever; especially after a siege which had harassed his troops exceedingly for fifteen months.

Nineteen years only had elapsed since Alexander had destroyed this city, in such a manner as made it natural to believe it would require whole ages to re-establish it; and yet in so short a time it became capable of sustaining this new siege, which lasted more than as long again as that of Alexander. This circumstance discovers the great resources derived from commerce; for this was the only expedient by which Tyre rose out of its ruins, and recovered most of its former splendour. This city was then the centre of all the the traffic of the East and West.

Demetrius,³ who now began to be known, and will in the sequel be surnamed Poliorcetes,⁴ which signifies taker of cities, was the son of Antigonus. He was finely made, and of uncommon beauty. Sweetness, blended with gravity, was visible in his aspect,⁵ and he had an air of serenity, intermixed with something which carried awe along with it. Vivacity of youth in him was tempered with a majestic mien, and an air truly royal and heroic. The same mixture was likewise observable in his manners, which were equally qualified to charm and astonish. When he had no affairs to transact, his intercourse with his friends was enchanting. Nothing could equal the sumptuousness of his feasts, his luxury, and his whole manner of living; and it may be justly said, that he was the most magnificent, the most voluptuous, and the most delicate, of all princes. On the other hand, however alluring all these soft pleasures might appear to him, when he had any enterprise to undertake, he was the most active and vigilant of mankind; nothing but his patience and assiduity in fatigue were equal to his vivacity and courage. Such is the character of the young prince who now begins to appear upon the stage of action.

Plutarch remarks in him, as a peculiarity which distinguished him from the other princes of his time, his profound respect for his parents, which neither flowed from affection nor ceremony, but was sincere and real, and the growth of the heart itself. Antigonus, on his part, had a tenderness and affection for his son that was truly paternal, and extended even to familiarity, though without any diminution of the authority of the sovereign and the father; and this created a union and confidence between them entirely free from all fear and suspicion. Plutarch relates an instance of it. One day, when Antigonus was engaged in giving audience to some ambassadors, Demetrius, returning from the chase, advanced into the great hall, where he saluted his father with a kiss, and then seated himself at his side, with his darts in his hand. Antigonus had just given the ambassadors their answer, and was dismissing them, but he called them back, and said aloud, "You may likewise inform your masters of the manner in which my son and I live together;" intimating thereby, that he was not afraid to let his son approach him with arms,⁶ and that this good understanding that subsisted between him and his son, constituted the greatest strength of his dominions, at the same time that it affected him with the most sensible pleasure. But to return to our subject.

Antigonus having passed into Asia Minor,⁷ soon stopped the progress of Cassander's arms, and pressed him so vigorously, that he obliged him to come to an accommodation, on very disgraceful terms; in consequence of which the treaty was hardly concluded before he repented of his accession to it, and broke it by demanding succours of Ptolemy and Seleucus, and renewing the war. The violation of treaties was considered as nothing, by the generality of those princes whose history I am now writing

These unworthy expedients, which are justly thought dishonourable in private persons, appeared to them as so many circumstances essential to their glory. They applauded themselves for their perfidious measures, as if they had been instances of their abilities in government; and were never sensible that such proceedings would teach their troops to be wanting in their fidelity to them, and leave themselves destitute of any pretext of complaint against their own subjects, who, by revolting from their authority, only trod in the same paths which they themselves had already marked out. By such contagious examples, a whole age is soon corrupted, and learns to renounce, without a blush, all sentiments of honour and probity, because that which is once become common, no longer appears shameful.

The renewal of this war detained Antigonus in those parts longer than he intended, and afforded Ptolemy an opportunity of obtaining a considerable advantage over him in another quarter.

He first sailed with his fleet to the isle of Cyprus,¹ and reduced the greatest part of it to his obedience. Nicocles, king of Paphos, one of the cities of that island, submitted to him like the rest, but made a secret alliance with Antigonus a year or two after. Ptolemy received intelligence of this proceeding; and, in order to prevent the other princes from imitating his example, he ordered some of his officers in Cyprus to destroy him; but they being unwilling to execute that commission themselves, earnestly entreated Nicocles to prevent it by a voluntary death. The unhappy prince consented to the proposal, and, seeing himself utterly destitute of defence, became his own executioner. But though Ptolemy had commanded those officers to treat the queen Axitha, and the other princesses whom they found in the palace of Nicocles, with the respect due to their rank, yet they could not prevent them from following the example of the unfortunate king. The queen, after she had slain her daughters with her own hands, and exhorted the other princesses not to survive the calamity by which their unhappy brother fell, plunged her dagger into her own bosom. The death of these princesses was succeeded by that of their husbands, who, before they slew themselves, set fire to the four corners of the palace. Such was the dreadful and bloody scene which was acted at Cyprus.

Ptolemy, after having made himself master of that island, made a descent into Syria, and from thence proceeded to Cilicia, where he acquired great spoils, and took a large number of prisoners, whom he carried with him into Egypt. Seleucus imparted to him, at his return, a project for regaining Syria and Phœnicia, and the execution of it was agreed to be undertaken. Ptolemy accordingly marched thither in person, with a fine army, after he had happily suppressed a revolt which had been kindled among the Cyreneans, and found Demetrius at Gaza, who opposed his entrance into that place. This occasioned a sharp engagement, in which Ptolemy was at last victorious. Demetrius had 5000 of his men killed, and 8000 more made prisoners: he likewise lost his tents, his treasure, and all his equipage, and was obliged to retreat as far as Azotus, and from thence to Tripoli, a city of Phœnicia, on the frontiers of Upper Syria, and to abandon all Phœnicia, Palestine, and Coele-syria, to Ptolemy.

Before his departure from Azotus, he desired leave to bury the dead, which Ptolemy not only granted, but also sent him back all his equipage, tents, furniture, friends, and domestics, without any ransom, with a message, "That they ought not to make war against each other for riches, but for glory;" and it was impossible for a Pagan to think better. May we not likewise say, that he uttered his real sentiments? Demetrius, touched with so obliging an instance of generosity, immediately begged of the gods not to leave him long indebted to Ptolemy for so great a kindness, but to furnish him with an opportunity of making him a similar return.

Ptolemy sent the rest of the prisoners into Egypt, to serve him in his fleet, and then pursue his conquests. All the coasts of Phœnicia submitted to him except the city of Tyre: upon which he sent a secret message to Andronicus, the governor of that place, and one of the bravest officers of Antigonus, and the most attached to the service of his master, to induce him to abandon the city with a good grace, and not oblige him to seize it in form. Andronicus, who depended on the Tyrian's fidelity to Antigonus, returned a haughty, and even an insulting and contemptuous answer to Ptolemy; but he was deceived in his expectations, for the garrison and inhabitants compelled him to surrender. He then imagined himself inevitably lost, and that nothing could make a conqueror forget the insolence with which he had treated him; but he was again deceived. The king of Egypt, instead of making any reprisals upon an officer who had insulted him with so much indignity, made it a kind of duty to engage him in his service by the regard he professed for him when he was introduced to salute him.

Demetrius was not discouraged with the loss of the battle, as a young prince who had been so unfortunate in his enterprise might naturally have been; but he employed all his attention in raising fresh troops and making new preparations, with all the steadiness and resolution of a consummate general habituated to the art of war, and to the inconstancy and vicissitudes of arms; in a word, he fortified the cities, and was continually exercising his soldiers.

Antigonus received intelligence of the loss of that battle without any visible emotion, and he coldly said, "Ptolemy has defeated boys, but he shall soon have men to deal with;" and as he was unwilling to abate the courage and ardour of his son, he complied with his request of making a second trial of his strength against Ptolemy.

A short time after this event,² Cilles, Ptolemy's lieutenant, arrived with a numerous army, fully persuaded that he should drive Demetrius out of Syria; for he had entertained a very contemptible opinion of him from his defeat; but Demetrius, who had known how to derive advantages from his misfortune, and was now become more circumspect and attentive, fell upon him when he least expected it, and made himself master of his camp and all his baggage, took 7000 of his men prisoners, even seized him with his own hands, and carried off a great booty. The glory and riches Demetrius had acquired by this victory, affected him less than the pleasure of being in a condition to acquit himself of his debt towards his enemy, and return the obligation he had received from him. He would not, however, act in this manner by his own authority, but wrote an account of the whole affair to his father, who permitted him to act as he should judge proper. Upon which he immediately sent back Cilles, with all his friends, laden with magnificent presents, and with them all the baggage he had taken. There is certainly something very noble in thus vying in generosity with an enemy; and it was a disposition still more estimable, especially in a young and victorious prince, to make it a point of glory to depend entirely upon his father, and to take no measures in such a conjuncture without consulting him.

Seleucus,³ after the victory obtained over Demetrius at Gaza, had obtained 1000 foot and 300 horse from Ptolemy, and proceeded with this small escort to the East, with an intention to re-enter Babylon. When he arrived at Carrhe, in Mesopotamia, he made the Macedonian garrison join his troops, partly by consent and partly by compulsion. As soon as his approach to Babylon was known, his ancient subjects came in great numbers to range themselves under his ensigns; for the moderation of his government had rendered him greatly beloved in that province, whilst the severity of Antigonus was universally detested. The people were charmed at his return, and the hopes of his re-establishment. When he arrived at Babylon he found the gates open, and was received with the general acclamations of the people. Those who favoured the party of Antigonus retired into the castle; but as Seleucus was master of the city and the affections of the people, he soon made himself master of that fortress, and there found his children, friends, and domestics, whom Antigonus had detained prisoners in that place ever since the retreat of Seleucus into Egypt.

It was immediately judged necessary to raise a good army to defend these acquisitions; and he was hardly reinstated in Babylon before Nicanor, the governor of Media under Antigonus, was upon his march to dislodge him. Seleucus having received intelligence of this, passed the Tigris, in order to meet him, and he had the good fortune to surprise him in a disadvantageous post, where he assaulted his camp by night, and entirely defeated his army. Nicanor was compelled to fly, with a small number of his friends, and to cross the deserts before he could arrive at the place where Antigonus then was. All the troops, who had escaped from the defeat, declared for Seleucus, either through dissatisfaction to serve under Antigonus, or else from apprehensions of the conqueror. Seleucus was now master of a fine army, which he employed in the conquest of Media and Susiana, with the other adjacent provinces, by which means he rendered himself very powerful. The lenity of his government, his justice, equity, and humanity to all his subjects, contributed principally to the establishment of his power; and he was then sensible how advantageous it is for a prince to treat his people in that manner, and to possess their affections. He had arrived in his own territories with a handful of men, but the love of his people was equivalent to an army; and he not only assembled a vast body of them about him in a short time, but they were likewise rendered invincible by their affection for him.

With this entry into Babylon

A. M. 3693. commences the famous era of the Ant. J. C. 311. Seleucida, received by all the people of the East, as well Pagans as Jews, Christians, and Mahomedans. The Jews call it the Era of Contracts, because when they were subjected to the government of the Syro-Macedonian kings, they were obliged to insert it into the dates of their contracts and other civil writings. The Arabians style it the Era of the Double-horned, by which, according to some authors, they denote Seleucus, whom sculptors usually represented with two horns of an ox on his head, because this prince was so strong, that he could seize that animal by the horns, and stop him short in his full career. The two books of the Maccabees call it the Era of the Greeks, and use it in their dates; with this difference, however, that the first of these books represents it as beginning in the spring, the other in the autumn of the same year. The thirty-one years of the reign ascribed to Seleucus, begin at this period.

Antigonus was at Celene in Phrygia,¹ when he received intelligence of the victory obtained by his son Demetrius over the troops of Ptolemy; and immediately advanced to Syria, in order to secure all the advantages that were presented to him by that event. He crossed mount Taurus, and joined his son, whom he tenderly embraced at the first interview, shedding at the same time tears of joy. Ptolemy, being sensible that he was not strong enough to oppose the united forces of the father and son, resolved to demolish the fortifications of Aco, Joppa, Samaria, and Gaza; after which he retired into Egypt, with the greatest part of the riches of the country, and a numerous train of the inhabitants. In this manner was all Phœnicia, Judea, and Cœle-syria, subjected a second time to the power of Antigonus.

The inhabitants of these provinces who were carried off by Ptolemy,² followed him more out of inclination than by constraint: and the moderation and humanity with which he always treated those who submitted to his government, had gained their hearts so effectually, that they were more desirous of living under him in a foreign country, than of continuing in their own subject to Antigonus, from whom they had no expectations of so gentle a treatment. They were likewise strengthened in this resolution by the advantageous proposals of Ptolemy; for, as he then intended to make Alexandria the capital of Egypt, he was very desirous of drawing inhabitants thither, and for this purpose he offered them extraordinary privileges and immunities. He, therefore, settled in that city most of those who followed him on this occasion, among whom was a numerous body of Jews. Alexander had formerly placed many of that nation there; but Ptolemy, in his return from one of his first expeditions, planted a much greater number in that city than Alexander himself, and they there found a fine country and a powerful protection. The rumour of these advantages being propagated through all Judea, rendered many more desirous of establishing themselves at Alexandria; and they accomplished their design upon this occasion. Alexander had granted the Jews who settled there under his government, the same privileges as were enjoyed by the Macedonians; and Ptolemy pursued the same conduct with respect to this new colony. In a word, he settled such a number of them there, that the quarter inhabited by the Jews almost formed an entire city of itself. A large body of Samaritans also established themselves there, on the same footing with the Jews, and increased exceedingly in numbers.

Antigonus,³ after he had repossessed himself of Syria and Judea, sent Athenæus, one of his generals, against the Nabathæan Arabs, a nation of robbers, who had made several inroads into the country he had newly conquered, and had lately carried off a very large booty. Their capital city was Petra, so called by the Greeks, because it was situated on a high rock, in the middle of a desert country. Athenæus made himself master of the place, and likewise of the spoils deposited in it; but the Arabs attacked him by surprise in his retreat, and defeated the greatest part of his troops; they likewise carried him on the spot, regained all the booty, and carried it back to Petra, from whence they wrote a letter to Antigonus, who was then in Syria, complaining of the injustice with which they had been treated by Athenæus. Antigonus pretended at first to disapprove his proceedings; but as soon as he had assembled his troops, he gave the command of them to his son Demetrius, with orders to chastise the insolence of those robbers; but as this prince found it impracticable to force them in their retreat, or retake Petra, he contented himself with making the best treaty he could with this people, and then marched back with his troops.

Antigonus,⁴ upon the intelligence he received from Nicanor of the A. M. 3693 success of Seleucus in the East, Ant. J. C. 311. sent his son Demetrius thither at the head of an army, to drive him out of Babylon, and dispossess him of that province, while he himself advanced to the coasts of Asia Minor, to oppose the operations of the confederate princes, whose power daily increased. He likewise ordered his son to join him, after he had executed his commission in the East. Demetrius, in conformity to his father's directions, assembled an army at Damascus, and marched to Babylon; and as Seleucus was then in Media, he entered the city without any opposition. Patroclus, who had been intrusted with the government of that city by Seleucus, finding himself not strong enough to resist Demetrius, retired with his troops into the marshes, where the rivers, canals, and fens, that covered him, made the approach impracticable. He had the precaution, when he left Babylon, to cause the inhabitants also to retire from thence, who all took refuge, some on the other side of the Tigris, others in the deserts, and the rest in places of security.

Demetrius caused the castles to be attacked, of which there were two in Babylon, very large, and strengthened with good garrisons, on the two opposite banks of the Euphrates. One of these he took, and placed in it a garrison of 7000 men. The other was tained the siege till Antigonus ordered his son to join him. The prince, therefore, left Archelaus, one of the principal officers of the army, with 1000 horse, and 5000 foot to continue the siege, and marched with the rest of the troops into Asia Minor to reinforce his father.

Before his departure, he caused Babylon to be plundered; but this action proved to be detrimental to his father's affairs, and attached the inhabitants more than ever to Seleucus; even those who, till then, had espoused the interest of Antigonus, never imagined that the city would be treated in that manner, if he ever intended to return thither, and looked upon this pillage as an act of desertion, and a formal declaration of his having entirely abandoned them: this induced them to turn their thoughts to an accommodation with Seleucus, and they accordingly went over to his party; by which means Seleucus, upon his return, which immediately followed the departure of Demetrius, had no difficulty in driving out the few troops that Demetrius had left in the city, and he retook the castle which they possessed. When this event was accomplished, he established his authority in such a solid manner, that nothing was capable of shaking it. This therefore is the epocha to which the Babylonians refer the foundation of his kingdom, though all the other nations of Asia place it six months sooner, and in the preceding year.

Demetrius, upon his arrival in Asia Minor, obliged Ptolemy to raise the siege of Halicarnassus; and this event was succeeded by a treaty of peace between the confederate princes and Antigonus; by which it was stipulated, that Cassander should have the management of the Macedonian affairs, till Alexander, the son of Roxana, was of age to reign. Lysimachus was to have Thrace; Ptolemy, Egypt and the frontiers of Libya; with Arabia; and all Asia was allotted to Antigonus. All the cities of Greece were likewise to enjoy their liberty; but this accommodation was of no long duration: and indeed it is surprising that princes, so well acquainted with each other, and sensible that the sacred solemnity of oaths was only employed for their mutual delusion, should expect any success from an expedient that had been practised so frequently in vain, and was then so much disregarded. This treaty was hardly concluded, before each party complained that it was infringed, and hostilities were renewed. The true reason was, the extraordinary power of Antigonus, which daily increased, and became so formidable to the other three, that they were incapable of enjoying any satisfaction till they had reduced him.

It was manifest that they were only solicitous for their own interest, and had no regard for the family of Alexander. The Macedonians began to be impatient: and declared aloud, that it was time for them to cause the young Alexander to appear upon the stage of action, as he was then fourteen years of age, and to bring him out of prison, in order to make him acquainted with public business. Cassander, who foresaw in this proceeding the destruction of his own measures, caused the young king, and his mother Roxana, to be secretly put to death in the castle of Amphipolis, where he had confined them for some years.

Polysperchon,² who governed in A. M. 3694. Peloponnesus, took this opportunity to declare openly against the conduct of Cassander, and made the people sensible of the enormous wickedness of this action, with a view of rendering him odious to the Macedonians, and entirely supplanting him in their affections. As he had then thoughts of re-entering Macedonia, from whence he had been driven by Cassander, he affected an air of great zeal for the house of Alexander; and in order to render it apparent, he caused Hercules, another son of Alexander, or Barsina, the widow of Memnon, and who was then about seventeen years of age, to be brought from Pergamus, upon which he himself advanced with an army, and proposed to the Macedonians to place him upon the throne. Cassander was terrified at this proceeding, and represented to him, at an interview between them, that he was preparing to raise himself a master; but that it would be more for his interest to remove Hercules out of the way, and secure the sovereignty of Greece to himself, offering, at the same time, his own assistance for that purpose. This discourse easily prevailed upon him to sacrifice the young prince to Cassander, as he was now persuaded that he should derive great advantages from his death. Hercules, therefore, and his mother, suffered A. M. 3695. the same fate from him the next Ant. J. C. 309. year, as Roxana and her son had before from Cassander; and each of these wretches sacrificed, in his turn, an heir of the crown, in order to share it between themselves.

As there was now no prince of Alexander's house left, each of them retained his government with the authority of a sovereign, and were persuaded that they had effectually secured their acquisitions, by the murder of those princes, who alone had a lawful title to them, congratulating themselves for having extinguished in their own minds all remains of respect for the memory of Alexander, their master and benefactor, which till then had held their hands. Who, without horror, could behold an action so perfidious, and, at the same time, so shameful and base! But such was the insensibility of them both, that they were equally forward to felicitate themselves on the success of an impious confederacy, which ended in the effusion of their master's blood. The blackest of all crimes never cost the ambitious any remorse, provided they conduce to their ends.

Ptolemy having commenced the war anew,³ took several cities from Antigonus in Cilicia and other parts; but Demetrius soon regained what his father had lost in Cilicia: and the other generals of Antigonus had the same success against those of Ptolemy, who did not command this expedition in person. Cyprus was now the only territory where Ptolemy preserved his conquests; for when he had caused Nicicles, king of Paphos, to suffer death, he entirely crushed the party of Antigonus in that island.

In order to obtain some compensation for what he had lost in Cilicia,⁴ he invaded Pamphylia, Lycia, Ant. J. C. 308. and some other provinces of Asia Minor, where he took several places from Antigonus. He then sailed into the Ægean sea,⁵ and made himself master of the isle of Andros; after which he took Sicyon, Corinth, and some other cities.

During his continuance in those parts, he formed an intimate correspondence with Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander. She had espoused Alexander, king of Epirus, at whose nuptials Philip had been assassinated, and after the death of her consort, who was slain in the wars of Italy, had continued in a state of widowhood, and for several years had resided at Sardis in Lydia. As Antigonus, who was master of that city, did not treat her with due attention and respect, Ptolemy artfully took advantage of her discontent, to gain her over to his interest. With this intention he invited her to an interview, in hopes of deriving, from her presence, some advantages against Antigonus. The princess had already set out, but the governor of Sardis caused her to be stopped and immediately brought back, and shortly after, by the command of Antigonus, caused her to be secretly destroyed. Antigonus, soon after this event, came to Sardis, where he ordered all the women who had been instrumental in her murder to be proceeded against.

We may here behold with admiration, how heavily the arm of the Almighty fell upon the race of Alexander, and with what severity he pursued the small remains of his family, and all those who had the misfortune to be any way related to that famous conqueror, whose favour was ardently courted by all the world a few years before. A fatal curse consumed his whole family, and avenged upon it all the acts of violence which had been committed by that prince. God even used the demonstration of his clemency, officers, and domestics, to render the severity of his judgments visible to all unkind, who, by these means, received some kind of reparation for the calamities they had suffered from Alexander.

Antigonus, though he was the minister of the Deity in the execution of his just decrees, was not the less criminal on that account, because he acted only from motives of ambition and cruelty, of the enormity of which he was himself sensible, and which he wished he could be capable of concealing from the observation of mankind. He celebrated the funeral of Cleopatra with extraordinary magnificence, hoping, by this plausible exterior, to dazzle the eyes of the public, and avoid the hatred due to so black a crime. But such deep hypocrisy as this, usually discovers the crime it labours to conceal, and only increases the just horror the world generally entertains for those who have committed it.

This barbarous and unmanly action was not the only one that Antigonus committed. Seleucus and Ptolemy raised the superstructure of their power on the clemency and justice with which they governed their people; and, by these expedients, established lasting empires, which continued in their families for several generations: but the character of Antigonus was of a different cast. It was a maxim with him, to remove all obstacle to his designs, without the least regard to justice or humanity; in consequence of which, when that brutal and tyrannical force, by which alone he had supported himself, came to fall him, he lost both life and empire.

Ptolemy, with all the wisdom and moderation of his government, was not secure from revolts. The treachery of Ophellias, governor of Libya, and Cyrenaica, who formed an insurrection much about this time, gave him a just cause for inquietude; but it happened very fortunately to be attended with no bad effect. This officer had served first under Alexander, and, after the death of that prince, had embraced the interest of Ptolemy, whom he followed into Egypt. Ptolemy had intrusted him with the command of the army which was intended for the reduction of Libya and Cyrenaica, provinces that had been allotted to him, as well as Egypt and Arabia, in the partition of the empire. When those two provinces were subdued, Ptolemy conferred the government of them upon Ophellias: who, when he was sensible that this prince was too much engaged with Antigonus and Demetrius to give him any apprehensions, had rendered himself independent, and continued, till this year, in the peaceable enjoyment of his usurpation.

Agathocles, king of Sicily, having marched into Africa to attack Ant. J. C. 307. the Carthaginians, endeavoured to engage Ophellias in his interest, and promised to assist him in the conquest of all Africa for himself. Ophellias, seduced by so grateful a proposal, joined Agathocles with an army of 20,000 men in the Carthaginian territories; but he had scarce arrived there, before the perfidious wretch who had drawn him thither, caused him to be slain, and kept his army in his own service. The history of the Carthaginians will inform the reader in what manner this black instance of treachery succeeded. Ptolemy, upon the death of Ophellias, recovered Libya and Cyrenaica. The wife of the latter was an Athenian lady of uncommon beauty; her name was Eurydice, and she was despoiled from Milundes. After the death of her husband she returned to Athens, where Demetrius saw her the following year, and espoused her.

SECTION VII.—DEMETRIUS, THE SON OF ANTIGONUS, SEIZES AND TAKES ATHENS, AND ESTABLISHES A DEMOCRACY IN THAT CITY. DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, WHO COMMANDED THERE, RETIRES TO THEZES. HE IS CONDEMNED TO SUFFER DEATH, AND HIS STATUES ARE THROWN DOWN. HE RETIRES INTO EGYPT. THE EXCESSIVE HONOUR RENDERED BY THE ATHENIANS TO ANTI-

GONUS AND HIS SON DEMETRIUS. THE LATTER OBTAINS A GREAT NAVAL VICTORY OVER PTOLEMY, TAKES SALAMIS, AND MAKES HIMSELF MASTER OF ALL THE ISLAND OF CYPRUS. ANTIGONUS AND DEMETRIUS ASSUME THE TITLE OF KINGS AFTER THIS VICTORY, AND THEIR EXAMPLE IS FOLLOWED BY THE OTHER PRINCES. ANTIGONUS FORMS AN ENTERPRISE AGAINST EGYPT, WHICH PROVES UNSUCCESSFUL.

Antigonus and Demetrius¹ had formed a design to restore liberty to all Greece, which was kept in a kind of slavery by Cassander, Ptolemy, and Polyperchon. These confederate princes, in order to subject the Greeks, had judged it expedient to establish, in all the cities they conquered, aristocracy, that is, the government of the rich and powerful; and it corresponds, the most of any, with regal authority. Antigonus, to engage the people in his interest, had recourse to a contrary method, by substituting a democracy, which more effectually soothed the inclination of the Greeks, by losing the power in the hands of the people. This conduct was a renewal of the policy which had been so frequently employed against the Lacedæmonians by the Athenians and Persians, and had always succeeded; and it was impossible for it to be ineffectual in this conjuncture, if supported by a good army. Antigonus could not enter upon his measures in a better manner, than by opening the scene with the signal of democratic liberty in Athens; which was not only the most jealous of it, but was likewise at the head of all the other republics.

When the siege of Athens had been resolved upon, Antigonus was told by one of his friends, that if he should happen to take that city, he ought to keep it for himself, as the key of all Greece; but he sternly rejected that proposal, and replied, "That the best and strongest key which he knew, was the friendship of the people; and that Athens, being in a manner the light by which all the world steered, would not fail to spread through all quarters the glory of his actions." It is very surprising to see in what manner, princes, who are very unjust and self-interested, can sometimes borrow the language of equity and generosity, and are solicitous of doing themselves honour by assuming the appearance of virtues to which, in reality, they are utter strangers.

Demetrius set out for Athens with 5000 talents, and a fleet of 250 ships. Demetrius Phalereus had commanded in that city for the space of ten years in the name and under the authority of Cassander; and the republic as I have already observed, never experienced a juster government, or enjoyed a series of greater tranquillity and happiness. The citizens, in gratitude to his administration, had erected as many statues to his honour as there are days in the year, namely, 360, for at that time the year, according to Ptolemy, did not exceed this number of days. An honour like this had never been granted to any citizen.

When the fleet of Demetrius approached, all the inhabitants prepared for his reception, believing the ships belonged to Ptolemy; but when the captains and principal officers were at last undeceived, they immediately had recourse to arms for their defence; every place was filled with tumult and confusion, the Athenians being reduced to a sudden and unexpected necessity of repelling an enemy who advanced upon them without being discovered, and had already made a descent: for Demetrius had entered the port, which he found entirely open, and night easily he distinguished on the deck of his galley, where with his hands he made a signal to the people to keep themselves quiet, and afford him an audience. The tumult being then calmed, he caused them to be informed aloud by a herald, who placed himself at his side, "That his father Antigonus had sent him under happy auspices, to reinstate the Athenians in the possession of their liberty; to drive the garrison out of their model, and to re-establish their laws, and ancient plan of government.

The Athenians, at this proclamation, cast their buckles from at their feet, and clapping their hands with loud acclamations of joy, crowned Demetrius to descend from his pulpit, and called him their protector and benefactor. Those who were then with Demetrius Phileterus, were unanimously of opinion, that, in the case of Antigonus was already master of the city, it would be better to receive him, though they should even be certain that he would not perform any one article of what he had promised, upon which they immediately dispatched ambassadors to him with a tender of their submission.

Demetrius received them in a gracious manner, and gave them a very favourable audience; and in order to convince them of his good disposition towards them, he gave them Antiochus of Miletus, one of his father's most intimate friends, as a hostage, at their demand. He was likewise careful to provide for the safety of Demetrius Phileterus, who, in consequence of this revolution, had more reason to be apprehensive of his destiny, than even of the enemies themselves. The reputation and virtue of this great man had inspired the young prince with the utmost respect for his person, and he sent him with a sufficient guard to Thibet, in compliance with his own request. He then told the Athenians that he was determined not to see their city, nor so much as enter within the walls, because he desired he might be to visit them, all be had entirely freed the inhabitants from subjection, by driving out the garrison that encamped upon their liberties. At the same time he ordered a large flock to be opened, and raised strong fortifications before the fortress of Megara, to deprive it of all communication with the city; after which he embarked for Megara, where Cassander had placed a strong garrison.

When he arrived at that city, he was informed that Craterus, the wife of Alexander the son of Polyperchon, who was greatly celebrated for her beauty, then resident at Patra, and was extremely desirous to see him, and to be at his devotion. He therefore left his army to the protection of Megara, and having selected a small number of persons, most disposed to attend him, he set out for Patra; and, when he had arrived within a small distance of that city, he secretly withdrew himself from his attendants, and caused a path to be cut out, as a private place, that Craterus might not be seen when she came to him. A party of the enemy happening to be apprised of this imprudent proceeding, marched against him when he least expected such a visit, and he had but just time to disguise himself in a mean habit, and elude the danger by a precipitate flight, so that he was on the point of being taken in the most ignominious manner, on account of his imprudence. The enemy seized his tent, with the riches that were in it.

The city of Megara being taken, the soldiers demanded leave to plunder the inhabitants; but the Athenians interposed for them so effectually, that the city was saved. Demetrius drove out the garrison of Cassander, and reinstated Megara in its liberties. Solon, a celebrated philosopher, lived in that city, and was sent for by Demetrius, who asked him if he had not lost something? "Nothing at all," replied Solon, "for I carry all my efforts about me;" meaning by that expression, the justice, piety, temperance, and wisdom; with the advantage of not making any thing in the chase of blessings that could be stolen from him. What could all the kings of the earth do in comparison against such a man as this, who neither desires nor dreads any thing, and who has been taught by philosophy not to consider death itself as a calamity?

Though the city was saved from pillage, yet all the houses in general were sacked and carried off by the conquerors. Demetrius, on the day of his leaving Megara, after having showed the strongest marks of regard to his protectors, told him that he left the city in him in an entire state of freedom. "What you say, my lord, is certainly true," replied the philosopher, "for you have not left so much as one stone in it."

Demetrius, when he returned to Athens, passed his troops before the port of Mounichia, and passed on the way with so much speed, that he soon drove out the garrison, and razed the fort. The Athenians, after this event, estimated him with great importance to come and reside at Athens, at the city upon which he accordingly entered it, and then surrounded the people, to whom he restored their ancient form of government, promising, at the same time, that he himself should send them 100,000 measures of corn, and all necessary materials for building 1000 galley of three benches of oars. In this manner did the Athenians recover their democracy, about fourteen years after its abolition.

They carried their gratitude to their benefactor even to superstition and idolatry, by the extreme honour they bestowed them. They first performed the rite of King on Antigonus and Demetrius, a rite which neither these nor any of the other princes had ever had the presumption to take till then, though they had assumed to themselves all the power and effects of royalty. The Athenian Eusebius honoured them with the appellation of father deities, and in token of the singularity of the honour, which gave the year its denomination, they elected annually a priest of these father deities, in whose name all the public acts and decrees were passed. They also ordered their pictures to be painted, with those of the other gods, in the wall which was carried in procession at their solemn fest, in honour of Meneus, called Phanoteus; and, by an excess of adulation scarce credible, they consecrated the spot of ground on which Demetrius descended from his chariot, and entered an altar upon it, which they called the altar of Demetrius descending from his chariot; and they added to the ten ancient tribes two new ones, which they called the tribe of Demetrius and the tribe of Antigonus. They likewise changed the names of two months in their festival, and published an order, that those who should be sent to Antigonus or Demetrius, by any decree of the people, instead of being discouraged by the common order of ambassadors, should be called Theoi, which was an appellation reserved for those who were chosen to go and offer sacrifices to the gods at Delphi, or Olympus, in the name of the cities. But even all these honours were not so strange and extravagant as the decree ordered by Demetrius, who proposed, that in order to the more effectual consecration of the buildings that were to be dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Delphi, proper persons should be dispatched to Demetrius, the father deity; and that after they had offered sacrifices to him, they should inquire of him whether deity in what manner they ought to conduct themselves, so as to combine, with the greatest piety, and the utmost devotion and magnificence, the dedication of these offerings, and that the people should comply with all the directions of the deity on that occasion.

The extreme ingratitude the Athenians discovered towards Demetrius Phileterus, was no less criminal and extravagant than the immediate acknowledgment they had just shown to their new master. They had always considered the former as too much devoted to slavery, and were offended at his suffering the Macedonian garrison to continue in their custody for the space of ten years, without making the least application to Cassander for its removal. At this, however, he had only followed the example of Phileterus, and undoubtedly considered those troops as a necessary restraint on the turbulent disposition of the Athenians. They might possibly imagine likewise, that by declaring against him, they should ingratiate themselves more effectually with the conqueror. But whatever their motives might be, they first condemned him to suffer death for contumacy; and as they were incapable of executing their resentment upon his person, because he had retired from their city, they threw down the numerous statues they had raised in honour of Demetrius Phalereus; who, when he had received intelligence of their proceedings, "At least," said he, "it will not be in their power to destroy that virtue in me by which those statues were deserved."

* Megara Demetrius regnavit, cui cognomen Philoteros fuit. Ad hoc Solon philosophus venerabilis cum quod predicaretur. Nam, quicquid videri videtur, non potest esse. Hec enim, pietas, virtus, temperantia, prudentia, et hoc quod, totum hominem pariter, cum omni potest. Cogit enim, ad hanc pariter, cum ipsa potest, cum bellum, et hinc de antiquis armis quodammodo armis, et hinc ad potest. Seneca de Cons. sup. l. v. & Ep. IX.

What estimation is to be made of those honours which, at one time, are bestowed with so much profusion, and as suddenly revoked at another; honours that had been denied to virtue, and prostituted to vicious princes, with a constant disposition to divest them of those favours upon the first impressions of discontent, and degrade them from their divinity with as much precipitation as they conferred it upon them! What weakness and stupidity do those discover, who are either touched with strong impressions of joy when they receive such honours, or appear dejected when they happen to lose them!

The Athenians still proceeded to greater extremities. Demetrius Phalereus was accused of having acted contrary to their laws in many instances during his administration, and they omitted no endeavours to render him odious. It was necessary for them to have recourse to this injustice and calumny, infamous as such proceedings were in their own nature, to escape, if possible, the just reproach of having condemned that merit and virtue which had been universally known and experienced. The statues, while they subsisted, were so many public testimonials, continually declaring in favour of the innocence of Demetrius, and against the injustice of the Athenians. Their own evidence then turned against them, and that they could not invalidate. The reputation of Demetrius was not obliterated by the destruction of his statues; and therefore it was absolutely necessary that he should appear criminal, that the Athenians might be able to represent themselves as innocent and just; and they imagined that a solemn and authentic condemnation would supply the defect of proofs, and the regularity of forms. They did not even spare his friends; and all those who had maintained a strict intimacy with him were exposed to danger. Menander, that celebrated poet, from whom Terence has transcribed the greatest part of his comedies, was on the point of being prosecuted, for no other reason than his having contracted a friendship with Demetrius.

There is reason to believe that Demetrius, after he had passed some time at Thebes, retired for refuge to Cassander, who was sensible of his merit, and testified a particular esteem for him, and that he continued under his protection as long as that prince lived. But, after the death of Cassander, as he had reason to be apprehensive of the worst that could befall him from the brutality of his son Antipater, who had caused his own mother to be destroyed, he retired into Egypt, to Ptolemy Soter, who had rendered himself illustrious by his liberalities to men of letters, and whose court was then the asylum of all persons in distress.

His reception at that court was as favourable as possible; and the king, according to Ælian, gave him the office of superintending the observation of the laws of the state.¹ He held the first rank among the friends of that prince; lived in affluence, and was in a condition to transmit presents to his friends at Athens. These were undoubtedly some of those real friends, of whom Demetrius himself declared, that they never came to him in his prosperity till he first had sent for them, but that they always visited him in his adversity without waiting for any invitation.

During his exile he composed several treatises on government, the duties of civil life, and other subjects of the like nature. This employment was a kind of sustenance to his mind,² and cherished in it those sentiments of humanity with which it was so largely replenished. How grateful a consolation and resource is this, either in solitude or a state of exile, to a man solicitous of improving his hours of leisure to the advantage of himself and the public!

The reader, when he considers the surprising number of statues erected in honour of one man, will undoubtedly have noticed the striking difference between the glorious ages of Athens and that we are now describing. A very judicious author has a fine remark upon this occasion.³ All the recompense, says he, which the Athenians formerly granted Miltiades for preserving the state, was the privilege of being represented in a picture as the principal figure, and at the head of nine other generals, animating the troops for the battle; but the same people, being afterwards softened and corrupted by the flattery of their orators, decreed above 300 statues to Demetrius Phalereus. Honours thus prodigally lavished, are no proofs of real merit, but the effects of servile adulation; and Demetrius Phalereus was culpable to a considerable degree in not opposing them to the utmost of his power, if he really was in a condition to prevent their taking place. The conduct of Cato was much more prudent,⁴ in declining several marks of distinction which the people were desirous of granting him; and when he was asked one day, why no statues had been erected to him, when Rome was crowded with so many others, "I had much rather," said he, "people should inquire why I have none, than why I have any."

True honour and distinction, says Plutarch, in the place I last cited, consist in the sincere esteem and affection of the people, founded on real merit and effectual services. These are sentiments which are so far from being extinguished by death, that they gain strength and are perpetuated from age to age: whereas a profusion of honours lavished through flattery or fear, upon bad princes and tyrants, are never known to survive them, and frequently die away before them. The same Demetrius Poliorcetes, whom we have lately seen consulted and adored as an oracle and a god, will soon have the mortification to behold the Athenians shutting their gates against him, for no other reason than the change of his fortune.

Demetrius,⁵ while he continued at Athens espoused Eurydice, the widow of Ophellus. He had already several wives, and among the rest Phila, the daughter of Antipater, whom his father compelled him to marry against his inclinations, citing to him a verse out of Euripides, which he changed into a parody by the alteration of one word: "Wherever fortune is, a person ought to marry, even against his inclination."⁶ Ancient as this maxim is, it has never grown obsolete hitherto, but retains its full force, how contrary soever it be to the sentiments of nature. Demetrius was severely censured at Athens for infamous excesses.

In a short time after this marriage,⁷ his father ordered him to quit Greece, and sent him, with a strong fleet and a numerous army, to conquer the isle of Cyprus from Ptolemy. Before he undertook this expedition, he sent ambassadors to the Rhodians, to invite them to an alliance with him against Ptolemy; but this attempt proved ineffectual, and they constantly insisted on the liberty of persevering in the neutrality they had embraced. Demetrius being sensible that the intelligence Ptolemy maintained in Rhodes had defeated his design, advanced to Cyprus where he made a descent, and marched to Scamias the capital of that island. Menelaus, the brother of Ptolemy, who had shut himself up there with most of his troops, marched out to give him battle, but was defeated, and compelled to re-enter the place after he had lost 1000 of his men, who were slain upon the spot, and 3000 more who were taken prisoners.

Menelaus not doubting but the prince, elated with this success, would undertake the siege of Salamis, made all the necessary preparations, on his part, for a vigorous defence; and while he was employing all his attention for that purpose, he sent couriers post to Ptolemy, to carry him the news of his defeat, and the siege with which he was threatened; they were also to solicit him to hasten the succours he demanded, and, if possible, to lead them in person.

Demetrius, after he had obtained an exact account of the situation of the place, as also of its strength and that of the garrison, was sensible that he had not a sufficient number of battering-rams and other military machines to reduce it; and therefore sent to Syria for a great number of expert workmen, with an infinite quantity of iron and wood, in order to make all the necessary preparations for assaulting a city of that importance; and he then first built the famous engine called Helepolis, of which I shall soon give an exact description.

When all the necessary dispositions were made, Demetrius carried on his approaches to the city, and began to batter the walls with his engines; and as they were judiciously worked, they had all the effect that could be expected. The besiegers, after various attacks, opened several large breaches in the walls, by which means the besieged were rendered incapable of sustaining the assault much longer, unless they could resolve upon some bold attempt to prevent the assault which Demetrius intended to make the next day. During the night, which had suspended the hostilities on both sides, the inhabitants of Salamis piled a vast quantity of dry wood on their walls, with an intermixture of other combustible materials, and about midnight threw them all down at the foot of the Helepolis, battering-rams, and other engines, and then kindled them with long flaming poles. The fire immediately seized them with so much violence, that they were all in flames in a very short time. The enemies ran from all quarters to extinguish the fire; but this cost them a considerable time to effect, and most of the machines were greatly damaged. Demetrius, however, was not discouraged at this disaster.

Ptolemy, upon the intelligence he received of his brother's ill success in the action against Demetrius, had caused a powerful fleet to be fitted out with all expedition, and advanced with the utmost expedition to his assistance. The battle, for which both parties prepared, after some ineffectual overtures of accommodation, created great expectations of the event, not only in the generals who were then upon the spot, but in all the absent princes and commanders. The result appeared to be uncertain; but it was very apparent that it would eventually give one of the contending parties an entire superiority over the rest. Ptolemy, who arrived with a fleet of 150 sail, had ordered Menelaus, who was then at Salamis, to come up with the sixty vessels under his command, in order to charge the rear-guard of Demetrius, and throw them into disorder, amidst the heat of the battle. But Demetrius had had the precaution to leave ten of his ships to oppose those sixty of Menelaus; for this small number was sufficient to guard the entrance into the port, which was very narrow, and prevent Menelaus from coming out. When this preliminary to the engagement was settled, Demetrius drew out his land forces, and extended them along the points of land which projected into the sea, that he might be in a condition, in case any misfortune happened, to assist those who would be obliged to save themselves by swimming; after which he sailed into the open sea with 180 galleys, and charged the fleet of Ptolemy with so much impetuosity, that he broke the line of battle. Ptolemy, finding his defeat inevitable, had immediately recourse to flight with eight galleys, which were all that escaped; for of the other vessels which composed his fleet, some were either shattered or sunk in the battle, and the others, to the number of seventy, were taken, with their whole complements. All the rest of Ptolemy's train and baggage, his domestics, friends, and wives, provision, arms, money, and machines of war, on board the store-ships which lay at anchor, were seized by Demetrius, who caused them to be carried to his camp.

Menelaus no longer made any opposition after this battle at sea, but surrendered himself to Demetrius, with the city, and all his ships and land forces, which consisted of 1200 horse and 12,000 foot.

Demetrius enhanced the glory of this victory by his humanity and generous conduct after it. He caused the slain to be interred in a magnificent manner, and generously restored liberty to Menelaus and Lenticus, one the brother and the other the son of Ptolemy, who were found among the prisoners: he also sent them back to him, with their friends and domestics, and all their baggage, without any ransom; that he might once more return the civilities he had formerly experienced from Ptolemy, on a like occasion, after the battle of Gaza. With so much more generosity, disinterestedness, and politeness, did enemies make war against each other in those days, than we now find between friends in the ordinary intercourse of life.¹ He likewise selected out of the spoils 1200 complete suits of armour, and gave them to the Athenians; the rest of the prisoners, whose number amounted to 17,000 men, without including the sailors taken with the fleet, were incorporated by him into his troops; by which means he greatly reinforced his army.

Antigonus, who continued in Syria, waited with the utmost anxiety and impatience for an account of a battle, by the event of which the fate of himself and his son was to be decided. When the courier brought him intelligence, that Demetrius had obtained a complete victory, his joy rose in proportion; and all the people, at the same instant, proclaimed Antigonus and Demetrius kings. Antigonus immediately transmitted to his son the diadem which had glittered on his own brows, and gave him the title of king in the letter he wrote to him. The Egyptians, when they were informed of this proceeding, proclaimed Ptolemy king also, that they might not seem to be dejected at their defeat, or be thought to entertain the less esteem and affection for their prince. Lysimachus and Seleucus soon followed their example, the one in Thrace, and the other in Babylon and the provinces of the East; and assumed the title of king, in their several dominions, after they had for so many years usurped all the authority, without presuming to take the title upon them, till now, which was about eighteen years after the death of Alexander. Cassander alone, though he was treated as a king by the others when they either spoke or wrote to him, continued to write his letters in his usual manner, and without affixing any addition to his name.

Plutarch observes, that this new title not only occasioned these princes to augment their train and pompous appearance, but also caused them to assume airs of pride and arrogance, and inspired them with such haughty impressions as they had never manifested till then; as if this appellation had suddenly exalted them into a species of beings different from the rest of mankind.

Seleucus had greatly increased his power in the oriental provinces.² A. M. 3699. Ant. J. C. 305. during the transactions we have been describing; for after he had killed Nicanor, whom Antigonus had sent against him, in a battle, he not only established himself in the possession of Media, Assyria, and Babylon, but reduced Persia, Bactriana, Hyrcania, and all the provinces on this side the Indus, which had formerly been conquered by Alexander.

Antigonus,³ on his side, to improve the victory his son had obtained in Cyprus, assembled an army of 100,000 men in Syria, with an intention to invade Egypt. He flattered himself that conquest would readily extend his arms, and that he should divest Ptolemy of that kingdom, with as much ease as he had taken Cyprus from him. Whilst he was conducting this great army by land, Demetrius followed him with his fleet, which coasted along the shore to Gaza, where the father and son concerted the measures each of them were to pursue. The pilots advised them to wait till the setting of the Pleiades, and defer their departure only for eight days, because the sea was then very tempestuous; but the impatience of Antigonus to surprise Ptolemy, before his preparations were completed, caused him to disregard that salutary advice. Demetrius was ordered to make a descent in one of the mouths of the Nile, whilst Antigonus was to endeavour to open a passage by land, into the heart of the country; but neither the one nor the other succeeded in his expedition. The fleet of Demetrius sustained great damage by violent storms; and Ptolemy had taken such effectual precautions to secure the mouths of the Nile, as rendered it impracticable to Demetrius to land his troops. Antigonus, on the other hand, after enduring many hardships in crossing the deserts that lie between Palestine and Egypt, had much greater difficulties still to surmount, and found it impossible to pass the first arm of the Nile in his march; such judicious orders had been given by Ptolemy, and so advantageously were his troops posted at all the passes and avenues; but what was still more distressing to Antigonus than all the rest, his soldiers daily deserted from him in great numbers.

Ptolemy had sent out boats on several parts of the river where the enemies resorted for water, and caused it to be proclaimed on his part, from those vessels, that every deserter from their troops should receive from him two mine, and every officer a talent. So considerable a recompense soon allured great numbers to receive it, especially the mercenaries in the pay of Antigonus; nor were they prevailed upon by money alone, as their inclinations to serve Ptolemy were much stronger than their motives to continue under Antigonus, whom they considered as an old man, difficult to be pleased, imperious, morose, and severe; whereas Ptolemy rendered himself amiable, by his gentle disposition and engaging behaviour to all who approached him.

Antigonus, after he had hovered to no effect on the frontiers of Egypt, and even till his provisions began to fail him, becoming sensible of his inability to enter Egypt, and finding that his army decreased every day by sickness and desertion, and that it was impossible for him to subsist his remaining troops any longer in that country, was obliged to return into Syria, in a very shameful manner, after having lost in this unfortunate expedition a great number of his land forces, and many of his ships.

Ptolemy, having offered a sacrifice to the gods, in gratitude for the protection they had granted him, sent to acquaint Lysimachus, Cassander, and Seleucus, with the happy event of that campaign, and to renew the alliance between them, against the common enemy. This was the last attack he had to sustain for the crown of Egypt, and it greatly contributed to fix it upon his head, in consequence of the prudent measures he pursued. Ptolemy, the astronomer, therefore, fixes the commencement of his reign at this period, and afterwards points out the several years of its duration, in his chronological canon. He begins the epocha on the seventh of November, nineteen years after the death of Alexander the Great.

SECTION VIII.—DEMETRIUS FORMS THE SIEGE OF RHODES, WHICH HE RAISES A YEAR AFTER, BY CONCLUDING A TREATY MUCH TO THE HONOUR OF THE CITY. HELEPOLIS, A FAMOUS MACHINE. THE COLLOSSUS OF RHODES. PROTEGENES, A CELEBRATED PAINTER, SPARED DURING THE SIEGE.

A. M. 3700. fourscore years of age at that Ant. J. C. 304. time,¹ and as he had then contracted a gross habit of body, and consequently was but little qualified for the activity of a military life, he made use of his son's services, who from the experience he had already acquired, and the success which attended him, transacted the most important affairs with great ability. The father, for this reason, was not offended at his expensive luxury and intemperance; for Demetrius, during peace, abandoned himself to the greatest excesses of all kinds, without the least regard to decorum. In times of war, indeed, he acted a very different part; he was then a quite different man, vigilant, active, laborious, and invincible by fatigues. Whether he indulged in pleasure, or applied to serious affairs, he entirely devoted himself to the one or the other; and for the time he engaged in either was incapable of moderation. He had an inventive genius; and an inquisitive turn of mind, actuated by a love for the sciences. He never employed his natural industry, in frivolous and insignificant amusements, like many other kings, some of whom, as Plutarch observes, valued themselves for their expertness in playing on instruments, others in painting, and some in their dexterity in the turner's art, with a hundred other qualities of private men, but not one of a prince. His application to the mechanic arts had something great and truly royal in it; his galleys, with fifteen benches of oars, were the admiration of his enemies, who beheld them sailing along their coasts; and his engines called helepolis, were a surprising spectacle to those whom he besieged. They were exceedingly useful to him in the war with Rhodes, with the conduct of which his father had charged him at the time we are now speaking of.

Among the islands called Sporades, Rhodes held the first rank, as well for the fertility of its soil, as the safety of its ports and roads, which, on that account, were resorted to by great numbers of trading ships from all parts. It then formed a small, but very powerful state, whose friendship was courted by all princes, and which was studious, on its own part, to keep upon good terms with them all, by observing an exact neutrality, and carefully declining any declaration in favour of one against another, in the wars that arose in those times. As the inhabitants were limited to a little island, all their power flowed from their riches, and their riches from their commerce, which it was their main interest to preserve as free as possible with the Mediterranean states, which all contributed to its prosperity. The Rhodians, by persisting in so prudent a conduct, had rendered their city very flourishing; and as they enjoyed continual peace, they became extremely opulent. Notwithstanding the seeming neutrality they maintained, their inclination, as well as interest, peculiarly attached them to Ptolemy, because the principal and most advantageous branches of their commerce flowed from Egypt. When Antigonus, therefore, demanded succours of them in his war with Cyprus, they entreated him not to compel them to declare against Ptolemy, their ancient friend and ally; but this answer, prudent and well concerted as it really was, drew upon them the displeasure of Antigonus, which he expressed in the severest menaces; and, when he returned from his expedition to Egypt, he sent his son Demetrius with a fleet and army, to chastise their insolent temerity, as he termed it, and likewise to reduce them to his obedience.

The Rhodians, who foresaw the impending storm, had sent to all the princes their allies, and to Ptolemy, in particular, to implore their assistance; and caused it to be represented to the latter, that their attachment to his interest had drawn upon them the danger to which they were then exposed.

The preparations on each side were immense. Demetrius arrived before Rhodes with a very numerous fleet, for he had 200 ships of war of different dimensions; and more than 170 transports, which carried about 40,000 men, without including the cavalry, and the succours he received from pirates. He had likewise near 1000 small vessels laden with provisions, and all other necessary accommodations for an army. The expectation of the vast booty to be acquired by the capture of so rich a city as Rhodes, had allured great numbers of soldiers to join Demetrius in this expedition. This prince, who had the most fertile and inventive genius that ever was, for attacking places, and forming machines of war, had brought with him an infinite number of the latter. He was sensible that he had to deal with a brave people, and very able commanders, who had acquired great experience in maritime affairs; and that the besieged had above 800 military machines almost as formidable as his own.

Demetrius, upon his arrival at the island, landed in order to take a view of the most commodious situation for assaulting the place. He likewise sent out parties to lay the country waste on all sides, and, at the same time, caused another body of his troops to cut down the trees, and demolish the houses in the parts adjacent to Rhodes, and then employed them as materials to fortify his camp with a triple palisade.

The Rhodians, on their part, prepared for a vigorous defence. All persons of merit, and reputation for military affairs in the countries in alliance with the Rhodians, threw themselves into the city, as much for the honour of serving a republic, equally celebrated for its gratitude and the courage of its citizens, as to manifest their own valour and abilities in the defence of that place, against one of the greatest captains, and the most expert in the conduct of sieges, that antiquity ever produced.

They began with dismissing from the city all such persons as were useless; and the number of those who remained, and were capable of bearing arms, amounted to 6000 citizens, and 1000 strangers. Liberty, and the right of denizens, were promised to such slaves as should distinguish themselves by their bravery, and the public engaged to pay the masters the full price for each of them. It was likewise publicly declared, that the citizens would bestow an honourable interment on those who should lose their lives in any engagement, and would also provide for the subsistence of their parents, wives, and children, and portion the daughters in marriage; and that when the sons should be of an age capable of bearing arms, they should be presented with a complete suit of armour, on the public theatre, at the great solemnity of the Bacchanalia.

This decree kindled an incredible ardour in all ranks of men. The rich came in crowds with money to defray the expense of the siege, and the soldiers' pay.* The workmen redoubled their industry in making arms that were excellent, as well for the promptitude of execution, as the beauty of the work. Some were employed in making catapultas and balistas; others formed different machines equally necessary; a third class repaired the breaches of the walls; while several others supplied them with stone. In a word, every thing was in motion throughout the city, each striving with emulation to distinguish himself on that occasion; so that a zeal so ardent and universal was never known before.

The besieged first sent out three good sailers against a small fleet of sultans and merchants, who were bringing a supply of provisions to the enemy: they sunk a great number of their vessels, burnt several, and carried into the city such of the prisoners as were in a condition to pay their ransom. The Rhodians gained a considerable sum of money by this expedition; for it was mutually agreed, that 100 drachmas (about five and twenty pounds) should be paid for every person that was a freeman, and half that sum for a slave.

The siege of Rhodes has been represented as the masterpiece of Demetrius, and the greatest instance of the fertility of his genius in resources and inventions. He began the attack from the sea, in order to make himself master of the port, and the towers which defended the entrance.

In order to accomplish this design, he caused two tortoises† to be erected on two flat-bottomed vessels joined together, to facilitate his approach to the places he intended to batter. One of these was stronger and more solid than the other, in order to cover the men from those enormous masses which the besieged discharged from the towers and walls by means of the catapultas planted upon them; the other was of a lighter structure, and designed to shelter the soldiers from flights of darts and arrows. Two towers of four stories were erected at the same time, which exceeded in height the towers that defended the entrance into the port, and these were intended to be used in battering the latter with volleys of stones and darts. Each of these towers was placed upon two ships strongly bound together.

Demetrius, besides, caused a kind of floating barricado to be erected in front of these tortoises and towers on a long beam of timber, four feet thick, through which stakes, armed at the end with large spikes of iron, were driven. These stakes were disposed horizontally, with their spikes projecting forward, in order to prevent the vessels of the port from shattering the work with their beaks.

He likewise selected out of his fleet the largest vessels, on the side of which he erected a rampart of planks with little windows easy to be opened. He there placed the best Cretan archers and slingers in all his army, and furnished them with an infinite number of bows, small balistas or cross-bows, slings and catapultas, with other engines for shooting; in order to gall the workmen of the city employed in raising and repairing the walls of the port.

The Rhodians, seeing the besiegers turn all their efforts against that quarter, were no less industrious to defend it; in order to accomplish that design, they raised two machines upon an adjoining eminence, and formed three others, which they placed on large snips of burden, at the mouth of the little haven. A body of archers and slingers was likewise posted on each of these situations, with a prodigious quantity of stones, darts, and arrows of all kinds. The same orders were also given with respect to the ships of burden in the great port.

When Demetrius advanced with his ships and all his armament, to begin the attack on the ports, such a violent tempest arose as rendered it impossible for him to accomplish any of his operations that day; but the sea growing calm about night, he took the advantage of the darkness, and advanced, without being perceived by the enemy, to the great harbour: he made himself master of a neighbouring eminence, about 500 paces from the wall, and posted there 400 soldiers, who fortified themselves immediately with strong palisades.

The next morning, Demetrius caused his batteries to advance with the sound of trumpets, and the shouts of his whole army: and they at first produced all the effect he proposed from them. A great number of the besieged were slain in this attack, and several breaches were opened in the mole which covered the port: but they were not very advantageous to the besiegers, who were always repulsed by the Rhodians; and after a loss nearly equal on both sides, Demetrius was obliged to retire from the port with his ships and machines, to be out of the reach of the enemy's arrows.

The besieged, who had learned to their cost what advantage might be taken of the darkness of the night, caused several fire-ships to sail out of the port during the darkness, in order to burn the tortoises and wooden towers which the enemy had erected; but as unfortunately they were not able to force the floating barricado which sheltered them, they were obliged to return into the port. The Rhodians lost some of their fire-ships in this expedition, but the mariners saved themselves by swimming.

The next day, the prince ordered a general attack to be made against the port and the walls of the place, with the sound of trumpets and shouts of his whole army, thinking by those means to spread terror among the besieged: but they were so far from being intimidated, that they sustained the attack with incredible vigour, and discovered the same intrepidity for the space of eight days that it continued; and actions of astonishing bravery were performed on both sides during that long interval.

Demetrius, taking advantage of the eminence which his troops had seized, gave orders for erecting upon it a battery of several engines, which discharged great stones of 150 pounds in weight, against the walls and towers, the latter of which tottered with the repeated shocks, and several breaches were soon made in the walls. The besiegers advanced with great fury to seize the mole which defended the entrance into the port; but as this post was of the utmost importance to the Rhodians, they spared no pains to repulse the besiegers, who had already made a considerable progress. This they at last effected, by a shower of stones and arrows, which they discharged upon their enemies with so much rapidity, and for such a length of time, that they were obliged to retire in confusion, after losing a great number of their men.

The ardour of the besiegers was not diminished by this repulse, and they rather appeared more animated than ever against the Rhodians. They began the scalade by land and sea at the same time, and employed the besieged so effectually, that they scarce knew to what quarter to run for the defence of the place. The attack was carried on with the utmost fury on all sides, and the besieged defended themselves with the greatest intrepidity. Great numbers were thrown from the ladders to the earth, and miserably bruised; several even of the principal officers, got to the top of the wall, where they were covered with wounds, and taken prisoners by the enemy; so that Demetrius, notwithstanding all his valour, thought it necessary to retreat, in order to repair his engines, which were almost entirely destroyed by so many attacks, as well as the vessels that carried them.

After the prince had retreated from Rhodes, immediate care was taken to bury the dead; the beaks also of the ships, with the other spoils that had been taken from the enemy, were carried to the temple, and the workmen were indefatigable in repairing the breaches of the walls.

Demetrius, having employed seven days in refitting his ships, and repairing his engines, set sail again, with a fleet as formidable as the former, and steered, with a fair wind, directly for the port, which he was most anxious to gain, as he conceived it impracticable to reduce the place till he had first made himself master of that. Upon his arrival, he caused a vast quantity of lighted torches, flaming straw, and arrows to be discharged, in order to set fire to the vessels that were riding there, while his engines battered the mole without intermission. The besieged, who expected attacks of this nature, exerted themselves with so much vigour and activity, that they soon extinguished the flames which had seized the vessels in the port.

At the same time they caused three of their largest ships to sail out of the port, under the command of Exacestes, one of their bravest officers, with orders to attack the enemy, and exert the utmost efforts to reach the vessels that carried the tortoises and wooden towers, and to charge them in such a manner with the beaks of theirs, as might either sink them, or render them entirely useless. These orders were executed with surprising expedition and address; and the three galleys, after they had shattered and broken through the floating barricado already mentioned, drove their beaks with so much violence into the sides of the enemy's barks, on which the machines were erected, that the water was immediately seen to flow into them through several openings. Two of them were already sunk, but the third was towed along by the galleys, and joined the main fleet; and dangerous as it was to attack them in that situation, the Rhodians, through a blind and precipitate ardour, ventured to attempt it. But as the inequality was too great to admit them to come off with success, Exacestes, with the officer who commanded under him, and some others, after having fought with all the bravery imaginable, were taken with the galley in which they were; the other two regained the port, after sustaining many dangers, and most of the men also arrived there by swimming.

Unfortunate as this last attack had proved to Demetrius, he was determined to undertake another; and in order to succeed in that design, he ordered a machine of a new invention to be built, of thrice the height and breadth of those he had lately lost. When this was completed, he caused it to be placed near the port which he was resolved to force; but at the instant they were preparing to work it, a dreadful tempest arose at sea, and sunk it to the bottom, with the vessels on which it had been raised.

The besieged, who were careful to improve all opportunities, employed the time afforded them by the continuance of the tempest, in regaining the eminence near the port, which the enemy had carried in the first assault, and where they afterwards fortified themselves. The Rhodians attacked it, and were repulsed several times; but the forces of Demetrius who defended it, perceiving fresh troops continually pouring upon them, and that it was in vain for them to expect any relief, were obliged, at last, to surrender themselves prisoners, to the number of 400 men.

This series of fortunate events was succeeded by the arrival of 500 men from Cnossus, a city of Crete, to the assistance of the Rhodians, and also of 500 more whom Ptolemy sent from Egypt, most of them being Rhodians, who had listed themselves among the troops of that prince.

Demetrius being extremely mortified to see all his batteries on the side of the harbour rendered ineffectual, resolved to employ them by land, in order to carry the place by assault, or reduce it to the necessity of capitulating. He, therefore, prepared materials of every kind, and formed a machine called helepolis, which was larger than any that had ever been invented before. The basis on which it stood was square, and each of its sides was seventy-five feet wide. The machine itself was an assemblage of large square beams, riveted together with iron, and the whole mass rested upon eight wheels that were made proportionable to the weight of the superstructure. The fellos of these wheels were three feet thick, and strengthened with large iron plates.

In order to facilitate and vary the movements of the helepolis, care had been taken to place casters¹ under it, by which the machine was made movable any way.

From each of the four angles a large column of wood was carried up to the height of about 150 feet, inclining towards each other. The machine was composed of nine stories, whose dimensions gradually lessened in the ascent. The first story was supported by forty-three beams, and the last by no more than nine.

Three sides of the machine were plated over with iron, to prevent its being damaged by the fires that were launched from the city.

In the front of each story were little windows, whose form and dimensions corresponded with the nature of the arrows that were to be shot from the machine. Over each window was a kind of curtain made with leather, stuffed with wool: this was let down by a machine for that purpose, and the intention of it was to break the force of whatever should be discharged by the enemy against it.

Each story had two large staircases, one for the ascent of the men, and the other for their descent.

This machine was moved forward by 3400 of the strongest and most vigorous men in the whole army, but the art with which it was built greatly facilitated the motion.

Demetrius also gave directions for building a great number of other machines, of different magnitudes, and for various uses; he also employed his seamen in levelling the ground over which the machines were to move, which was 100 fathoms in length. The number of artizans and others employed on these works, amounted to near 30,000 men, by which means they were finished with incredible expedition.

¹ Monsieur Rolin informs us, in a note, that he was obliged to retain the Greek term (Antistrepia) for want of a proper French word to render it by; but as the English language is not so defective in that particular, the translator has expressed the Greek by the word caster, which, as well as the original word, signifies a wheel placed under a piece of work, in such a manner as to render it convertible on all sides, like those little wheels affixed under the feet of beds, by which they move with ease to any part of the room.

The Rhodians were not indolent during these formidable preparations, but employed their time in raising a counter-wall, on the track of ground where Demetrius intended to batter the walls of the city with the helepolis; and, in order to accomplish this work, they demolished the wall which surrounded the theatre, as also several neighbouring houses, and even some temples, having solemnly promised the gods to build more magnificent structures for the celebration of their worship after the siege should be raised.

When they knew that the enemy had quitted the sea, they sent out nine of their best ships of war, divided into three squadrons, the command of which they gave to three of their bravest sea-officers, who returned with a very rich booty, some galleys, and several smaller vessels, which they had taken, as also a great number of prisoners. They had likewise seized a galley richly laden, in which were large quantities of tapestry, with other furniture, and a variety of rich robes, intended by Phila as a present to her husband Demetrius, and accompanied with letters which she herself had written to him. The Rhodians sent the whole, and even the letters, to Ptolemy, which exceedingly exasperated Demetrius. In this proceeding, says Plutarch, they did not imitate the polite conduct of the Athenians, who having once seized some of the couriers of Philip, with whom they were then at war, opened all the packets but those of Olympias, which they sent to Philip sealed as they were. There are some rules of decency and honour which ought to be inviolably observed even with enemies.

While the ships of the republic were employed in taking the prizes already mentioned, a great commotion happened at Rhodes, respecting the statues of Antigonos and Demetrius, which had been erected in honour of them, and till then had been held in the utmost veneration. Some of the principal citizens were solicitous, in a public assembly, for an order to destroy the statues of those princes who then harassed them with such a cruel war; but the people, who were more discreet and moderate on this occasion than their chiefs, would not suffer that proposal to be executed. So wise and equitable a conduct, exclusively of all events, did the Rhodians do small honour; but in case their city should be taken, it could not fail to inspire the conqueror with impressions in their favour.

Demetrius, having tried several mines without success, from their being all discovered, and rendered ineffectual by the vigilant conduct and activity of the besieged, gave orders and made the necessary dispositions for a general assault; in order to which the helepolis was moved to a situation from whence the city might be battered with the best effect. Each story of this formidable engine was furnished with catapultas and ballistas proportioned in their size to the dimensions of the place. It was likewise supported and fortified on two of its sides, by four small machines called tortoises, each which had a covered gallery, to secure those who should either enter the helepolis, or issue out of it, to execute different orders. On the two other sides was a battering-ram of a prodigious size, consisting of a piece of timber thirty fathoms in length, armed with iron terminating in a point, and as strong as the beak of a galley. These engines were mounted on wheels, and were driven forward to batter the walls during the attack with incredible force by near 1000 men.

When every thing was ready, Demetrius ordered the trumpets to sound, and the general assault to be given on all sides, both by sea and land. In the heat of the attack, and when the walls were already shaken by the battering-rams, ambassadors arrived from the Cnidians, and earnestly solicited Demetrius to suspend the assault, giving him hopes, at the same time, that they should prevail upon the besieged to submit to an honourable capitulation. A suspension of arms was accordingly granted; but the Rhodians refusing to capitulate on the conditions proposed to them, the attack was renewed with so much fury, and all the machines co-operated so effectually, that a large tower built with square stones, and the wall that flanked it, were battered down. The besieged fought like lions in the breach, and repulsed their enemies.

In this conjuncture, the vessels which Ptolemy had freighted with 300,000 measures of corn, and different kinds of pulse for the Rhodians, arrived very seasonably in the port, notwithstanding all the efforts of the enemy's ships which cruised in the neighbourhood to intercept them. A few days after this relief, two other small fleets sailed into the port; one of which was sent by Cassander, with 100,000 bushels of barley; the other came from Lysimachus, with 400,000 bushels of wheat, and as much barley. This seasonable and abundant supply, which was received when the city began to be in want of provisions, inspired the besieged with new courage; and they resolved not to surrender till the last extremity.

While they were animated in this manner, they attempted to fire the enemy's machines, and with this view, ordered a numerous body of soldiers to march out of the city towards midnight with torches, and all kinds of kindled wood. These troops advanced to the batteries, and set them on fire, and at the same time innumerable arrows were shot from the wall, to support the detachment against those who should endeavour to extinguish the flames. The besiegers lost great numbers of their men on this occasion, because they were incapable, amidst the obscurity of the night, either to see or avoid the volleys of arrows discharged upon them. Several plates of iron happening to fall from the helepolis during the conflagration, the Rhodians advanced with impetuosity, in order to set it on fire: but as the troops within quenched it with water as fast as the flames were kindled, they could not effect their design. However, Demetrius being apprehensive that all his machines would be consumed, caused them to be removed with all possible expedition.

Demetrius, being curious to know what number of machines the besieged had employed in casting arrows, caused all those, which had been shot from the place in the attack that night, to be gathered up; and when these were counted, and a proper computation made, he found that the inhabitants must have more than 800 engines, of different dimensions, for discharging fires, and about 1500 for arrows. The prince was struck with consternation at this number, as he did not imagine the city could have made such formidable preparations. He caused his dead to be interred, gave directions for curing those who were wounded, and was as expeditious as possible in repairing the machines which had been dismantled and rendered useless.

The besieged, in order to take advantage of the relaxation they enjoyed by the removal of the machines, were industrious to fortify themselves against the new assault, for which their enemies were then preparing. To this purpose they began with opening a large and deep ditch behind the breach, to obstruct the passage of the enemy into the city; after which they raised a substantial wall, in the form of a crescent, along the ditch; which would cost the enemies a new attack.

As their attention was devoted, at the same time, to every other emergency, they detached a squadron of the best sailing ships in their port, which took a great number of vessels laden with provision and ammunition for Demetrius, and brought them into the port. These were soon followed by a numerous fleet of small vessels freighted with corn and other necessities, sent them by Ptolemy, with 1500 men, commanded by Antigonos of Macedonia.

Demetrius, having repaired his machines, caused them all to advance near the city, when a second embassy arrived at the camp from the Athenians, and some other states of Greece, on the same subject as the former, but with as little success. The king, whose imagination was fruitful of expedients for succeeding in his projects, detached 1500 of his best troops, under the command of Alcimus and Marcus, with orders to enter the breach at midnight, and force the intrenchments behind it. They were then to possess themselves of the parts adjacent to the theatre, where they would be in a condition to maintain their ground, if they could but once make themselves masters of it. In order to facilitate the execution of so important and dangerous an expedition, and amuse the enemy with false attacks, he at the same time caused all the trumpets to sound a charge, and the city to be attacked on all sides, both by sea and land, that the besieged finding sufficient employment in all parts, the 1500 men might have an opportunity of forcing the intrenchments which covered the breach, and afterwards of seizing all the advantageous posts about the theatre. This feint had all the success the prince expected from it. The troops having shouted from all quarters, as if they were advancing to a general assault, the detachment commanded by Alcimus entered the breach, and made such a vigorous attack upon those who defended the ditch, and the crescent which covered it, that after they had killed a great number of their enemies, and put the rest into confusion, they seized the posts adjacent to the theatre, where they maintained themselves.

The alarm was very great in the city, and all the chiefs who commanded there despatched orders to their officers and soldiers forbidding them to quit their posts, or make the least movement whatever. After which they placed themselves at the head of a chosen body of their own troops, and of those who were newly arrived from Egypt, and with them poured upon the detachment which had advanced as far as the theatre; but the obscurity of the night rendered it impracticable to dislodge them from the posts they had seized, and the day no sooner appeared, than a universal cry of the besiegers was heard from all quarters, by which they endeavoured to animate those who had entered the place, and inspire them with a resolution to maintain their ground, where they might soon expect succours. This terrible cry drew floods of tears and dismal groans from the populace, women, and children, who continued in the city, and concluded themselves inevitably lost. The battle, however, continued with great vigour near the theatre, and the Macedonians defended their post with an intrepidity that astonished their enemies, till at last the Rhodians prevailing by their numbers, and perpetual supplies of fresh troops, the detachment, after having seen Alcimus and Mancius slain on the spot, were obliged to submit to superior force, and abandon a post it was no longer possible to maintain. Great numbers of them fell on the spot, and the rest were taken prisoners.

The ardour of Demetrius was rather augmented than abated by this check, and he was making the necessary dispositions for a new assault, when he received letters from his father Antigonus, by which he was directed to take all possible measures for the conclusion of a peace with the Rhodians. He then wanted some plausible pretext for discontinuing the siege, and chance supplied him with it. At that very instant deputies from Ætolia arrived at his camp to solicit him anew to grant a peace to the Rhodians, to which they found him not so averse as before.

If what Vegetius relates of the helepolis be true, and indeed Vitruvius seems to confirm it with a small variation of circumstances, it might possibly be another motive that contributed not a little to dispose Demetrius to a peace. That prince was preparing to advance his helepolis against the city, when a Rhodian engineer contrived an expedient to render it entirely useless; he opened a mine under the walls of the city, and continued it to the way over which the tower was to pass the ensuing day in order to approach the walls. The besiegers not suspecting any stratagem of that nature moved on the tower to the place undermined; which being incapable of supporting so enormous a load, sunk in under the machine, which buried itself so deep in the earth, that it was impossible to draw it out again. This was one inconvenience to which these formidable engines were obnoxious; and the two authors whom I have cited declare, that this accident determined Demetrius to raise the siege; and it is, at least, very probable that it contributed not a little to his taking that resolution.

The Rhodians, on their part, were as desirous of an accommodation as himself, provided it could be effected upon reasonable terms. Ptolemy, in promising them fresh succours, much more considerable than the former, had earnestly exhorted them not to lose a favourable occasion, if it should offer itself. Besides which, they were sensible of the extreme necessity they were under of putting an end to the siege, which could not but prove fatal to them at last. This consideration induced them to listen with pleasure to the proposals made them, and the treaty was concluded soon after upon the following terms: That the republic of Rhodes, and all its citizens, should retain the enjoyment of their rights, privileges, and liberty, without being subjected to any power whatsoever. The alliance they had always had with Antigonus, was to be confirmed and renewed, with an obligation to take up arms for him in any war in which he should be engaged, provided it was not against Ptolemy. The city was also to deliver 100 hostages, to be chosen by Demetrius, for the effectual performance of the articles stipulated between them. When these hostages were given, the army decamped from before Rhodes, after having besieged it a year.

Demetrius, who was then reconciled with the Rhodians, was desirous, before his departure, to give them a proof of that disposition; and accordingly presented them with all the machines of war he had employed in that siege. These were afterwards sold for 300 talents (about 300,000 crowns,) which they employed, with an additional sum of their own, in making the famous Colossus, which was reputed one of the seven wonders of the world. It was a statue of the sun, of so stupendous a size, that ships in full sail passed between its legs: the height of it was seventy cubits, or 105 feet, and few men could clasp his thumb with their arms. It was the work of Chares of Lindus, and employed him for the space of twelve years. Sixty-six years after its erection, it was thrown down by an earthquake; of which we shall speak in the sequel of this history.

The Rhodians, to testify their gratitude to Ptolemy for the assistance he had given them in so dangerous a conjuncture, consecrated a grove to that prince, after they had consulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, to give the action an air of solemnity; and, to honour him the more, erected a magnificent edifice within it. They built a sumptuous portico, and continued it along each side of the square which encompassed the grove, and contained a space of 400 fathoms. This portico was called the Ptolemaion; and, out of flattery, no less customary in those days than it was impious, divine honours were rendered to him in that place: and in order to perpetuate their deliverer in this war by another method, they gave him the appellation of Soter, which signifies a saviour, and is used by the historians to distinguish him from the other Ptolemies, who were his successors on the throne of Egypt.

I was unwilling to interrupt the series of events that occurred at this siege, and, therefore, reserved for this place one that greatly redounds to the honour of Demetrius. It relates to his taste for the arts, and the esteem he entertained for those who were distinguished by peculiar merit in them; a circumstance not a little conducive to the glory of a prince.

Rhodes was at that time the residence of a celebrated painter, named Protogenes, who was a native of Caunus, a city of Caria, which was then subject to the Rhodians. The apartment where he painted was in the suburbs, without the city, when Demetrius first besieged it; but neither the presence of the enemies who then surrounded him, nor the noise of arms that perpetually rung in his ears, could induce him to quit his habitation, or discontinue his work. The king was surprised at his conduct; and he one day asked him his reasons for such a proceeding. "It is," replied he, "because I am sensible you have declared war against the Rhodians, and not against the sciences." Nor was he deceived in that opinion, for Demetrius actually showed himself their protector. He placed a guard round his house, that the artist might enjoy tranquillity, or, at least, be secure from danger, amidst the tumult and ravages of war. He frequently went to see him work, and could never sufficiently admire his application, and his surprising excellency in his art.

The masterpiece of this painter was the Ialysus, an historical picture of a fabulous hero of that name, whom the Rhodians acknowledged as their founder.¹ Protagenes had employed seven years in finishing this piece; and when Apelles first saw it, he was transported with so much admiration, that his speech failed him for some time; and when he at last began to recover from his astonishment, he cried out, "Prodigious work indeed! Admirable performance! It has not, however, the graces I give my works, and which has raised their reputation to the skies." If we may credit Pliny, Protagenes, during the whole time he was working on this picture, condemned himself to a very rigid and abstemious life;² that the delicacy of his taste and imagination might not be affected by his diet. This picture was carried to Rome, and consecrated in the temple of Peace, where it remained in the time of Pliny; but it was destroyed at last by fire.

The same Pliny pretends that Rhodes was saved by this picture, because as it hung in the only quarter by which it was possible for Demetrius to take the city, he rather chose to abandon his conquest,³ than expose so precious a monument of art to the danger of being consumed in the flames. This, indeed, would have been carrying his taste and value for painting into a surprising extreme; but we have already seen the true reasons which obliged Demetrius to raise the siege.

One of the figures in this picture was a dog,⁴ that was admired by all the good judges, and had cost the painter great pains, without his being able to express his idea to his own satisfaction, though he was sufficiently pleased with all the rest of the work. He endeavoured to represent the dog panting, and with his mouth foaming as after a long chase; and employed all the skill he was capable of exerting on this part of his subject, without being able to content himself. Art, in his opinion, was more visible than it ought to have been; a mere resemblance would not suffice, and almost nothing but reality itself would satisfy him. He was desirous that the foam should not seem painted, but actually flowing out of the mouth of the dog. He frequently retouched it, and suffered a degree of torture from his anxiety to express those simple traces of nature, of which he had formed the ideas in his mind. All his attempts were however ineffectual, till at last, in a violent emotion of rage and despair, he darted at the picture the sponge with which he used to wipe out his colours, and chance accomplished that which art had not been able to effect.

This painter is censured for being too difficult to be pleased, and for retouching his pictures too frequently. It is certain that, though Apelles almost regarded him as his master,⁵ and allowed him a number of excellent qualities, yet he condemned in him the defect of not being able to quit the pencil and finish his works; a defect highly pernicious in eloquence as well as painting. "We ought," says Cicero,⁶ "to know how far we should go; and Apelles justly censured some painters for not knowing when to have done."

SECTION IX.—THE EXPEDITION OF SELEUCUS INTO INDIA. DEMETRIUS COMPELS CASSANDER TO RAISE THE SIEGE OF ATHENS. THE EXCESSIVE HONOURS PAID HIM IN THAT CITY. A LEAGUE BETWEEN PTOLEMY, SELEUCUS, CASSANDER, AND LYSIMACHUS, AGAINST ANTIGONUS AND DEMETRIUS. THE BATTLE OF IPSUS, A CITY OF PHRYGIA, WHEREIN ANTIGONUS IS SLAIN, AND DEMETRIUS PUT TO FLIGHT.

THE farther we advance into the history of Alexander's successors, the more easily may we discover the spirit by which they were constantly actuated hitherto, and by which they will still appear to be influenced. They at first concealed their real dispositions, by nominating children, or persons of weak capacities, to the regal dignity, in order to disguise their own ambitious views. But as soon as all the family of Alexander was destroyed, they threw off the mask, and discovered themselves in their proper colours, and such as, in reality, they had always been. They were all equally solicitous to support themselves in their several governments; to become entirely independent; to assume an absolute sovereignty; and enlarge the limits of their provinces and kingdoms, at the expense of those other governors who were weaker or less successful than themselves. For this purpose they employed the force of their arms, and entered into alliances, which they were always ready to violate when they could derive more advantages from others; and they renewed them with the same facility from the same motives. They considered the vast conquests of Alexander as an inheritance destitute of a master, which prudence obliged them to secure for themselves, in as large portions as possible, without any apprehensions of being reproached as usurpers, for the acquisition of countries gained by the victories of the Macedonians, but not the property of any particular person. This was the great motive of all the enterprises in which they engaged.

Seleucus, as we formerly observed, was master of all the countries A. M. 3701. between the Euphrates and the Indus. Ant. J. C. 303. and was desirous of acquiring those that lay beyond the latter of those rivers. In order, therefore, to improve the favourable opportunity which now offered, when he himself was in alliance with Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus, and when the forces of Antigonus were divided, and Demetrius was employed in the siege of Rhodes, and in aving the republics of Greece; and while Antigonus himself was only intent upon becoming master of Syria and Phœnicia, and attacking Ptolemy even in Egypt itself, he thought it incumbent on him to take advantage of this diversion, which weakened the only enemy he had to fear; for carrying his arms against the people of India, who were included in his lot by the general partition, and whom he hoped it would be very practicable for him to subdue if he made a sudden irruption into that country, when it was altogether unexpected by king Sandrocotta. This person was an Indian of very mean extraction, who, under the specious pretext of delivering his country from the tyranny of foreigners, had raised an army, and augmented it so well by degrees, that he found means to drive the Macedonians out of all the provinces of India which Alexander had conquered, and to establish himself in them, while the successors of that monarch were engaged in mutual wars with each other. Seleucus passed the Indus in order to regain those provinces; but when he found that Sandrocotta had rendered himself absolute master of all India, and had likewise an army of 600,000 nien, with a prodigious number of elephants, he did not judge it prudent to attack so potent a prince; but entered into a treaty with him, by which he agreed to renounce all his pretensions to that country, provided Sandrocotta would furnish him with 500 elephants; upon which terms a peace was concluded. This was the final result of Alexander's Indian conquests! this the fruit of so much blood shed to gratify the frantic ambition of one prince! Seleucus shortly after led his troops into the West against Antigonus, as I shall soon observe. The absolute necessity he was under of engaging in this war, was one of his strongest inducements for concluding so sudden a peace with the Indian prince.

The Athenians at the same time called in Demetrius to assist them against Cassander,¹ who was besieging their city. He accordingly set sail with 330 galleys, and a great body of foot; and not only drove Cassander out of Attica, but pursued him as far as Thermyople, where he defeated him, and made himself master of Heraclea, which surrendered voluntarily. He also admitted into his service 6000 Macedonians, who came over to his side.

When he returned to Athens, the inhabitants of that city, though they had already lavished upon him all the honours they were able to invent, had recourse to new flatteries that outdid the former. They lodged him in the back part of the temple of Minerva, called the Parthenon; but even this place, which had so much sanctity ascribed to it by the people, and was the mansion of a virgin goddess, he did not scruple to profane by the most infamous debaucheries. His courtizans were there treated with more honour than the goddess herself, and were the only divinities he adored. He even caused altars to be erected to them by the Athenians,² whom he called abject wretches for their mean compliance, and creatures born only for slavery; so much was even this prince shocked at such despicable adulation, as Tacitus observed with respect to Tiberius.³

Democles, surnamed the Fair, and of a very tender age, threw himself, in order to elude the violence of Demetrius, into a vessel of boiling water prepared for a bath, and there lost his life, choosing rather to die than violate his modesty. The Athenians, to appease the resentment of Demetrius, who was extremely offended at a decree they had published with relation to him, issued a new one, importing, "That it was ordered and adjudged by the people of Athens, that whatever Demetrius might think fit to command, should be considered as sacred with regard to the gods, and just with regard to men." Is it possible to believe, that flattery and servitude could be carried to such an excess of baseness, extravagance, and irreligion?

Demetrius, after these proceedings, entered Peloponnesus, and took from Ptolemy, who had rendered himself powerful in that country, the cities of Sicyon, Corinth, and several others where he had garrisons. And as he happened to be at Argos, at the grand festival in honour of Juno, he was desirous of celebrating it, by proposing prizes, and presiding in person among the Greeks. In order to solemnize it more effectually, he espoused, on that day, Deidamia, the daughter of Eacides, king of the Molossians, and sister of Pyrrhus.

The states of Greece being assembled in the Isthmus,⁴ and curiosity having drawn a vast number of people from all parts, Demetrius was proclaimed general of all the Greeks, as Philip and Alexander had been before him; to whom he thought himself abundantly superior; so much was he intoxicated with the success of his arms, and the extravagant flattery lavished upon him.

When he was about to depart from Peloponnesus for Athens, he wrote to the inhabitants of that city that he intended, upon his arrival among them to be initiated in the greater and lesser mysteries at the same time. This had never been permitted before; for it was necessary to observe certain intervals; it being lawful to celebrate the lesser mysteries only in the month of March,⁵ and the greater in that of October. In order, therefore, to obviate this inconvenience, and satisfy so religious a prince, it was ordered, that the then present month of May should be deemed the month of March, and afterwards that of October; and Demetrius, by this rare invention, was duly initiated, without infringing the customs and ceremonials prescribed by the law.

But of all the abuses committed at Athens, that which most afflicted and mortified the inhabitants, was an order issued by Demetrius, for immediately furnishing the sum of 250 talents; and when this money had been collected without the least delay or abatement, the prince, the moment he saw it amassed together, ordered it to be given to Lamia, and the other courtizans in her company, for washes and paint. The Athenians were more offended at the indignity than the loss, and resented the application of that sum much more than their contribution of the sum itself.

Lamia, as if this terrible expense had not been sufficient, being desirous to regale Demetrius at a feast, extorted money from several of the richest Athenians by her own private authority. The entertainment cost immense sums, and gave birth to a very ingenious pleasantry of a comic poet, who said, that Lamia was a true helepolis. We have already shown that the helepolis was a machine invented by Demetrius for attacking and taking towns.

Cassander finding himself vigorously pressed by Demetrius,⁶ and A. M. 3702. not being able to obtain a peace Ant. J. C. 302. without submitting entirely to the discretion of Antigonus, agreed with Lysimachus to send ambassadors to Seleucus and Ptolemy, to represent to them the situation to which they were reduced. The conduct of Antigonus made it evident that he had no less in view than to dispossess all the other successors of Alexander, and usurp the whole empire to himself; and that it was time to form a strict alliance with each other to humble this exorbitant power. They were likewise offended, and Lysimachus in particular, at the contemptible manner in which Demetrius permitted people to treat the other kings in their conversation at his table, appropriating the regal title to himself and his father; whereas Ptolemy, according to his flatterers, was no more than the captain of a ship, Seleucus a commander of elephants, and Lysimachus a treasurer. A confederacy was therefore formed by these four kings, and Seleucus hastened into Assyria, to make preparations for this new war.

The first operations of it were commenced at the Hellespont; Cassander and Lysimachus having judged it expedient that the former should continue in Europe, to defend it against Demetrius, and that the latter, with as many troops as could be drawn out of their two kingdoms, without leaving them too destitute of forces, should invade the provinces of Antigonus, in Asia. Lysimachus consequently passed the Hellespont with a fine army, and, either by treaty or force, reduced Phrygia, Lydia, Lycaonia, and most of the territories between the Propontis and the river Mæander.

Antigonus was then at Antigonion, which he had lately built in Upper Syria, and where he was employed in celebrating the solemn games he had there established. This news, with that of several other revolts, transmitted to him at the same time, caused him immediately to quit his games. He accordingly dismissed the assembly upon the spot, and made preparations for advancing against the enemy. When all his troops were drawn together, he marched with the utmost expedition over mount Taurus, and entered Cilicia, where he took out of the public treasury of Quinda, a city in that province, as much money as he wanted, and then augmented his troops to the number he thought necessary. After which he advanced directly towards the enemy, and retook several places which had revolted in his march. Lysimachus thought proper to be upon the defensive, till the arrival of the succours which were upon their march to join him from Seleucus and Ptolemy. The remaining part of the year, therefore, elapsed without any action, and each party retired into winter-quarters.

Seleucus, at the beginning of the

A. M. 3703. next year, formed his army at Babylon, and marched into Cappadocia, to act against Antigonus.

This latter sent immediately for Demetrius, who left Greece with great expedition, marched to Ephesus, and retook that city, with several others that had declared for Lysimachus upon his arrival in Asia.

Ptolemy improved the opportunity in Syria, of the absence of Antigonus, and recovered all Phœnicia, Judæa, and Cœle-Syria, except the cities of Tyre and Sidon, where Antigonus had left good garrisons. He, indeed, formed the siege of Sidon; but whilst his troops were employed in battering the walls, he received intelligence that Antigonus had defeated Seleucus and Lysimachus, and was advancing to relieve the place. Upon this false report he made a truce for five months with the Sidonians, raised the siege, and returned to Egypt.

Here ends what remains of the history of Diodorus Siculus, in a period of the greatest importance, and on the very point of a battle, by which the fate of Alexander's successors is to be decided.

The confederate army,¹ commanded by Seleucus and Lysimachus, and the troops of Antigonus and Demetrius, arrived in Phrygia almost at the same time, but did not long confront each other without coming to blows. Antigonus had about 60,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and seventy-five elephants. The enemy's forces consisted of 64,000 foot, 10,500 horse, 400 elephants, with 120 chariots armed with scythes.

The battle was fought near Ipsus, a city of Phrygia.

As soon as the signal was given, Demetrius, at the head of his best cavalry, fell upon Antiochus, the son of Seleucus, and behaved with so much bravery, that he broke the enemy's ranks, and put them to flight; but a rash and inconsiderate thirst of glory, against which generals can never be too much on their guard, and which has been fatal to many, prompted Demetrius to pursue the fugitives with too much ardour, and without any consideration for the rest of the army; by which means he lost the victory he might easily have secured, had he improved his first advantage aright. For when he returned from the pursuit, he found it impracticable for him to rejoin his infantry, the enemy's elephants having filled up all the intermediate space. When Seleucus saw the infantry of Antigonus separated from their cavalry, he did not actually attack them, but only made a feint as if he were going to fall upon them, sometimes on one side and sometimes on another, in order to intimidate and afford them sufficient time to quit the army of Antigonus, and come over to his own; and this was at last the expedient on which they resolved. The greatest part of the infantry detached themselves from the rest, and surrendered voluntarily to Seleucus, and the other were all put to flight. At the same instant a large body of the army of Seleucus drew off by his order, and made a furious attack upon Antigonus, who sustained their efforts for some time, but being at last overwhelmed with darts, and having received many wounds, he fell dead on the earth, having defended himself valiantly to his last gasp. Demetrius seeing his father dead, rallied all the troops he was able to draw together, and retired to Ephesus with 5000 foot and 4000 horse; which were all that remained of more than 70,000 men, whom his father and himself commanded at the beginning of the engagement. The great Pyrrhus,² young as he then was, was inseparable from Demetrius, overthrew all that opposed him, and gave an essay, in this first action, of what might be expected one day from his valour and bravery.

OF

ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

BOOK XVII.

CHAPTER I.

SECTION I.—THE FOUR VICTORIOUS PRINCES DIVIDE THE EMPIRE OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT INTO AS MANY KINGDOMS. SELEUCUS BUILDS SEVERAL CITIES. ATHENS SHUTS HER GATES AGAINST DEMETRIUS. HE RECONCILES HIMSELF WITH SELEUCUS, AND AFTERWARDS WITH PTOLEMY. THE DEATH OF CASSANDER. THE FIRST EXPLOITS OF PYRRHUS. ATHENS TAKEN BY DEMETRIUS. HE LOSES ALMOST AT THE SAME TIME ALL HE POSSESSED.

AFTER the battle of Ipsus,¹ the four confederate princes divided the dominions of Antigonus among themselves, and added them to those which the already possessed. The empire of Alexander was thus divided into four kingdoms. Ptolemy had Egypt, Libya, Arabia, Cœle-Syria, and Palestine; Cassander had Macedonia and Greece; Lysimachus, Thrace, Bithynia, and some other provinces beyond the Hellespont, and the Bosphorus; and Seleucus all the rest of Asia, to the other side of the Euphrates, and as far as the river Indus. The dominions of this last prince are usually called the kingdom of Syria, because Seleucus, who afterwards built Antioch in that province, made it the chief seat of his residence, in which his successors, who from his name were called Seleucidæ, followed his example. This kingdom, however, not only included Syria, but those vast and fertile provinces of Upper Asia, which constituted the Persian empire. The reign of twenty years, which I have assigned to Seleucus Nicator, commences at this period, because he was not acknowledged as king till after the battle of Ipsus; and if we add to these the twelve during which he had already exercised the regal authority without the title, they will make out the reign of thirty-one years assigned him by Usher.

These four kings are the four horns of the he-goat in the prophecy of Daniel,¹ which came up in the place of the first horn that was broken. The first horn was Alexander king of Greece, who destroyed the empire of the Medes and Persians, designated by the ram with two horns; and the other four horns, are those four kings who rose up after him, and divided his empire among them, but they were not of his posterity.

They are likewise shadowed out by the four heads of the leopard, which form part of another vision shown to the same prophet.²

These prophecies of Daniel were exactly accomplished by this last partition of Alexander's empire; other divisions had, indeed, been made before this, but they were only of provinces which were consigned to governors, under the brother and son of Alexander, and none but the last was a partition into kingdoms. Those prophecies, therefore, are to be understood of this alone, for they evidently represent these four successors of Alexander, as four kings, "four stood up for it." But not one of Alexander's successors obtained the regal dignity, till about three years before this last division of the empire. And even then this dignity was precarious, as being assumed by each of the several parties, merely by his own authority, and not acknowledged by any of the rest. Whereas, after the battle of Ipsus, the treaty made between the four confederates, when they had defeated their adversary, and divested him of his dominions, assigned each of them their dominions, under the appellation of so many kingdoms, and authorized and acknowledged them as kings and sovereigns independent of any superior power. These four kings are Ptolemy, Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus.

We can never sufficiently admire, in this and the other places, wherein the completion of the prophecies of Daniel will be pointed out, the strong light with which the prophet penetrates the thick gloom of futurity, at a time when there was not the least appearance of all he foretells. With how much certainty and exactness, even amidst the variety of these revolutions, and this chaos of singular events, does he determine each particular circumstance, and fix the number of the several successors! How expressly has he pointed out the nation, which was to be the Grecian; described the countries they were to possess; measured the duration of their empires, and the extent of their power, inferior to that of Alexander; in a word, with what lively colours has he drawn the characters of those princes, and specified their alliances, treaties, treachery, marriages, and success! Can any one possibly ascribe to chance or human foresight, so many circumstantial predictions, which at the time of their being denounced were so remote from probability; and not evidently discover in them the character, and as it were, the seal, of the Divinity, to whom all ages are present in one view, and who alone determines at his will the fate of all the kingdoms and empires of the world? But it is now time to resume the thread of our history.

Onias,³ the first of that name, and high-priest of the Jews, died about this time, and was succeeded by his son Simon, who for the sanctity of his life, and the equity of his actions, was surnamed the Just. He enjoyed the pontificate for the space of nine years.

Seleucus,⁴ after the defeat of Antigonus, made himself master of Upper Syria, where he built Antioch on the Orontes, and gave it that name, either from his father or his son, for they were both called Antiochus. This city, where the Syrian kings afterwards resided, was, for a long time, the capital of the East, and still preserved that privilege under the Roman emperors. Antigonus had lately built a city at a small distance from this, and called it Antigonia; but Seleucus caused it to be entirely demolished, and employed the materials in the construction of his own city, to which he afterwards transplanted the inhabitants of the former.

Among several other cities built by Seleucus in this country,⁵ there were three more remarkable than the rest: the first was called Seleucia, from his own name; the second, Apamea, from the name of his consort, who was the daughter of Artabazus the Persian; the third was Laodicea, so denominated from his mother. Apamea and Seleucia were situated on the same river on which Antioch was built, and Laodicea was on the same side towards the south. He allowed the Jews the same privileges and immunities, in each of these new cities, as were enjoyed by the Greeks and Macedonians, and especially at Antioch in Syria, where that people settled in such numbers, that they possessed as considerable a part of that city as their other countrymen enjoyed at Alexandria.

Demetrius had withdrawn himself to Ephesus, after the battle of Ipsus, and from thence embarked for Greece, his only resource being the affection of the Athenians, with whom he had left his fleet, money, and wife, Deidamia. But he was strangely surprised and offended, when he was met on his way by ambassadors from the Athenians, who came to acquaint him that he could not be admitted into their city, because the people had by a decree, prohibited the reception of any of the kings; they also informed him, that his consort Deidamia had been conducted to Megara, with all the honours and attendance due to her rank. Demetrius was then sensible of the value of honours and homage extorted by fear, and which did not proceed from the heart. The posture of his affairs not permitting him to punish the perfidy of that people, he contented himself with intimating his complaints to them in a moderate manner, and demanded his galleys, among which was that prodigious galley of sixteen benches of oars. As soon as he had received them, he sailed towards the Chersonesus; and having committed some devastations in the territories of Lysimachus, he enriched his army with the spoils, and by that expedient prevented the desertion of his troops, who now began to recover their vigour, and rendered themselves formidable.

Lysimachus, king of Thrace, in order to strengthen himself in his dominions, entered into a particular treaty with Ptolemy, and strengthened the alliance between them, by espousing one of his daughters, named Arisnoe; he had before this procured another, named Lysandra, to be married to his son Agathocles.

² After this, I beheld, and lo, another like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl, the beast had also four heads: and dominion was given to it. Dan. vii. 6.

This alliance between Lysimachus and Ptolemy gave umbrage Ant. J. C. 239. to Seleucus, who thereupon entered into a treaty with Demetrius,¹ and espoused Stratonice, the daughter of that prince, by Phila the sister of Cassander. The beauty of Stratonice had induced Seleucus to demand her in marriage; and as the affairs of Demetrius were at that time in a very bad condition, so honourable an alliance with so powerful a prince was exceedingly agreeable to him. In consequence of which he immediately conducted his daughter with all his fleet into Syria from Greece, where he was still in possession of some places. During his passage he made a descent on Cilicia, which then belonged to Plistarchus the brother of Cassander, to whom it had been assigned by the four kings, who divided the dominions of Alexander the Great after the death of Antigonus. Plistarchus went to complain of this proceeding to Seleucus, and to reproach him for contracting an alliance with the common enemy, without the consent of the other kings, which he considered as an infraction of the treaty. Demetrius receiving intelligence of this journey, advanced directly to the city of Quinda, where the treasures of the province, amounting to 1200 talents,² were deposited. These he carried off with all expedition to his fleet, and then set sail for Syria, where he found Seleucus, and gave him the princess Stratonice in marriage. Demetrius, after some days passed in rejoicings for the nuptials, and in entertainments given on each side, returned to Cilicia, and made himself master of the whole province. He then sent his wife Phila to Cassander, in order to excuse this proceeding. These kings imitated the princes of the East, with whom it is customary to have several wives at the same time.

During these transactions, Deidamia, another of his wives, who had taken a journey to meet him in Greece, and had passed some time with him in that country was seized with an indisposition that ended her days. Demetrius having re-

A M. 3706. concited himself with Ptolemy, by Ant. J. C. 238. the mediation of Seleucus, espoused Ptolemais, the daughter of Ptolemy, by which means his affairs began to assume a better aspect: for he had all the island of Cyprus, and the two rich and powerful cities of Tyre and Sidon in Phœnicia, besides his new conquests in Cilicia, and some other cities in Asia.

It was very imprudent in Seleucus to permit so dangerous an enemy to establish himself at so small a distance from him, and to usurp from one of his allies a province so near his own dominions as Cilicia. All this shows that these princes had no established rules and principles of conduct, and were even ignorant of the true interests of their ambition. For as to sincerity, equity, and gratitude, they had long since renounced them all, and only reigned for the unhappiness of their people, as the author of the first book of Maccabees has observed.³

The eyes of Seleucus were however open at last, and in order to prevent his having a neighbour of such abilities on each side of his dominions, he required Demetrius to surrender Cilicia to him for a very considerable sum of money; but that prince not being disposed to comply with such a proposal, Seleucus insisted upon his returning him the cities of Tyre and Sidon, that were dependencies on Syria, of which he was king. Demetrius, enraged at this demand, replied very abruptly, that though he should lose several other battles as fatal to him as that of Ipsus, he could never resolve to purchase the friendship of Seleucus at so high a price. At the same time he sailed to those two cities, reinforced their garrisons, and furnished them with all things necessary for a vigorous defence; by which means the intention of Seleucus to take them from him was rendered ineffectual at that time. This proceeding of Seleucus, though sufficiently conformable to the rules of political interest, had such an odious aspect, with reference to the maxims of honour, that it shocked all mankind, and was universally condemned: for, as his dominions were of such a vast extent as to include all the countries between India and the Mediterranean, how insatiable was that rigour and avidity which would not permit him to leave his father-in-law the peaceable enjoyment of the shattered remains of his fortune!

Cassander died about this time, of a dropsy, after having governed A. M. 3707. Macedonia for the space of nineteen years, from the death of his father Antipater, and six or seven from the last partition. He left three sons by Theasalonica, one of the sisters of Alexander the Great. Philip, who succeeded him, dying soon after, left his crown to be contested by his two brothers.

Pyrrhus,⁴ the famous king of Epirus, had espoused Antigone, a relation of Ptolemy, in Egypt. This young prince was the son of Eacides, whom the Molossians, in a rebellion, had expelled from the throne; and it was with great difficulty that Pyrrhus himself, then an infant at the breast, was preserved from the fury of the rebels, who pursued him with intent to destroy him. After various adventures, he was conducted to the court of king Glaucias in Illyria, where he was taken into the protection of that prince. Cassander, the mortal enemy of Eacides, solicited the king to deliver the young prince into his hands, and offered him 200 talents on that occasion: Glaucias, however, was struck with horror at such a proposal; and when the infant had attained the twelfth year of his age, he conducted him in person to Epirus with a powerful army, and reinstated him in his dominions; by which means the Molossians were compelled to submit to force. Justin tells us, that their hatred being softened into compassion, they themselves recalled him, and assigned him guardians to govern the kingdom till he should be of age himself; but there seems to be no great probability in his account.

When he had attained his seventeenth year, he began to think himself sufficiently established on the throne: and set out from his capital city for Illyria, in order to be present at the nuptials of one of the sons of Glaucias, with whom he had been brought up. The Molossians, taking advantage of his absence, revolted a second time, drove all his friends out of the kingdom, seized all his treasures, and conferred the crown on Neoptolemus, his great uncle. Pyrrhus being thus divested of his dominions, and finding himself destitute of all succours, retired to his brother-in-law, Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, who had espoused his sister Deidamia.

This young prince distinguished himself among the bravest in the battle that was fought on the plains of Ipsus, and would not forsake Demetrius even after he was defeated. He also preserved for him those Grecian cities which that prince had confided to him; and when a treaty of peace was concluded between Ptolemy and Demetrius, by the mediation of Seleucus, Pyrrhus went into Egypt as a hostage for his brother-in-law.

During his continuance at the court of Ptolemy, he gave sufficient proofs of his strength, address, and extraordinary patience, in hunting, martial exercises, and all other labours. Observing, that of all the wives of Ptolemy, Berenice had the greatest ascendancy over him, and that she surpassed the others in wit and prudence, as well as beauty, he attached himself to her in particular; for as he was already an able politician, he neglected no opportunity of making his court to those on whom his fortune depended, and of ingratiating himself with such persons as were capable of being useful to him. His noble and engaging demeanour procured him such a share in Ptolemy's esteem, that he gave him Antigone, the daughter of Berenice his favourite consort, in preference to several young princes who demanded her in marriage. This lady was the daughter of Berenice, by Philip her first husband, who was a Macedonian nobleman, little known with respect to any other particular. When Pyrrhus had espoused Antigone, the queen had so much influence over her consort, as to induce him to grant his son-in-law a fleet, with a supply of money, which enabled him to repossess himself of his dominions. Here began the fortune of an exiled prince, who was afterwards esteemed the greatest general of his age; and it must be acknowledged, that every instance of his early conduct denoted extraordinary merit, and raised great expectations of his future glory.

Athens,¹ as we have already observed, had revolted from Demetrius, and shut her gates against him. But when that prince thought he had sufficiently provided for the security of his territories in Asia, he marched against that rebellious and ungrateful city, with a resolution to punish her as she deserved. The first year was employed in the reduction of the Messenians, and the conquest of some other cities who had quitted his party; and he returned the next season to Athens, which he closely blocked up, and reduced to the last extremity, by cutting off all communication of provisions. A fleet of 150 sail, sent by king Ptolemy to succour the Athenians, and which appeared on the coasts of Ægina, afforded them but a transient joy; for when this naval force saw a strong fleet arrive from Peloponnesus to the assistance of Demetrius, besides a great number of other vessels from Cyprus, and that the whole amounted to 300, they weighed anchor, and fled.

Although the Athenians had issued a decree, by which they made it capital for any person even to mention a peace with Demetrius, the extreme necessity to which they were reduced by want of provisions, obliged them to open their gates to him. When he entered the city, he commanded the inhabitants to assemble in the theatre, which he surrounded with armed troops, and posted his guards on each side of the stage where the dramatic pieces were performed; and then descending from the upper part of the theatre, in the manner usual with the actors, he showed himself to that multitude, who seemed rather dead than alive, and waited for the event in inexpressible terror, expecting it would prove the sentence for their destruction. But he dissipated their apprehensions by the first expressions he uttered; for he did not raise his voice like a man affected with the emotions of rage, nor deliver himself in any passionate or insulting language; but softened the tone of his voice, and only addressed himself to them in gentle complaints and amicable expostulations. He pardoned their offence, and restored them to his favour; presenting them, at the same time, with 100,000 measures of corn, and reinstating such magistrates as were most agreeable to them. The joy of this people may be easily conceived from the terrors with which they were before affected; and how glorious must such a prince be, who could always support so brilliant, so admirable a character!

When he had regulated the state of affairs in Athens, he determined to reduce the Lacedæmonian Archidamus, their king, advanced as far as Mantinea to meet him: but Demetrius defeated him in a great battle, and obliged him to have recourse to flight; after which he advanced into Laconia, and fought another battle in the very sight of Sparta. He was again victorious; 500 of his enemies were made prisoners, and 200 killed upon the spot, so that he was already considered as master of the city, which had never been taken before.

But at this important moment he received two pieces of intelligence, which compelled him to direct his attention to a quite different quarter. The first was, that Lysimachus had lately divested him of all his territories in Asia; and the other, that Ptolemy had made a descent on Cyprus, and conquered all the island, except Salamis, where the mother of Demetrius, with his wife and children, had retired; and that the king of Egypt carried on the siege of that city with great vigour. Demetrius left all to fly to their assistance, but was soon informed that the place had surrendered. Ptolemy had the generosity to give the mother, wife, and children, of his enemy, their liberty without any ransom; and to dismiss them with all their attendants and effects. He even made them magnificent presents at their departure, which he accompanied with all imaginable marks of honour.

The loss of Cyprus was soon succeeded by that of Tyre and Sidon; and Seleucus dispossessed him of Cilicia on another side. Thus, in a very short time, he saw himself divested of all his dominions, without any resource or hopes for the future.

SECTION II.—DISPUTE BETWEEN THE TWO SONS OF CASSANDER FOR THE CROWN OF MACEDONIA. DEMETRIUS, BEING INVITED TO THE ASSISTANCE OF ALEXANDER, FINDS MEANS TO DESTROY HIM, AND IS PROCLAIMED KING BY THE MACEDONIANS. HE MAKES GREAT PREPARATIONS FOR THE CONQUEST OF ASIA. A POWERFUL CONFEDERACY IS FORMED AGAINST HIM. PYRRHUS AND LYSIMACHUS DEPRIVE HIM OF MACEDONIA, AND DIVIDE IT BETWEEN THEMSELVES. PYRRHUS IS SOON OBLIGED TO QUIT THOSE TERRITORIES. SAD END OF DEMETRIUS, WHO DIES IN PRISON.

No prince was ever obnoxious to greater vicissitudes of fortune, nor ever experienced more sudden changes, than Demetrius. He exposed himself to these events by his imprudence, amusing himself with inconsiderable conquests, while he abandoned his provinces to the first invader. His greatest successes were immediately followed by his being dispossessed of all his dominions, and almost reduced to despair, when suddenly an unexpected resource offered itself from a quarter from whence he had not the least room to expect it.

In the quarrel between the two sons of Cassander for the crown,² A. M. 3710. Thessalonica, their mother, favoured Ant. J. C. 294. Alexander, who was the youngest; which so enraged Antipater, the eldest son, that he killed her with his own hands, though she conjured him by the breasts which had nourished him, to spare her life. Alexander, in order to avenge this unnatural barbarity, solicited the assistance of Pyrrhus and Demetrius, the former of whom was in Epirus, and the latter in Peloponnesus. Pyrrhus arrived the first, and made himself master of several cities in Macedonia, part of which he retained as a compensation for the aid he had given Alexander; and he returned to his own dominions, after he had reconciled the two brothers. Demetrius came up at the same instant, upon which Alexander advanced to meet him; and testified, at the interview between them, all imaginable gratitude and friendship; but represented to him, at the same time, that the state of his affairs was changed, and that he no longer had any need of his assistance. Demetrius was displeased with this compliment, whilst Alexander, who dreaded the greatness of his power, was apprehensive of subjecting himself to a master, should he admit him into his dominions. They, however, conversed together with an external air of friendship, and entertained each other with reciprocal feasts; till at last, Demetrius, upon some intelligence, either true or fictitious, that Alexander intended to destroy him, prevented the execution of that design, and killed him. This murder armed the Macedonians against him at first; but when he had acquainted them with all the particulars that influenced his conduct, the aversion they entertained for Antipater, the infamous murderer of his own mother, induced them to declare for Demetrius, and they accordingly proclaimed him king of Macedonia. Demetrius possessed this crown for the space of seven years, and Antipater fled into Thrace, where he did not long survive the loss of his kingdom.

One of the branches of the royal family of Philip king of Macedonia, became entirely extinct by the death of Thessalonica and her two sons; as the other branch from Alexander the Great had been before by the death of the young Alexander and Hercules, his two sons. Thus these two princes, who by their unjust wars had spread desolation through so many provinces, and destroyed such a number of royal families, experienced, by a just decree of Providence, the same calamities in their own families, as they had occasioned to others. Philip and Alexander, with their wives, and all their descendants, perished by violent deaths.

Much about this time Seleucus A. M. 3711. built the city of Seleucia,¹ on the Ant. J. C. 293. banks of the Tigris, at the distance of forty miles from Babylon. It became very populous in a short time, and Pliny tells us it was inhabited by 600,000 persons. The dykes of the Euphrates being broken down, spread such an inundation over the country, and the branch of that river, which passed through Babylon, was sunk so low by this evacuation, as to be rendered un navigable, by which means that city became so inconvenient, that as soon as Seleucia was built, all its inhabitants withdrew thither. This circumstance prepared the way for the accomplishment of that celebrated prophecy of Isaiah, who, at a time when this city was in the most flourishing condition, had foretold, that it should one day become entirely desert and uninhabited.² I have observed elsewhere by what manner and degrees this prediction was fully accomplished.

Simon, surnamed the Just, the high-priest of the Jews, died at the Ant. J. C. 292. close of the ninth year of his pontificate,³ and left a young son, named Onias. As he was of too tender an age to take upon himself the exercise of that dignity, it was consigned to Eleazar the brother of Simon, who discharged the functions of it for the space of fifteen years.

I here pass over some events of small importance,⁴ and proceed to A. M. 3716. Demetrius, who, believing his power sufficiently established in Greece and Macedonia, began to make great preparations for regaining the empire of his father in Asia. With this view he raised an army of above 100,000 men, and fitted out a fleet of 500 sail. So great an armament had never been seen since the time of Alexander the Great. Demetrius animated the workmen by his presence and instructions, visited them in person, directed them how to act, and even assisted them in their labours. The number of his galleys, and their extraordinary dimensions, created a universal astonishment; for no ships of sixteen, or even fifteen benches of oars, had ever been seen till then; and it was not till many years after this period that Ptolemy Philopator built one of forty benches,⁵ but then it was only for pomp and ostentation, whereas those which Demetrius built were extremely useful in battle, and more admirable for their lightness and agility than their size and magnificence.

Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Seleucus, receiving intelligence of these Ant. J. C. 287. formidable preparations of Demetrius, immediately caught the alarm, and in order to frustrate their effect, renewed their alliance, in which they likewise engaged Pyrrhus, king of Epirus; in consequence of which, when Lysimachus began to invade Macedonia on one side, Pyrrhus did the same on the other. Demetrius, who was then making preparations in Greece for his intended expedition into Asia, advanced with all speed to defend his own dominions; but before he was able to arrive there, Pyrrhus had taken Beroea, one of the most considerable cities in Macedonia, where he found the wives, children, and effects, of a great number of soldiers belonging to Demetrius. This news caused so great a tumult in the army of that prince, that a considerable part of his troops absolutely refused to follow him, and declared with an air of mutiny and sedition, that they would return to defend their families and effects. In a word, things were carried to such an extremity, that Demetrius, perceiving he no longer had any influence over them, fled to Greece in the disguise of a common soldier and his troops went over to Pyrrhus, whom they proclaimed king of Macedonia.

The different characters of these two princes greatly contributed to this sudden revolution. Demetrius, who considered vain pomp and superb magnificence as true grandeur, rendered himself contemptible to the Macedonians, in the very circumstance by which he thought to obtain their esteem. He ambitiously encircled his head with a double diadem, like a theatrical monarch, and wore purple robes, enriched with a profusion of gold. The ornaments of his feet were altogether extraordinary; and he had long employed artists to make him a mantle, on which the system of the world, with all the stars visible in the firmament, were to be embroidered in gold. The change of his fortune prevented the finishing of this work, and no future king would presume to wear it.

But that which rendered him still more odious, was his being so difficult of access. He was either so imperious and disdainful, as not to allow those who had any affairs to transact with him the liberty of speech; or else he treated them with so much rudeness, as obliged them to quit his presence with disgust. One day, when he came out of his palace, and walked through the streets with a mien of more affability than it was usual for him to assume, some persons were encouraged to present a few petitions to him. He received them with a gracious air, and placed them in one of the folds of his robe; but as he was passing over a bridge on the river Axius,⁶ he threw all those petitions into the stream. A prince must certainly know very little of mankind, not to be sensible that such a contemptuous behaviour is sufficient to disgust his subjects. On this occasion, an action of the great Philip was recollected, which has been related among the events of his reign. That prince had several times refused audience to a poor woman, under pretence that he wanted leisure to hear her. "Be no longer king then," replied she with some emotion; and Philip, from thenceforth, made it a maxim with himself to grant his subjects long and frequent audiences. For, as Plutarch observes on that occasion, THE MOST INDISPENSABLE DUTY OF A KING, IS TO EXERT HIMSELF IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.⁷

The Macedonians had formed a very different idea of Pyrrhus. They had heard it reported, and were sensible by their own experience, that he was naturally affable, and that he was always mild and accessible; they were convinced of his propensity to recompense the services rendered him, and that he was slow to anger and severity. Some young officers, over their liquor, had vented several offensive pleasantries against him. The particulars of their conversation were related to Pyrrhus himself, who ordered them to be brought into his presence, and then asked them, if they had expressed themselves in the manner he had heard. "Yes, my lord," replied one of the company, "and we should have added a great deal more, if we had had more wine." Pyrrhus could not forbear laughing at this facetious and sprightly turn, and dismissed them from his presence without farther notice.

The Macedonians thought him much superior to Demetrius, even in military merit. He had beaten them on several occasions, but their admiration of his bravery was greater than their resentment for their defeat. It was a common expression with them, that other princes imitated Alexander in nothing but their purple robes, the number of their guards, the affectation of inclining their heads like his, and their imperious manner of speaking; but that Pyrrhus was the only one who represented that monarch in his great and laudable qualities. Pyrrhus himself was not altogether free from vanity, with respect to the resemblance of his own features to those of Alexander;¹ but a good matron of Larissa, in whose house he once lodged, had deceived him in that particular, by an answer, perhaps, not at all agreeable to him. The Macedonians, however, thought they discovered in him the aspect of that prince; with all the fire of his eyes, and the vivacity, promptitude, and impetuosity, with which he charged his enemies, and bore down all who presumed to oppose him: but with respect to the military art, and ability in drawing up an army in battle, and knowing how to take advantage of circumstances, they thought none comparable to Pyrrhus.

It cannot, therefore, be thought surprising, that the Macedonians, who entertained prepossessions so favourable to the one and so disadvantageous to the other, should easily quit the party of Demetrius to espouse that of Pyrrhus: and one may see by this instance, and a thousand others, of what importance it is for princes to attach their people to their interests by the gentle ties of affection and gratitude; by treating them with mildness and affability; and by entertaining a real love for them, which is the only means of acquiring their love, which constitutes their most solid glory, their most essential obligation, and at the same time their greatest security.

As Lysimachus happened to arrive immediately after Pyrrhus had been declared king of Macedonia,² he pretended that he had contributed as much as that prince to the flight of Demetrius, and that he consequently ought to have a share in that kingdom. Pyrrhus, who, in this conjuncture, was not entirely certain of the fidelity of the Macedonians, readily acquiesced in the pretensions of Lysimachus, and the cities and provinces were accordingly shared between them: but this agreement was so far from uniting them with each other, that it was rather the constant source of animosities and divisions: for, as Plutarch observes, when neither seas nor mountains, nor uninhabitable deserts, could suffice as barriers to the avarice and ambition of these princes; and when their desires were not to be bounded by those limits which separate Europe from Asia, how could they possibly continue in a state of tranquillity, and refrain from the injustice of invading domains which lay so near and so commodious to them? This was not to be expected; and a perpetual war between them became inevitable, from the malignant seeds of envy and usurpation that had taken root in their minds. The names of peace and war were considered by them as two species of coin, to which they themselves had given currency, merely for their own interest, and without the least regard to justice.—Still, continues the same author, they act more laudably, when they engage in an open war, than when they use the sacred names of justice, friendship, and peace, for what, in reality, is no more than a truce, or transient suspension of their unjust views.

The whole history of Alexander's successors justifies these reflections of Plutarch. Never were more treaties and alliances made, and never were they violated with less disguise and more impunity. Would to God that those complaints were never applicable to any princes or times but those we are treating of at present!

¹ A set of flatterers had really persuaded Pyrrhus, that he resembled Alexander in the features of his face. With this belief he sent for the pictures of Philip, Pordiceas, Alexander, Cassander, and some other princes, and then desired a woman of Larissa, with whom he then lodged, to tell him which of those princes he most resembled. She refused to answer him for a considerable time, till at last he pressed her very earnestly to satisfy his curiosity; upon which she replied, that she thought him very like Batrachion, who was a noted cook in that city. Lucian, advers. indoct. p. 552, 553.

² Plut. in Pyrrh. p. 380, 390.

Pyrrhus finding the Macedonians more tractable and submissive, when he led them to war, than when he permitted them to enjoy a state of repose; and being himself not much addicted to tranquillity, nor capable of satisfaction in the calm of a long peace, was daily forming new enterprises, without much regard to sparing either his subjects or allies. Lysimachus took advantage of the army's disaffection to Pyrrhus, and inflamed them still more by his emissaries, who artfully insinuated that they had acted most shamefully in choosing a stranger for their master, whom interest, and not affection, had attached to Macedonia. These reproaches drew in the greatest part of the soldiers; upon which Pyrrhus, who feared the consequences of this alienation, retired with the Epirots and the troops of his allies and lost Macedonia in the same manner he had gained it.

He greatly complained of the inconstancy of this people, and their disaffection to his person; but, as Plutarch again observes, kings have no reason to blame other persons for sometimes changing their party according to their interest, as in acting so they only imitate their own example, and practise the lessons of infidelity and treason, which they have learned from the whole of their own conduct, which upon all occasions demonstrates an utter disregard for justice, veracity, and sincerity, in the observance of engagements.

As to Demetrius,³ when he found himself deserted by his troops, he had retired to the city of Cassandria⁴ where his consort Phila resided: this lady was so afflicted at the calamitous state in which she beheld her husband, and was so terrified at the misfortunes to which she herself was exposed by the declension of his affairs, that she had recourse to a draught of poison, by which she ended a life that was become more insupportable to her than death itself.

Demetrius, thinking to gather up some remains of his shattered fortune, returned to Greece, where several cities still continued devoted to him; and when he had disposed his affairs in the best order he was able, he left the government of those places to his son Antigonus; and assembling all the troops he could raise in that country, which amounted to between ten and eleven thousand men, he embarked for Asia, with a resolution to make a desperate attempt to retrieve his good fortune. Eurydice, the sister of his late wife Phila, received him at Miletus, where she lived with the princess Ptolemais, her daughter by Ptolemy, whose marriage with Demetrius had been agreed upon by the mediation of Seleucus. Eurydice accordingly presented the princess to him, and this alliance gave birth to Demetrius, who afterwards reigned in Cyrene.

Demetrius,⁵ immediately after the celebration of his nuptials, entered Caria and Lydia, where he took several places from Lysimachus, and considerably augmented his forces; and at length made himself master of Sardis; but, as soon as Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus, appeared at the head of an army, he abandoned all his conquests, and marched into the East. His design in taking this route was to surprise Armenia and Media; but Agathocles, who followed him close, cut off his provisions and forage so effectually, that a sickness spread through his army, and weakened it extremely; and when he at last made an attempt to march over mount Taurus, with the small remains of his troops, he found all the passes guarded by the enemies, which obliged him to fall back to Tarsus in Cilicia.

From thence he represented to Seleucus, to whom that city belonged, the melancholy situation of his affairs, and entreated him, in a very moving manner, to afford him the necessary subsistence for himself and the remainder of his troops. Seleucus was touched with compassion at first, and despatched orders to his lieutenants, to furnish him with all he should want. But when remonstrances were afterwards made to him upon the valour and abilities of Demetrius, his genius for resource and stratagem, and his intrepidity in the execution of his designs, whenever the least opportunity for acting presented itself; he thought it impossible to reinstate a prince of that character, without exposing himself to danger. For which reason, instead of continuing to support him, he resolved upon his destruction, and immediately placed himself at the head of a numerous army, with an intention to attack him. Demetrius, who had received intelligence of these measures, posted his troops in those parts of mount Taurus where he imagined it would be very difficult to force them, and sent to Seleucus a second time, to implore his permission to pass into the East, in order to establish himself in some country belonging to the barbarians, where he might end his days in tranquillity: but if he should not be inclined to grant him that favour, he entreated him to allow him to take up his winter-quarters in his dominions; and begged that prince not to expose him, by driving him from thence, to famine, and the rigours of the season, as that would be delivering him up defenceless to the discretion of his enemies.

Seleucus was so prejudiced against the design which Demetrius had formed against the East, that this proposal only tended to increase his distrust; and he consented to nothing more than his taking up his quarters in Cataonia, a province adjacent to Cappadocia, during the two severest months of the winter; after which he was immediately to evacuate that country. Seleucus, during this negotiation, had placed strong guards at all the passes from Cilicia into Syria, which obliged Demetrius to have recourse to arms, in order to disengage himself. He accordingly made such a vigorous attack on the troops who guarded the passes in the mountains, that he dislodged them from thence, and opened himself a passage in Syria, which he immediately entered.

His own courage, and the hopes of his soldiers, deriving from this success, he took all possible measures for making a last effort for the re-establishment of his affairs; but he had the misfortune to be suddenly seized with a severe distemper, which disconcerted all his measures. During

A. M. 3718. the forty days that he continued Ant. J. C. 286. sick, most of his soldiers deserted; and when he at last recovered his health, so as to be capable of action, he found himself reduced to the desperate necessity of attempting to surprise Seleucus in his camp by night, with the handful of men who still continued in his service. A deserter gave Seleucus intelligence of this design time enough to prevent its effect; and the desertion of Demetrius's troops increased upon this disappointment. He then endeavoured, as his last resource, to regain the mountains, and join his fleet; but he found the passes so well guarded, that he was obliged to conceal himself in the woods; from whence he was soon dislodged by hunger, and compelled to surrender himself to Seleucus, who caused him to be conducted under a strong guard to the Chersonesus of Syria near Laodicia, where he was detained a prisoner. He, however, was allowed the liberty of a park for hunting, and all the conveniences of life in abundance.

When Antigonus received intelligence of his father's captivity, he was affected with the utmost sorrow; and wrote to all the kings, and even to Seleucus himself, to obtain his release, offering, at the same time, his own person as a hostage for him, and consenting to part with all his remaining dominions, as the price of his liberty. Several cities, and a great number of princes, joined their solicitations in favour of the captive prince; but Lysimachus offered a large sum of money to Seleucus, provided he would cause his prisoner to be put to death. Seleucus was struck with horror at so barbarous and inhuman a proposal; and in order to grant a favour solicited from so many different quarters, he seemed only to wait the arrival of his son Antigonus, and Stratonice, that Demetrius might owe the obligation of his liberty to them.

In the meantime that unhappy prince supported his misfortunes with patience and magnanimity; and became at last so habituated to them, that they no longer seemed to affect him. He exercised himself in racing, walking, and hunting; and might have been infinitely more happy, had he made a true estimate of his condition, than whilst hurried over lands and seas by the frenzy of ambition. For what other fruit do these pretended heroes, who are called conquerors, derive from all their labours and wars, and from all the dangers to which they expose themselves, than that of tormenting themselves, while they render others miserable; and constantly turning their backs on tranquillity and happiness, which, if they may be believed, are the sole ends of all their motions? But Demetrius was gradually seized with melancholy; and no longer amused himself with his former exercises: he grew corpulent, and entirely abandoned himself to drinking and gaming at dice, to which he devoted whole days, undoubtedly endeavouring by these methods to banish the melancholy thoughts of his condition. When he had continued in his captivity for the space of three years, he was seized with a severe distemper, occasioned by his inactivity, and intemperance in eating and drinking, and died at the age of fifty-four years. His son Antigonus, to whom the urn which enclosed his ashes was transmitted, celebrated his funeral with great magnificence. We shall see, in the sequel of the present history, that this Antigonus, who was surnamed Gonatas, continued peaceable possessor of the kingdom of Macedonia; and the race of this prince enjoyed the crown for several generations, in a direct line from father to son, till the reign of Perseus, who was the last of that family, and was dethroned by the Romans.

SECTION III.—PTOLEMY SOTER RESIGNS HIS KINGDOM TO HIS SON PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS. THE TOWER OF PHAROS BUILT. THE IMAGE OF SERAPIS CONVEYED TO ALEXANDRIA. THE CELEBRATED LIBRARY FOUNDED IN THAT CITY, WITH AN ACADEMY OF LEARNED MEN. DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS PRESIDES OVER BOTH. DEATH OF PTOLEMY SOTER.

PTOLEMY SOTER,¹ the son of Lagos, after a reign of twenty years A. M. 3719. in Egypt, with the title of king, Ant. J. C. 285. and of near thirty-nine from the death of Alexander, was desirous of transmitting the throne to Ptolemy Philadelphus,² one of his sons by Berenice. He had likewise several children by his other wives, and among them Ptolemy, surnamed Ceraunus, or The Thunderer; who being the son of Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, and the eldest of the male issue, considered the crown as his right, after the death of his father. But Berenice, who came into Egypt, merely to accompany Eurydice, at the time of her espousals with Ptolemy, had so charmed that prince with her beauty, that he married her; and so great was her ascendant over him, that she caused him to prefer her son to all his issue by the other queens. In order, therefore, to prevent all disputes and wars that might ensue after his death, which he was sensible could not be very remote, as he was then fourscore years of age; he resolved to have him crowned in his own lifetime, intending, at the same time, to resign all his dominions to him; declaring, that to create a king was more glorious than to be so one's self. The coronation of Philadelphus was celebrated with the most splendid festival that had ever been seen; but I reserve the description of it to the end of this section.

Ptolemy Ceraunus quitted the court, and retired to Lysimachus, whose son Agathocles had espoused Lysandra, the sister of Ceraunus, both by father and mother; and, after the death of Agathocles, he removed to the court of Seleucus, who received him with a generosity entirely uncommon, for which he afterwards repaid him with the blackest ingratitude, as will appear in the sequel of this history.

In the first year of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus,¹ which was also the first year of the 124th Olympiad, the famous watch-tower in the isle of Pharos was completed. It was usually called the tower of Pharos, and has been reputed one of the seven wonders of the world. It was a large square structure built of white marble, on the top of which a fire was constantly kept burning, in order to guide ships in their course. It cost 800 talents, which, estimated by the Athenian money, are equal to 200,000*l.*, but amount to almost double that sum if computed by the coin of Alexandria. The architect of the edifice was Sostratus of Cnidus, who, to perpetuate the whole honour of it to himself, had recourse to the artifice I have mentioned before.² Pharos was originally a real island, at the distance of seven furlongs from the continent; but was afterwards joined to it by a causeway like that of Tyre.

Much about this time the image A. M. 3720. of the god Serapis was brought Ant. J. C. 284. from Pontus to Alexandria.³ Ptolemy had been induced by a dream to demand it, by an embassy, of the king of Sinope, a city of Pontus, where it was kept. It was, however, refused him for the space of two years, till at last the inhabitants of Sinope suffered such extremities from a famine, that they consented to resign this god to Ptolemy for a supply of corn, which he transmitted to them; and the statue was then conveyed to Alexandria, and placed in one of the suburbs, called Rhacotis, where it was adored by the name of Serapis; and a famous temple, called the Serapion, was afterwards erected for it in that place. This structure, according to Ammianus Marcellinus,⁴ surpassed, in beauty and magnificence, all the temples in the world, except the Capitol at Rome. This temple had also a library, which became famous in all succeeding ages, for the number and value of the books it contained.

Ptolemy Soter had been careful to improve himself in polite literature,⁵ as was evident by his compiling the life of Alexander, which was greatly esteemed by the ancients, but is now entirely lost. In order to encourage the cultivation of the sciences, which he much admired, he founded an academy at Alexandria, called the Museum, where a society of learned men devoted themselves to philosophic studies, and the improvement of all other sciences, almost in the same manner as those of London and Paris. For this purpose, he began by giving them a library, which was prodigiously increased by his successors.

His son Philadelphus left 100,000 volumes in it at the time of his death,⁶ and the succeeding princes of that race enlarged it still more, till at last it consisted of 700,000 volumes.

This library was formed by the following method.⁷ All the Greek and other books that were brought into Egypt were seized, and sent to the Museum, where they were transcribed by persons employed for that purpose. The copies were then delivered to the proprietors, and the originals were deposited in the library. Ptolemy Euergetes, for instance, borrowed the works of Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus, of the Athenians, and only returned them the copies, which he caused to be transcribed in as beautiful a manner as possible; and he likewise presented them with fifteen talents (equal to 15,000 crowns) for the originals which he kept.

As the Museum was at first in that quarter of the city which was called Bruchion, and near the royal palace, the library was founded in the same place, and it soon drew vast numbers thither; but when it was so much augmented, as to contain 400,000 volumes, they began to deposit the additional books in the Serapion. This last library was a supplement to the former, for which reason it received the appellation of its Daughter, and in process of time had in it 300,000 volumes.

In Caesar's war with the inhabitants of Alexandria,⁸ a fire, occasioned by those hostilities, consumed the library of Bruchion, with its 400,000 volumes. Seneca seems to me to be out of humour,⁹ when, speaking of the conflagration, he bestows his censures, both on the library itself, and the eulogium made on it by Livy, who styles it an illustrious monument of the opulence of the Egyptian kings, and of their judicious attention to the improvement of the sciences. Seneca, instead of allowing it to be such, would have it considered only as a work resulting from the pride and vanity of those monarchs, who had amassed such a number of books, not for their own use, but merely for pomp and ostentation. This reflection, however, seems to discover very little sagacity; for is it not evident beyond contradiction, that none but kings are capable of founding these magnificent libraries, which became a necessary treasure to the learned, and do infinite honour to those states in which they are established?

The library of Serapion did not sustain any damage, and it was undoubtedly there, that Cleopatra deposited those 200,000 volumes from that of Pergamus, which were presented to her by Antony. This addition, with other enlargements that were made from time to time, rendered the new library of Alexandria more numerous and considerable than the first; and though it was ransacked more than once, during the troubles and revolutions which happened in the Roman empire, it always retrieved its losses, and recovered its number of volumes. In this condition it subsisted for many ages, displaying its treasures to the learned and curious, till the seventh century, when it suffered the same fate with its parent, and was burnt by the Saracens when they took that city in the year of our Lord 642. The manner by which this misfortune happened is too singular to be passed over in silence.

John,¹⁰ surnamed the Grammarian, a famous follower of Aristotle, happened to be at Alexandria when the city was taken; and as he was much esteemed by Amrou Ebn-el As, the general of the Saracen troops, he entreated that commander to bestow upon him the Alexandrian library. Amrou replied, that it was not in his power to grant such a request; but that he would write to the Khalif, or emperor of the Saracens, for his orders on that head, without which he could not presume to dispose of the library. He accordingly wrote to Omar, the then Khalif, whose answer was, that if those books contained the same doctrine with the Koran, they could not be of any use, because the Koran was sufficient in itself, and comprehended all necessary truths; but if they contained any particulars contrary to that book, they ought to be destroyed. In consequence of this answer, they were all condemned to the flames, without any farther examination; and, for that purpose, were distributed among the public baths; where, for the space of six months, they were used for fuel instead of wood. We may from hence form a just idea of the prodigious number of books contained in that library; and thus was this inestimable treasure of learning destroyed.

The Museum of Bruchion was not burnt with the library which was attached to it. Strabo¹¹ acquaints us, in this description of it, that it was a very large structure near the palace, and fronting the port; and that it was surrounded with a portico, in which the philosophers walked. He adds, that the members of this society were governed by a president, whose station was so honourable and important, that in the time of the Ptolemies, he was always chosen by the king himself, and afterwards by the Roman emperor; and that they had a hall where the whole society ate at the expense of the public, by whom they were supported in a very plentiful manner.

Alexandria was undoubtedly indebted to this Museum for the advantage she long enjoyed of being the greatest school in all that part of the world, and of having trained up a vast number of men who excelled in literature. It is from thence, in particular, that the Church has received some of its most illustrious doctors: as Clemens Alexandrinus, Anthonius, Origen, Anatolius, Athanasius, and many others; for all these studied in that seminary.

Demetrius Phalereus was probably the first president of this seat of learning; it is certain indeed that he had the superintendency of the library. Plutarch¹ informs us, that it was he who proposed to Ptolemy the establishment of a library of such authors as treated of civil polity and government, assuring him, that these would always supply him with such counsels as none of his friends would presume to offer him. In fact, this is almost the only expedient for introducing truth to princes, and showing them, under borrowed names, their duties as well as their defects. When the king had relished this excellent advice, and measures were taken to procure all such books as were requisite in his first view, it may easily be imagined that Demetrius carried the affair to a much greater length, and prevailed upon the king to collect all sorts of other books for the library we have mentioned. Who could better assist that prince in the accomplishment of so noble and magnificent a plan than Demetrius Phalereus, who was himself a learned man of the first rank, as well as a very able politician?

We have formerly seen what inducements brought Demetrius to the court of this prince.² He was received with open arms by Ptolemy Soter, who heaped a profusion of honours upon him, and made him his confidant. He consulted him, in preference to all his other counsellors, in the most important affairs, and particularly those which

A. M. 3719. related to the succession to the Ant. J. C. 285. crown. This prince, two years before his death, had formed a resolution to abdicate his crown in favour of one of his children. Demetrius endeavoured to dissuade him from that design, by representing to him, that he must no longer expect to enjoy any authority, if he divested himself of his dignity in such a manner, and that it would be dangerous to create himself a master. But when he found him absolutely determined on this abdication, he advised him to regulate his choice by the order prescribed by nature, which was generally followed by all nations: in consequence of which it would be incumbent on him to prefer his eldest son by Eurydice, his first wife. But the influence of Berenice prevailed over this equitable and prudent advice, which, in a short time, proved fatal to its author.

Towards the close of this year A. M. 3721. died Ptolemy Soter, king of Egypt, Ant. J. C. 283. in the eighty-fourth year of his age, and two years after his resignation of the empire to his son. He was the most able and worthy man of all his race, and left behind him such examples of prudence, justice, and clemency, as very few of his successors were industrious to imitate. During the space of near forty years, in which he governed Egypt after the death of Alexander, he raised it to such a height of grandeur and power, as rendered it superior to the other kingdoms. He retained upon the throne the same fondness for simplicity of manners, and the same aversion for ostentatious pomp, as he discovered when he first ascended it.—He was accessible to his subjects even to a degree of familiarity. He frequently ate with them at their own houses; and, when he gave any entertainment himself, he thought it no disgrace to borrow plate from the rich, because he had but very little of his own, and no more than was necessary for his common use. And when some persons represented to him that the regal dignity seemed to require an air of greater opulence,³ his answer was, "That the true grandeur of a king consisted in enriching others, not in being rich himself."

SECTION IV.—THE MAGNIFICENT SOLEMNITY AT THE INAUGURATION OF PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS, KING OF EGYPT.

PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS, after his father had abdicated the crown in his favour, entertained the people, when he ascended the throne, with the most splendid festival mentioned in ancient history. Athenæus has left us a long description of it, transcribed from Callixenes, the Rhodian, who compiled a history of Alexandria, and Mountfaucou relates it in his Antiquities. I shall insert the particulars of it in this place, because they are well calculated to give us an idea of the riches and opulence of Egypt. I may add too, that as ancient authors speak very often of sacred pomp, processions, and solemn festivals, in honour of their gods, I thought it incumbent on me to give some idea of them for once, by describing one of the most celebrated solemnities that was ever known. Plutarch, who is perpetually mentioning triumphs among the Romans, has the approbation of his readers for his particular description of that of Paulus Æmilius, which was one of the most magnificent. But if the account I shall now give should appear unseasonable, or too prolix, it may be passed over, without interrupting the series of this history; for I declare beforehand, that the relation will be something tedious.

This pompous solemnity continued a whole day,⁴ and was conducted through the whole extent of the city of Alexandria. It was divided into several parts, and formed a variety of separate processions. Beside those of the king's father and mother, the gods had, each of them, a distinct cavalcade, the decorations of which were descriptive of their history.

Athenæus has related only the particulars of that of Bacchus, by which a judgment may be formed of the magnificence of the rest.

The procession began with a troop of Sileni, some habited in purple, others in robes of a deep red: their employment was to keep off the crowd, and make way.

Next to the Sileni came a band of Satyrs, composed of twenty, in two ranks, each carrying a gilded lamp.

These were succeeded by Victories, with golden wings, carrying vases, in which perfumes were burning, nine feet in height, partly gilt, and partly adorned with the leaves of ivy. Their habits were embroidered with the figures of animals, and every part of them glittered with gold.

After these came a double altar, nine feet in height, and covered with a luxuriant foliage of ivy, intermixed with ornaments of gold. It was also beautified with a golden crown, composed of vine leaves, and adorned on all sides with certain white fillets.

A hundred and twenty youths advanced next, clothed in purple vests; each of them bearing a golden vase of incense, myrrh, and saffron.

They were followed by forty Satyrs, wearing crowns of gold which represented the leaves of ivy; and in the right hand of each was another crown of the same metal, adorned with vine leaves. Their habits were diversified with a variety of colours.

In the rear of these marched two Sileni, arrayed in purple mantles, and white drawers; one of them wore a kind of hat, and carried a golden caduceus in his hand; the other had a trumpet. Between these two was a man, six feet in height, masked and habited like a tragedian. He also carried a golden cornucopia, and was distinguished by the appellation of the Year.

This person preceded a very beautiful woman, as tall as himself, dressed in a magnificent manner, and glittering all over with gold. She held, in one hand, a crown composed of the leaves of the peach-tree, and in the other a branch of palm. She was called Penteteris.¹

The next in the procession were the Genii of the four seasons, wearing characteristic ornaments, and supporting two golden vases of odours, adorned with ivy leaves. In the midst of them was a square altar of gold.

A band of Satyrs then appeared, wearing golden crowns, fashioned like the leaves of ivy, and arrayed in red habits. Some bore vessels filled with wine, others carried drinking cups.

Immediately after these came Philiscus, the poet and priest of Bacchus, attended by comedians, musicians, dancers, and other persons of that class.

Two tripods were carried next, as prizes for the victors at the athletic combats and exercises. One of these tripods, being thirteen feet and a half in height, was intended for the youths; the other, which was eighteen feet high, was designed for the men.

A car of an extraordinary size followed these. It had four wheels,² was twenty-one feet in length, and twelve in breadth, and was drawn by 180 men. In this car was a figure representing Bacchus, fifteen feet in height, in the attitude of performing libations with a large cup of gold. He was arrayed in a robe of brocade purple, which flowed down to his feet. Over this was a transparent vest of a saffron colour, and above that a large purple mantle embroidered with gold. Before him was a great vessel of gold, formed in the Lacedæmonian fashion, and containing fifteen measures, called metretres.³ This was accompanied with a golden tripod, on which were placed a golden vase of odours, with two cups of the same metal, full of cinnamon and saffron. Bacchus was seated under the shade of ivy and vine leaves, intermixed with the foliage of fruit trees; and from these hung several crowns, fillets, and thyrsi, with timbrels, ribands, and a variety of satiric, comic, and tragic masks. In the same car were the priests and priestesses of that deity, with the other ministers, and interpreters of mysteries, dancers of all classes, and women bearing vases.⁴

These were followed by the Bacchantes, who marched with their hair dishevelled, and wore crowns composed, some of serpents, others of branches of the yew, the vine, or the ivy. Some of these women carried knives in their hands, others grasped serpents.

After these advanced another car, twelve feet in breadth, and drawn by sixty men. In this was the statue of Nysa, or Nysæ, sitting, twelve feet high, and clothed with a yellow vest embroidered with gold, over which was another Laconic habit. The statue rose by the aid of some machines, without being touched by any person, and after it had poured milk out of a golden cup, it resumed its former seat. Its left hand held a thyrsus adorned with ribands; and it wore a golden crown, on which were represented leaves of ivy, with clusters of grapes, composed of various gems. It was covered with a deep shade, formed by blended foliage, and a gilded lamp hung at each corner of the car.

After this came another car, thirty-six feet in length, and twenty-four in breadth, drawn by 300 men. On this was placed a wine-press, also thirty-six feet long, and twenty-two and a half broad; this was full of the produce of the vintage. Six Satyrs trod the grapes, to the sound of the flute, and sung such airs as corresponded with the action in which they were employed. Silenus was the chief of the band, and streams of wine flowed from the chariot, throughout the whole procession.

Another car of the same magnitude was drawn by 600 men. This carried a vat of a prodigious size made of leopards' skins sewed together. The vessel contained 3000 measures, and shed a constant effusion of wine during the procession.

This car was followed by 120 crowned Satyrs and Sileni, carrying pots, flagons, and large cups, all of gold.

This troop was immediately succeeded by a silver vat, containing 600 metretres, placed on a car drawn by the same number of men. The vessel was adorned with chased work, and the rim, together with the two handles and the base, were embellished with the figures of animals. The middle part of it was encompassed with a golden crown adorned with jewels.

Next appeared two silver bowls, eighteen feet in diameter, and nine in height. The upper part of their circumference was adorned with studs, and the bottom with several animals, three of which were a foot and a half high, and many more of a lesser size.

These were followed by ten great vats, and sixteen other vessels, the largest of which contained thirty metretres, and the least five: there were likewise ten cauldrons, twenty-four vases with two handles, disposed on five salvers; two silver wine-presses, on which were placed twenty-four goblets; a table of massy silver, eighteen feet in length, and thirty more of six feet; four tripods, one of which was of massy silver, and had a circumference of twenty-four feet; the other three that were smaller, were adorned with precious stones in the middle.

Then came eighty Delphic tripods, all of silver, something less than the preceding. They were likewise accompanied with twenty-six ewers, sixteen flagons, and 160 other vessels, the largest of which contained six metretres, and the smallest two. All these vessels were of silver.

After these came the golden vessels; four of which, called Laonic, were crowned with vine leaves: these were likewise two Corinthian vases, whose rims and middle circumference were embellished with the figures of animals; these contained eight metretres, a wine-press, on which ten goblets were placed: two other vases, each of which contained five metretres, and two more that held a couple of measures: twenty-two vessels for preserving liquors cool, the largest of which contained thirty metretres, and the least one; four golden tripods of an extraordinary size: a kind of golden basket, intended as a repository for vessels of the same metal; this was enriched with jewels, and was fifteen feet in length; it was likewise divided into six partitions, one above another, adorned with various figures of animals, above three feet in height: two goblets, and two glass bowls with golden ornaments: two salvers of gold, four cubits in diameter, and three others of less dimensions: ten ewers, an altar four feet and a half high; and twenty-five dishes.

After this rich equipage, marched 1600 youths, habited in white vests, and crowned, some of them with ivy, others with branches of the pine. Two hundred and fifty of this band carried golden vases, and 400 of them vases of silver. Three hundred more carried silver vessels, made to keep liquors cool.

After this appeared another troop bearing large drinking vessels, twenty of which were of gold, fifty of silver, and 300 diversified with various colours.

There were likewise several tables, six feet in length, and supporting a variety of remarkable objects. On one was represented the bed of Semele, on which were disposed several vests, some of golden brocade, others adorned with precious stones.

We must not omit a car thirty-three feet in length and twenty-one in breadth, drawn by 500 men. In this was the representation of a deep cavern, shrouded with ivy and vine leaves; from which several pigeons, ring-doves, and turtles, issued out and flew about. Little bands were fastened to their feet, that they might be caught by the people around them. Two fountains, likewise, one of milk and the other of wine, flowed out of the cavern. All the nymphs who stood round it wore crowns of gold. Mercury was also seen, with a golden caduceus in his hand, and clothed in a splendid manner.

² All the cars of which mention will be made in the sequel of this relation, had also four wheels.

The expedition of Bacchus into the Indies was exhibited in another car, where the god was represented by a statue, eighteen feet in height, and mounted upon an elephant. He was arrayed in purple, and wore a golden crown, intermixed with twining ivy and vine leaves. A long thyrsus of gold was in his hand, and his sandals were of the same metal. On the neck of the elephant was seated a Satyr above seven feet high, with a crown of gold on his head, formed in imitation of pine branches, and blowing a kind of trumpet made of a goat's horn. The trappings of the elephant were of gold, and his neck was adorned with a crown of that metal shaped like the foliage of ivy.

This car was followed by 500 young virgins, adorned with purple vests and golden zones. A hundred and twenty of them, who commanded the rest, wore crowns of gold that seemed to be composed of the branches of pine.

Next to these came 120 Satyrs, armed at all points, some in silver, and others in copper, arms.

To these succeeded five troops of Sileni, and Satyrs with crowns on their heads, mounted on asses, some of whom were entirely harnessed with gold, the rest with silver.

After this troop appeared a long train of chariots, twenty-four of which were drawn by elephants; sixty by he-goats; twelve by lions; six by oryxes, a species of goats; fifteen by buffaloes; four by wild asses; eight by ostriches; and seven by stags. In these chariots were little youths habited like charioteers, and wearing hats with broad brims. They were accompanied by others of a less stature, armed with little bucklers, and with long thyrsi, and clothed in mantles embroidered with gold. The boys who performed the office of charioteers, were crowned with branches of pine, and the lesser youths with ivy.

On each side of these were three cars drawn by camels, and followed by others drawn by mules. In these cars were several tents, resembling those of the barbarians, with Indian women, and those of other nations, habited like slaves. Some of these camels carried 300 pounds' weight of incense; others 200 of saffron, cinnamon, iris, and other odoriferous spices.

At a little distance from these marched a band of Æthiopians, armed with pikes. One body of these carried 600 elephants' teeth; another, 2000 branches of ebony; a third, sixty cups of gold and silver, with a large quantity of gold dust.

After these came two hunters carrying gilded darts, and marching at the head of 2400 dogs of the Indian, Hyrcanian, and Molossian breed, besides a variety of other species.

They were succeeded by 150 men supporting trees, to which were fastened several species of birds and deer. Cages were also carried, in which were parrots, peacocks, turkey-hens, pheasants, and a great number of Æthiopian birds. After these appeared 130 sheep of that country; 300 of the Arabian breed; twenty of the island of Eubœa; twenty-six white Indian oxen, eight of the Æthiopian species; also a large white bear; fourteen leopards; sixteen panthers; four lynxes; three small bears; a camelopard, and an Æthiopian rhinoceros.

Bacchus advanced next, seated in a car, and wearing a golden crown embellished with ivy leaves. He was represented as taking sanctuary at the altar of Rhea, from the persecution of Juno. Priapus was placed near him, with a crown of gold formed like the leaves of ivy. The statue of Juno was crowned with a golden diadem; and those of Alexander and Ptolemy wore crowns of fine gold, representing ivy leaves. The image of Virtue was placed near that of Ptolemy, and on her head was a crown of gold made in imitation of olive branches. Another statue, representing the city of Corinth, was also near Ptolemy, with a golden diadem on its head. At a little distance from each of these was a great vase filled with golden cups, with a large bowl of the same metal, which contained five melretes.

This car was followed by several women richly arrayed, and bearing the names of the Ionian, and other Greek cities in Asia; with the islands which had formerly been conquered by the Persians. All this train wore crowns of gold.

In another car was a golden thyrsus, 135 feet in length, and a silver lance ninety feet long.

In this part of the procession were a variety of wild beasts and horses, and twenty-four lions of a prodigious size; and also a great number of cars, in which were not only the statues of kings, but those of several deities.

After these came a chorus of 600 men, among whom were 300 who played on gilded harps, and wore golden crowns. At a small distance from this band marched 2000 bulls, all of the same colour, and adorned with golden frontlets, in the middle of which rose a crown of the same metal. They were also adorned with a collar, and an ægis^a hung on the breast of each. All these trappings were of gold.

The procession of Jupiter, and a great number of other deities, advanced next, and after all the rest, that of Alexander, whose statue of massy gold was placed in a car drawn by elephants; on one side of this statue stood Victory, and on the other Minerva.

The procession was graced with several thrones of gold and ivory, on one of which was a large diadem of gold, and on another a horn of the same metal. A third supported a crown; and a fourth a horn of solid gold. On the throne of Ptolemy Soter, the father of the reigning prince, was a golden crown, which weighed 10,000 pieces of gold.^b

In this procession were likewise 300 golden vases, in which perfumes were to be burnt; fifty gilded altars, encompassed with golden crowns. Four torches of gold, fifteen feet in height, were fastened to one of these altars. There were likewise twelve gilded hearts, one of which was eighteen feet in circumference, and sixty in height; and another was only twenty-two feet and a half high. Nine Delphic tripods of gold appeared next, six feet in height; and there were six others, nine feet high. The largest of all was forty-five feet high; on which were placed several animals in gold, seven feet and a half high, and its upper part was encompassed with a golden crown, formed of a foliage of vine leaves.

After these were seen several gilded palms, twelve feet in length, together with a caduceus, gilt also, sixty-six feet long; a gilded thunderbolt, in length sixty feet; a gilded temple, sixty feet in circumference; a double horn, twelve feet long; a vast number of gilded animals, several of which were eighteen feet in height. To these were added several deer of a stupendous size, and a set of eagles thirty feet high.

Three thousand two hundred crowns of gold were likewise carried in this procession; together with a consecrated crown, of 120 feet, most probably, in circumference; it was likewise adorned with a profusion of gems, and surrounded the entrance into the temple of Berenice. There was also another golden ægis. Several large crowns of gold were also supported by young virgins richly habited. One of these crowns was three feet in height, and twenty-four in circumference.

In this procession were also carried a golden culras, eighteen feet in height; and another of silver, twenty-seven feet high, on which latter was the representation of two thunderbolts of gold, eighteen feet in length: an oak crown embellished with jewels; twenty golden bucklers; sixty-four complete suits of golden armour; two boots of the same metal, four feet and a half in length; twelve golden basins; a great number of flagons; ten large vases of perfumes for the baths; twelve ewers; fifty dishes, and a large number of tables; all these were of gold. There were likewise five tables covered with golden goblets; and a horn of solid gold, forty-five feet in length. All those golden vessels and other ornaments were in a separate procession from that of Bacchus, which has been already described.

^a A kind of buckler which covered the breast, on the middle of which was embossed the Gorgon's head.

^b The Attic Stater, usually called zeucus, was equal to ten livres of French money; the value therefore of this single crown amounted to 100,000 French livres, which are about 5000*l.* sterling.

^c This animal, whether real or fabulous, is mentioned by Horace: Diversum confusa genus panthera camelo.

There were likewise 400 chariots laden with vessels, and other works of silver; twenty others filled with golden vessels, and 800 more appropriated to the carriage of aromatic spices.

The troops that guarded this procession were composed of 57,600 foot, and 23,200 horse, all dressed and armed in a magnificent manner.

During the games and public combats, which continued for some days after this pompous solemnity, Ptolemy Soter presented the victors with twenty crowns of gold, and they received twenty-three from his consort Berenice. It appeared, by the registers of the palace, that these last crowns were valued at 2230 talents, and fifty mine, about 334,400*l.* sterling: from whence some judgment may be formed of the immense sums to which all the gold and silver employed in this splendid ceremonial amounted.

Such was the pageant (shall I call it religious, or rather theatrical and comic?) exhibited by Ptolemy Philadelphus at his coronation. If Fabricius, the famous Roman, whom I have formerly mentioned, so remarkable for his contempt of gold and silver, had been a spectator of it, I am persuaded that he would not have been able to endure the sight of the procession till it closed, and have no doubt that he would have thought and spoken like the emperor Vespasian, upon an occasion which had some resemblance to this. He and his son Titus made a triumphant entry into Rome, after the capture of Jerusalem; but finding himself fatigued with the excessive length of that pompous procession, he could not conceal his displeasure, and declared that he was justly punished, by that tedious ceremony, for his weakness in desiring a triumph at his advanced age.¹

In this festival given by Ptolemy Philadelphus, no part of it seems to have been conducted with any elegance, or to have had the least air of taste and genius. An amazing profusion of gold and silver was lavished, which makes me recollect a passage in Sallust the beauty and force of which I have the mortification not to be able to render in our language. Catiline wishes to represent the immoderate luxury of the Romans his contemporaries, who lavished immense sums in the purchase of pictures, statues, wrought plate, and superb buildings. "They draw out (says he) and torment their gold and silver by all imaginable methods." (I must entreat the reader's excuse for this literal translation,) "and yet this excess of prodigality is incapable of exhausting and overcoming their riches,"—Omnibus modis pecuniam trahunt, vexant;² tamen summâ lubricidâ divitiis suas vincere nequeunt. In such profusion as this did the whole merit of Philadelphus consist on this occasion.

In fact, what is there truly great or admirable in this vain ostentation of riches, and this waste of such immense treasure in a bottomless abyss, after they had cost the people so much fatigue and labour, and perhaps had been amassed by a long series of violent exactions? The spoils of whole provinces and cities were sacrificed to the curiosity of a single day, and displayed to public view only to raise the frivolous admiration of a stupid populace, without conducting to the least real advantage or utility. Nothing ever argued a more profound ignorance of the true use of riches and solid glory, and of whatever else has any just pretensions to the esteem of mankind.

But what can we say, when we behold a sacred procession, and a solemnity of religion converted into a public school of intemperance and licentiousness, calculated only to excite the most shameful passions in the spectators, and induce an utter depravity of manners; by presenting to their view all the instruments of excess and debauch, with the most powerful allurements to indulge them, and that under the pretext of paying adoration to the gods! What divinities must those be, that would suffer, and even exact, so scandalous a pomp in their worship.

SECTION V.—THE FIRST TRANSACTIONS OF THE REIGN OF PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS. THE DEATH OF DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS. SELEUCUS RESIGNS HIS QUEEN AND PART OF HIS EMPIRE TO HIS SON ANTIOCHUS. THE WAR BETWEEN SELEUCUS AND LYSIMACHUS; THE LATTER OF WHOM IS SLAIN IN A BATTLE. SELEUCUS IS ASSASSINATED BY PTOLEMY CERAUNUS, ON WHOM HE HAD CONFERRED A MULTITUDE OF OBLIGATIONS. THE TWO SONS OF ARSINOE ARE MURDERED BY THEIR UNCLE CERAUNUS, WHO ALSO BANISHES THAT PRINCESS. CERAUNUS IS SOON PUNISHED FOR THOSE CRIMES BY THE IRRUPTION OF THE GAULS, BY WHOM HE IS SLAIN IN A BATTLE. THE ATTEMPT OF THAT PEOPLE AGAINST THE TEMPLE OF DELPHI. ANTIGONUS ESTABLISHES HIMSELF IN MACEDONIA.

PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS,³ after the death of his father, became sole master of all his dominions, which were composed of Egypt, and many provinces dependent on it, that is to say, Phœnicia, Coele-Syria, Arabia, Libya, Æthiopia, the island of Cyprus, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Lycia, Caria, and the isles called the Cyclades. A. M. 3721. Ant. J. C. 283.

During the life of Ptolemy Soter, Philadelphus had concealed his resentment against Demetrius Phalereus, for the advice he had given his father, when he was deliberating on the choice of a successor. But as soon as he saw himself sole master, he caused that philosopher to be seized, and sent with a strong guard to a remote fortress, where he ordered him to be confined, till he should determine in what manner to treat him. The bite of an asp put a period to the life of that great man, who merited a better fate.⁴

The testimonies in his favour, which are adduced by Cicero, Strabo, Plutarch, Diodorus Siculus, and many others, leave no room to doubt of the probity and wisdom of his government; we therefore shall consider only what has been observed with respect to his eloquence.

The characteristics of his writings, as Cicero observes in several places,⁵ were sweetness, elegance, beauty, grace, and ornament, so that it was easy to distinguish in them the disciple of Theophrastus. He excelled in that species of eloquence, which is called the temperate and florid. His style, in other respects gentle and calm, was adorned and ennobled with bold and shining metaphors, that enlivened the subject of his discourse, though otherwise not enriched in any great degree with noble sentiments, and those beauties that constitute the great and the sublime. He was rather to be considered as a wrestler, formed in the shade and tranquillity, for public games and spectacles, than as a soldier inured to arms by exercise, and quitting his tent to attack an en-ay. His discourse had, indeed, the faculty of affecting his hearers with something soft and tender, but it wanted energy to inspire that force and ardour that inflame the mind, and only left in it at most an agreeable remembrance of some transient sweetness and graces, not unlike that which we retain after hearing the most harmonious concerts.

It must be confessed, this species of eloquence has its merits, when confined within just bounds; but as it is very difficult and unusual to preserve this due moderation, and to suppress the sallies of a fertile and lively imagination, not always guided by the judgment; this kind of eloquence is apt, therefore, to degenerate, and to become, even from its very beauties, a pernicious delicacy, which at length vitiates and depraves the taste. This was the effect, according to Cicero and Quintilian, who were good judges in this point, of the florid and studied graces peculiar to the style of Demetrius. Athens, till his time,¹ had been accustomed to a noble and majestic eloquence, whose characteristic was a natural beauty without paint and glitter. Demetrius was the first that impaired this manly and solid eloquence, to which he substituted a soft and languishing species, if I may use the expression, that abated the vigour of the mind, and at length rendered false taste predominant.

After the death of Ptolemy, two of Alexander's captains still survived, Lysimachus and Seleucus, who till then, had always been united by interest and friendship, and were engaged to each other by treaties and confederations: as they were now advancing to the period of their days (for each of them had exceeded fourscore years of age), one would have thought they should have been desirous of ending their lives in the union which had so long subsisted between them: instead of which, they thought only of making war against, and destroying each other. Their quarrel arose on the following occasion.

Lysimachus, after the marriage of his son Agathocles with Lysandra, one of the daughters of Ptolemy, espoused another himself, whose name was Arsinoe, and had several children by her. The different interests of these two sisters led them into all sorts of intrigues,² to form a powerful party in their favour, upon the death of Lysimachus. What are ambitious wives and mothers not capable of attempting! Their opposition was not the mere effect of personal interest, but was chiefly fomented by the disputes of their mothers. Lysandra was the daughter of Eurydice, and Arsinoe of Berenice. The arrival of Ptolemy Ceraunus the brother of Philadelphus, at his court, made Arsinoe apprehensive that his interest would strengthen too much the party of Lysandra, who was his sister by the same mother; and that they would accomplish the destruction of herself, and her own children at the death of Lysimachus. This calamity she was determined to prevent, by sacrificing Agathocles to her suspicions; and she succeeded in her design, by representing him to her husband, as one who had formed a conspiracy against his life and crown, by which she so much incensed him against his own son, that he caused him to be imprisoned and put to death. Lysandra and her children, with her brother Ceraunus, and Alexander, another son of Lysimachus, took sanctuary in the court of Seleucus, and prevailed upon him to declare war against Lysimachus. Several of Lysimachus's principal officers, and even those who had been most devoted to his interest, were struck with so much horror at the murder of his son, that they entirely abandoned him, and retired to the court of Seleucus, where they strengthened the remonstrances of Lysandra by their own complaints. Seleucus was easily induced to undertake this war, for which he was already sufficiently disposed by views of interest.

Before he engaged in this enterprise,³ he resigned his queen Stratonice to his son Antiochus, for a reason I shall soon relate, and consigned to him, at the same time, a considerable part of his empire, reserving to himself no other territories than the provinces between the Euphrates and the sea.

Antiochus was seized with a lingering distemper, of which the physicians were incapable of discovering the cause; for which reason his condition was thought entirely desperate. It is easy to conceive the grief and anxiety of a father who beheld himself on the point of losing his son in the flower of his age, whom he had intended for his successor in his vast dominions, and in whom all the happiness of his life consisted. Erasistratus, the most attentive and most skilful of all the physicians, having carefully considered every symptom with which the indisposition of the young prince was attended, believed at last that he had discovered its true cause, and that it proceeded from love; in which conjecture he was not deceived. It was, however, over difficult to discover the object of this passion, which was the more violent from the secrecy in which it remained. The physician, therefore, to assure himself fully of what he surmised, passed whole days in the apartment of his patient, and when he saw any lady enter, he carefully observed the countenance of the prince, and never discovered the least emotion in him, except when Stratonice came into the chamber, either alone, or with the king her consort; at which times the young prince was, as Plutarch observes, always affected with the symptoms described by Sappho, as so many indications of a violent passion: such, for instance, as a suppression of voice; burning blushes; dimness of sight; cold sweat; a sensible inequality and disorder of pulse; with a variety of the like symptoms. When the physician was afterwards alone with his patient, he managed his inquiries with so much dexterity, as at last drew the secret from him. Antiochus confessed his passion for queen Stratonice his mother-in-law, and declared that he had in vain employed all his efforts to vanquish it: he added, that he had a thousand times had recourse to every consideration that could be represented to his thoughts in such a conjuncture: particularly the respect due from him to a father and sovereign, by whom he was tenderly beloved; the shame of indulging a passion altogether unjustifiable, and contrary to all the rules of decency and honour; the folly of harbouring a desire he ought never to be desirous of gratifying; but that his reason, in its present state of distraction, entirely engrossed by one object, would hearken to nothing. And he concluded with declaring, that to punish himself, for desires involuntary in one sense, but criminal in every other, he had resolved to pine to death, by discontinuing all care of his health, and abstaining from every kind of food.

The physician gained a very considerable point, by penetrating into the source of his patient's disorder; but the application of the proper remedy was much more difficult to be accomplished; and how could a proposal of this nature be made to a parent and king? When next Seleucus inquired after his son's health, Erasistratus replied, that his distemper was incurable, because it arose from a secret passion which could never be gratified, as the lady he loved was not to be obtained. The father, surprised and afflicted at this answer, desired to know why the lady was not to be obtained? "Because she is my wife," replied the physician, "and I am not disposed to yield her up to the embraces of another."—"And will you not part with her, then," replied the king, "to preserve the life of a son I so tenderly love! Is this the friendship you profess for me?"—"Let me entreat you, my lord," said Erasistratus, "to imagine yourself for one moment in my place; would you resign your Stratonice to his arms? If you, therefore, who are a father, would not consent to such a sacrifice for the welfare of a son so dear to you, how can you expect another should do it?"—"Would to God," exclaimed Seleucus, "that the cure of my son depended only on my acquiescence, I would resign both Stratonice and my empire to him with all my soul."—"Your majesty, then," replied the physician, "has the remedy in your own hands; for it is Stratonice whom he loves." The father did not hesitate a moment after this declaration, and easily obtained the consent of his consort: and his son and that princess were crowned king and queen of Upper Asia. Julian the apostate relates,¹ in a fragment of his writings still extant, that Antiochus would not espouse Stratonice till after the death of his father.

Whatever traces of reserve, moderation, and even modesty, appear in the conduct of this young prince, his example shows us the misfortune of suffering an unlawful passion, capable of discomposing all the happiness and tranquillity of life, to gain the least entrance into the heart.

Seleucus being now eased of his inquietude,² thought of nothing but marching against Lysimachus. He therefore put himself at the head of a fine army, and advanced into Asia Minor. All the country submitted to him as far as Sardis, which he besieged and took; by which means he became master of all the treasures of Lysimachus.

The latter having passed the Hellespont in order to check the progress of Seleucus, gave him battle in Phrygia,³ but was defeated and slain; in consequence of which Seleucus made himself master of all his dominions. His greatest pleasure on this occasion resulted from his being the only survivor of all the captains of Alexander,⁴ and, by the event of this battle, victorious over conquerors themselves, for that was the expression he thought fit to use, and this advantage was considered by him as the effect of a peculiar providence in his favour. The last victory was undoubtedly the best justification of the title of Nicator, or the conqueror, which he had already assumed, and which is usually given him by the historians, in order to distinguish him from the other princes of the name of Seleucus who reigned after him in Syria.⁵

His triumph on this occasion was

A. M. 3724. of no long continuance; for when Ant. J. C. 280. he went, seven months after his victory, to take possession of Macedonia, where he proposed to pass the remainder of his days in the bosom of his native country, he was basely assassinated by Ceraunus, on whom he had conferred innumerable honours and obligations; for he had received him into his court, when he fled from his own country, and had treated him suitably to his rank. He had also carried that prince with him in this expedition; intending, when it should be completed, to employ the same forces for his establishment on the throne of his father in Egypt. But this wretch, insensible of all the favours he had received, had the villany to conspire against his benefactor, and assassinate him.

He had reigned twenty years, from the battle of Ipsus, when the title of king was secured to him; and thirty-one, if the commencement of his reign be fixed twelve years after the death of Alexander, when he became master of Asia; from which time the era of the Seleucidæ commences.

A late dissertation of Monsieur de la Nauze gives him a reign of more than fifty years,⁶ by adding to it the nineteen years of his son Antiochus Soter. The author pretends, that Seleucus Nicator did not entirely divest himself of the government, but began with making a partition of his dominions; and that he afterwards re-united them, even in the lifetime of his son. He has produced probable reasons in favour of his opinion; but as I never engage in contests of this nature, I shall confine myself to the chronology of Usher, which has been my usual guide, and which assigns, with Father Petau and Monsieur Vaillant, thirty-one years to the reign of Seleucus Nicator.

This prince had extraordinary qualities; and without mentioning his military accomplishments, it may be justly said, that he distinguished himself among the other kings, by his great love of justice, a benevolence and clemency that endeared him to the people, and a peculiar regard to religion. He had likewise a taste for polite literature, and made it a circumstance of pleasure and glory to himself, to send back to the Athenians the library which Xerxes had carried away, and which he found in Persia. He also accompanied that present with the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, whom the Athenians honoured as their deliverers.

The friends of Lysimachus, with those who had served under that prince, at first considered Ceraunus as the avenger of his death, and acknowledged him for their king; but his conduct soon caused them to change their sentiments.

He did not expect to possess the dominions of Lysimachus in peace,⁷ while his sister Arsinoe and the children she had by Lysimachus were living; for which reason he determined to rid himself at once of them and the apprehensions they gave him. The greatest crimes cost the ambitious no remorse. Ceraunus feigned a passion for his sister, and demanded her hand in marriage; and as these incestuous marriages were frequent and allowed in Egypt, Arsinoe, who was well acquainted with the natural disposition of her brother, protracted, as much as possible, the conclusion of that affair, the consequences of which she feared would be fatal to herself and children. But the more she delayed and concealed her repugnance under plausible pretexes, the more warmly he pressed her to gratify his passion: and in order to remove all suspicion, he repaired to that temple which the Macedonians held in the greatest veneration, and there, in the presence of one of her confidential friends, whom she had sent to him, he called the tutelary gods of the country to witness, embracing their statues at the same time, and protesting, with the most dreadful oaths and imprecations, that his views, with respect to the marriage he solicited, were perfectly pure and innocent.

Arsinoe placed but little confidence in these promises, though they were uttered before the altars, and had been ratified with the awful seal of religion; but she was apprehensive, at the same time that persisting in an obstinate refusal would be fatal to her children, for whose welfare she was more solicitous than for her own. She, therefore, consented at last; and the nuptials were celebrated with the greatest magnificence, and with all the indications of the most unaffected joy and tenderness. Ceraunus placed the diadem on the head of his sister, and declared her queen, in the presence of the whole army. Arsinoe felt a real joy, when she beheld herself so gloriously re-established in the privileges of which she had been divested by the death of Lysimachus, her first husband; and she invited her new spouse to reside with her in her own city of Cassandria, to which she first repaired herself, in order to make the necessary preparations for his arrival. The temples, on that occasion, with all the public squares and private houses, were magnificently adorned; and nothing was to be seen but altars and victims ready for sacrifice. The two sons of Arsinoë, Lysimachus, who was then sixteen years of age, and Philip, who was thirteen, both princes of admirable beauty and majestic mien, advanced to meet the king, with crowns on their heads, it being a day of so much solemnity and joy. Ceraunus threw his arms around their necks, and embraced them with as much tenderness as could well be expressed by the fondest of fathers.

The comic part ended here and was presently succeeded by a bloody tragedy. As soon as he entered the city, he seized the citadel, and ordered the two brothers to be murdered. Those unfortunate princes fled for refuge to the queen, who clasped them in her arms, and vainly endeavoured, by covering them with her body, to save them from the daggers of their murderers, who killed them in the bosom of their mother. Instead of being allowed the sad consolation of rendering the last offices to her children, she was first dragged out of the city, with her robes all rent, and her hair dishevelled, and then banished into Samothrace, with only two female servants to attend her, mournfully considering her surviving the princes her sons, as the completion of all her calamities.

Providence would not suffer such crimes to go long unpunished,¹ but Ant. J. C. 279. called forth a distant people to be the ministers of its vengeance.

The Gauls, finding their own country too populous, sent out a prodigious number of people to seek a new settlement in some other land. This swarm of foreigners came from the extremity of the ocean, and after proceeding along the Danube, arrived at the outlet of the Save, and then divided themselves into three bodies. The first, commanded by Brennus and Acichorius, entered Pannonia, now known by the name of Hungary: the second marched into Thrace, under Cerethrius; and Belgus led the third into Illyrium and Macedonia.

All the nations near whose territories this people approached, were struck with so much terror, that instead of waiting till they were subdued, they dispatched ambassadors to the Gauls, and thought themselves exceedingly happy in purchasing a peace with money. Ptolemy Ceraunus,² king of Macedonia, was the only prince who was undismayed at the tidings of this formidable irruption; and running headlong of himself on the punishment the divine vengeance was preparing to inflict upon him for the murders he had perpetrated, he advanced to meet the Gauls with a small body of undisciplined troops, as if it had been as easy for him to fight battles as it was to commit crimes. He had even the imprudence to refuse a supply of 20,000 men, which the Dardanians, a neighbouring people to Macedonia, offered him; and answered with an insulting air, that Macedonia would be much to be pitied, if, after it had conquered all the East by itself alone, it could need the aid of the Dardanians to defend its frontiers; to which he added, with a haughty tone of triumph, that he would face the enemy with the children of those who, under the ensigns of Alexander, had subdued the universe.

He expressed himself in the same imperious strain to the Gauls, who first offered him peace by a deputation, in case he would purchase it; but, conceiving this offer the result of fear, he replied, that he would never enter into any treaty of peace with them, unless they would deliver up some of the principal persons of their nation to him as hostages; and that they must likewise send him their arms, before he would place any confidence in their promises. This answer was received with contempt by the Gauls; and we may from hence observe the methods usually employed by the Deity, in chastising the pride and injustice of princes: he first deprives them of reason and counsel, and then abandons them to their vain imaginations.

A few days after this event, a battle was fought wherein the Macedonians were entirely defeated and cut to pieces: Ptolemy, covered with wounds, was taken prisoner by the Gauls; who, after they had cut off his head, fixed it on a lance, and showed it to the enemy in derision. A very inconsiderable number of Macedonians saved themselves by flight, but all the rest were either slain or made prisoners. The Gauls dispersed themselves, after this victory, in order to pillage the adjacent country; upon which Sosithenes, one of the principal persons among the Macedonians, collected some few troops, and taking advantage of the disorder in which they then were, destroyed a great number of their men, and obliged the rest to quit the country.

Brennus then advanced into Macedonia with his troops; but this leader is not to be confounded with that other Brennus who took the city of Rome, about a century before. Upon the intelligence he had received of the first success of Belgus, and the great booty he had acquired, he envied him the spoils of so rich a country, and immediately formed a resolution to have a part. When he received the news of that general's defeat, it only served as a new motive to hasten his march; his impatience to revenge his countrymen uniting with his desire to enrich himself. Authors have not informed us what became of Belgus and his troops; but in all probability he was killed in the second engagement, after which the remains of his army were incorporated into that of Brennus. However that may be, Brennus and Acichorius quitted Pannonia, with an army of 150,000 foot and 15,000 horse, and entered Illyrium, in order to pass into Macedonia and Greece.

During a sedition which happened in their march, a body of 20,000 men drew off from the main army, and marched, under Leonor and Lutarius, whom they chose for their commanders, into Thrace, where they joined those whom Cerethrius had already led into that country; after which they made themselves masters of Byzantium, and the western coasts of the Propontis, and then laid the adjacent country under contribution.

This desertion did not prevent Brennus and Acichorius from continuing their march; and they drew, either from Illyrium or their countrymen the Gauls, such numerous reinforcements, as increased their army to 152,000 foot, and 61,200 horse. The hopes of booty, and some advantageous settlement, caused a vast number of soldiers to join in this expedition, and with this army they marched directly to Macedonia, where they overpowered Sosithenes with their multitudes, and ravaged all the country. It will soon appear by the sequel, that Antigonus reigned in Macedonia after the death of Sosithenes.

The Gauls next advanced to the straits of Thermopylæ, with an intention to enter Greece; but were stopped for some time by the troops who had been posted there, to defend that important pass: till at last they discovered the circuitous path which the army of Xerxes had formerly taken in their passage over these mountains; and the Greeks, to avoid being surrounded by the troops detached against them by the Gauls for that purpose, were obliged to retire and leave them a free passage.

Brennus advanced with the main body of the army towards Delphi, in order to pillage the immense riches of the temple of Apollo, and ordered Acichorius to follow him with the troops under his command; saying, at the same time, with an air of raillery, "that the gods ought in reason to impart some of their riches to men, who had more occasion for them than themselves, and employed them in a better manner." Authors have here taken an opportunity to relate very astonishing and marvellous events:³ for they tell us, that when Brennus approached the temple of Delphi, the skies were blackened with a dreadful tempest, and that great numbers of his men were destroyed by hail and thunder. To which they add, that this storm was attended by an earthquake, that rent the mountains, and threw down vast fragments of the rocks, which crushed the Gauls by hundreds at a time; and that the remaining troops were seized with such a panic the ensuing night,¹ as caused them to mistake their own men for the enemies, in consequence of which they destroyed one another in such a manner, that before the day grew light enough for them to distinguish each other, above half of the army perished by that means.

The Greeks, whom the danger of a temple so revered among them, had drawn from all parts to preserve it from being plundered, were animated by an event in which heaven itself seemed to declare in their favour, and charged the Gauls with so much impetuosity, that though Acichorius had joined Brennus, they were unable to sustain the shock, and were slaughtered in vast numbers. Though Brennus had received many wounds in several parts of his body, yet none of them were mortal: but when he saw that all was lost, and that the grand design he had formed ended only in the destruction of his army, he was seized with such despair, as made him resolve not to survive his losses. He accordingly sent for all the officers that could be assembled, amidst the confusion which reigned among them, and advised them to kill all the wounded men, and make the best retreat in their power. After this he drank as much wine as he could, plunged his dagger into his bosom, and expired upon the spot.

Acichorius took the command in chief upon himself, and endeavoured to regain the straits of Thermopylae, in order to march out of Greece, and conduct the sad remains of the army into their own country. But as he was obliged to pass through a large extent of the enemy's territories, and to hazard a battle every time he wanted provisions for his troops; and as these were reduced to the necessity of almost always lying in the ground, though it was then the winter season; in a word, as they were constantly harassed from every quarter, by the inhabitants of the countries through which they marched, they were all destroyed, either by famine, cold, distempers, or the sword; and of all that prodigious number of men who engaged in this expedition, not one escaped with life.

Some fabulous exaggerations may possibly be blended with the other circumstances of this event; and chiefly with relation to the sudden tempest that arose when the Gauls approached Delphi, and the immense masses of rock miraculously detached from the mountains to crush the sacrilegious troops. Perhaps the whole might be no more than a thick flight of arrows shot by the enemies, who might likewise roll down upon the Gauls huge stones from the tops of the mountains. Such events are entirely natural and customary in attacks like this, which the priests, whose interests it was to magnify the power of their god, might represent as a prodigy, and as a miraculous interposition; and which the credulity of the people, who are always fond of the marvellous, would readily have credited, without a scrupulous examination into the truth of the account.

On the other hand, we have no sufficient reason to disbelieve any thing which history relates of this event. The enterprise of Brennus was undoubtedly a sacrilegious impiety, and injurious to religion, as well as to the Deity himself; for he spoke and acted in the manner already represented, not from any conviction that those gods were the mere offspring of fable (for he did not think better on that subject than the Greeks themselves,) but from an absolute contempt of a divinity in general. The idea of a God is impressed on the hearts of all men, and they have, through all ages and in all countries, believed it to be their duty to render certain honours to him. The Pagans were deceived in their application of this principle, but all acknowledged the necessity of it. The Deity, therefore, in mere goodness to mankind, may have caused his vengeance to be displayed from time to time against those, even among the heathens who testified an open contempt of a Supreme Being in order to preserve the traces and principles of religion in their minds, by some extraordinary indications of his anger, till it pleased him to afford them clearer lights by the ministration of the Mediator, at the appointed time, to whom was reserved the instruction of mankind in that pure worship which the only true God required from them. We likewise see that the Divine Being, in order to preserve among men a due respect for his providence, and a belief of his peculiar attention to all their actions, has been careful, from time to time, to punish perjuries and other heinous offences in a singular manner even among the Pagans themselves. By which means the belief of that capital article, the first tie which connects man with God, was maintained amidst all the darkness of Paganism, and the profligacy of manners which then prevailed. But it is now time to return to the Gauls.

Leonor and Lutarius,² who had formed a separate body, and had established themselves on the Propontis, advanced to the Hellespont, and surprised Lysimachia, after which they made themselves masters of all the Thracian Chersonesus; but a difference arising between the two chiefs, they separated from each other. Lutarius continued his march along the Hellespont, and Leonor returned to Byzantium with the greatest part of the army.

The latter having afterwards passed the Bosphorus, and the other the Hellespont, they met again in Asia where a reconciliation being effected between them, they rejoined their forces, and entered into the service of Nicomedes king of Bithynia. This prince, after he had reduced his brother Zypetes by their assistance, and regained the possession of all his father's dominions, assigned to them, for their settlement, that part of Asia Minor which took from them the denomination of Gallo-Græcia, or Galatia. The canonical Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians was written to the descendants of this people; and St. Jerom, about 600 years after the time of which we are now speaking, declared, that they continued to speak in the same language he had heard at Treves.

The remainder of those who continued in Thrace engaged afterwards in the war with Antigonus Gonatas, who reigned in Macedonia, and most of them were then destroyed. Those few who escaped, either passed into Asia, and rejoined their countrymen in Galatia, or dispersed themselves into other regions, where no farther mention is made of them. In this manner ended that terrible inundation of barbarians which had threatened Macedonia and all Greece with entire destruction.

After the death of Sosthenes,³ who had defeated the Gauls, and reigned for some time in Macedonia, Antiochus, the son of Seleucus Nicator, and Antigonus Gonatas, the son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, formed pretensions to that crown which their fathers had enjoyed, one after the other. Antigonus, who after the fatal expedition of his father into Asia, had reigned ten years in Greece finding the state of his affairs more favourable than those of his competitor, was the first who ascended the throne, but each of them raised great armies and contracted powerful alliances, the one to support himself in his new conquests, and the other to dispossess him. Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, having espoused the party of Antigonus on this occasion, Antiochus, when he was preparing to enter Macedonia, was unwilling to leave so powerful an enemy in his rear. Instead, therefore, of passing the Hellespont, he suddenly poured his troops into Bithynia, which then became the theatre of the war. The forces were at first so equal, that neither party would presume to attack the other, and continued for some time in that state of inaction; during which a treaty was concerted, in consequence of which Antigonus espoused Phila, the daughter of Stratonice and Seleucus, and Antiochus resigned to him his pretensions to the throne of Macedonia. In this manner he remained in peaceable possession of it, and transmitted it to his posterity, who enjoyed it for several generations, to the time of Perseus, the last of this race, who was defeated by Paulus Emilius, and divested of his dominions, which the Romans, a few years after, formed into a province of the empire.

Antiochus, having thus disengaged himself from this war, marched against the Gauls, who, after settling in the land granted them by Nicomedes, were continually making incursions on all sides, by which they extremely incommoded their neighbours. Antiochus defeated them with great slaughter, and delivered the country from their oppression. This action acquired him the title of Soter, which signifies a deliverer.

SECTION VI.—PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS CAUSES THE BOOKS OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURE, PRESERVED BY THE JEWS WITH THE UTMOST CARE, TO BE TRANSLATED INTO THE GREEK LANGUAGE, AS AN ORNAMENT TO HIS LIBRARY. THIS IS CALLED THE VERSION OF THE SEPTUAGINT.

A. M. 3729. The tumult of the wars, which a diversity of interests had kindled among the successors of Alexander throughout the whole extent of their territories, did not prevent Ptolemy Philadelphus from devoting his utmost attention to the noble library which he had founded in Alexandria, wherein he deposited the most valuable and curious books he was capable of collecting from all parts of the world. This prince being informed, that the Jews possessed a work which contained the laws of Moses and the history of that people, formed the design of having it translated out of the Hebrew language into the Greek, in order to enrich his library with that performance. To accomplish this design it became necessary for him to address himself to the high-priest of the Jewish nation; but the affair happened to be attended with great difficulty. There was at that time a very considerable number of Jews in Egypt, who had been reduced to a state of slavery by Ptolemy Soter, during the invasions of Judea in his time; and it was represented to the king, that there would be no probability of obtaining from that people either a copy, or a faithful translation of their law, while he suffered such a number of their countrymen to continue in their present servitude. Ptolemy, who always acted with the utmost generosity, and was extremely solicitous to enlarge his library, did not hesitate a moment, but issued a decree for restoring all the Jewish slaves in his dominions to their liberty; with orders to his treasurer to pay twenty drachmas¹ a head to their masters for their ransom. The sum expended on this occasion amounted to 400 talents;² whence it appears, that 120,000 Jews recovered their freedom. The king then gave orders for discharging the children born in slavery, with their mothers; and the sum employed for that purpose amounted to above half the former.

These advantageous preliminaries gave Ptolemy hopes that he should easily obtain his request from the high-priest, whose name was Eleazar. He had sent ambassadors to that pontiff, with a very obliging letter on his part, accompanied with magnificent presents. The ambassadors were received at Jerusalem with all imaginable honours, and the king's request was granted with the greatest joy. Upon which they returned to Alexandria with an authentic copy of the Mosaic law, written in letters of gold, given them by the high-priest himself, with six elders of each tribe, that is to say, seventy-two in the whole; and they were authorized to translate that copy into the Greek language.

The king was desirous of seeing these deputies, and proposed to each of them a different question, in order to make a trial of their capacity. He was satisfied with their answers, in which great wisdom appeared, and loaded them with presents, and other marks of his friendship. The elders were then conducted to the isle of Pharos, and lodged in a house prepared for their reception, where they were plentifully supplied with all necessary accommodations. They applied themselves to their work without losing time, and in seventy-two days completed the volume which is commonly called the Septuagint Version.³ The whole was afterwards read and approved in the presence of the king, who particularly admired the wisdom of the laws of Moses, and dismissed the seventy-two deputies with extremely magnificent presents; part of which were for themselves, others for the high-priest, and the remainder for the temple. Expenses of this nature, though very considerable, never ruin a state, and do a prince great honour.

The author from whom these facts are extracted is Aristæus, who represents himself as one of the officers of the guard to Ptolemy Philadelphus. He adds a number of other circumstances, which I have omitted, because they seem more improbable than those I have inserted. It is pretended that the writers, whether Jews, as Aristobolus, Philo, and Josephus; or Christians, as Justin, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Hilary, Austin, and some others, who have employed their pens on the subject of the septuagint version, have founded all their relations on the mere veracity of Aristæus, when the work that bears his name is thought to be a spurious piece. Some of these authors have added circumstances which are generally disbelieved, because they have too much of the marvellous in them. Philo declares,⁴ that though their translations were made in separate apartments, yet not the least difference either in the sense, or in the mode of expression which they used, was to be found, but that, on the contrary, they every where coincided even to a single word; from whence he concludes, that these persons were not mere translators, but men inspired by the spirit of God, who guided them on that occasion, and dictated the whole to them, even to the minutest word. Justin, and, after him, the other fathers already mentioned, suppose that each of the seventy-two interpreters performed his version in a separate cell, without the least correspondence with each other, and yet that all their translations were perfectly conformable to each other in every particular.

I have frequently declared my resolution not to enter into any historical disquisitions of this nature, which require much time and learning; and would, therefore, call off my attention too long from my principal object. The reader may consult the learned Prideaux, who has treated this subject at large. All that can be depended upon, and which no one has thought fit to contest, is, that a translation of the sacred books from the Hebrew into the Greek was made in Egypt in the time of the Ptolemies; that we have this translation still extant, and that it is the same that was used in the time of our blessed Saviour, as most of the passages in the original Greek, cited by the sacred writers in the New Testament from the Old, are to be found, word for word, in this version. It still subsists, and continues to be used in the Oriental churches; as it also was by those of the primitive ages, among whom it passed for a canonical translation.

This version, therefore, which rendered the scriptures of the Old Testament intelligible to a vast number of people, became one of the most considerable fruits of the Grecian conquests; and was evidently comprehended in the design which God had in view when he delivered up all the East to the Greeks, and supported them in those regions, notwithstanding their divisions and jealousies, their wars, and the frequent revolutions that happened among them. In this manner did God prepare the way for the preaching of the Gospel, which was then approaching, and facilitate the union of so many nations of different languages and manners into one society, and the same worship and doctrines, by the instrumentality of one language, the finest, most copious, and most correct that was ever spoken in the world, and which became common to all the countries that were conquered by Alexander

SECTION VII.—THE VARIOUS EXPEDITIONS OF PYRRHUS: FIRST, INTO ITALY; WHERE HE FIGHTS TWO BATTLES WITH THE ROMANS. THE CHARACTER AND CONDUCT OF CINEAS. SECONDLY, INTO SICILY; AND THEN INTO ITALY AGAIN. HIS THIRD ENGAGEMENT WITH THE ROMANS, WHEREIN HE IS DEFEATED. HIS EXPEDITION INTO MACEDONIA, OF WHICH HE MAKES HIMSELF MASTER FOR SOME TIME, AFTER HAVING OVERTHROWN ANTIGONUS. HIS EXPEDITION INTO PELOPONNESUS. HE FORMS THE SIEGE OF SPARTA, BUT WITHOUT SUCCESS. IS SLAIN AT THAT OF ARGOS. THE DEPUTATION FROM PHILADELPHUS TO THE ROMANS, AND FROM THE ROMANS TO PHILADELPHUS.

PYRRHUS,¹ when he returned into Epirus, after he had entirely abandoned Macedonia, might have passed his days in tranquillity among his subjects, and enjoyed the sweets of peace, by governing his people agreeably to the rules of justice. But a disposition so active and impetuous as his own, in conjunction with a restless and ardent ambition, was incapable of being at rest itself, or suffering others to be so. This indisposition of mind was, in reality, a real disease, a raging fever, which knew no intermission. In a word, he grew insupportable to himself, and was continually flying from himself in pursuit of foreign objects, and in following from country to country, a felicity no where to be found. He therefore seized, with joy, the first opportunity that offered for plunging himself into new engagements.

The inhabitants of Tarentum A. M. 3724. were then at war with the Romans, Ant. J. C. 280. and their own country not furnishing them with generals of sufficient abilities to oppose such formidable enemies, they turned their eyes towards Epirus, and despatched ambassadors thither, not only from themselves, but from all the Greeks in Italy, with magnificent presents for Pyrrhus. They had orders to tell him, that they only wanted a leader of experience and reputation; that they had a competent number of good troops, and by only assembling the forces of the Lucanians, Messapians, Samnites, and Tarentines, were in a condition to bring an army of 20,000 horse and 350,000 foot into the field. The joy with which Pyrrhus received a proposal so agreeable to his disposition, and so conformable to his character, may be easily imagined. The Epirots, by his example, conceived a warm desire and violent passion for this war.

A Thessalian, named Cineas, was then at the court of Pyrrhus. He was a man of great judgment, and having been the disciple of Demosthenes, was distinguished from all the orators of that time, not only for coming the nearest to the force and eloquence of that great master, but for having been most successful in deriving, from so excellent a school, the solid principles and truest maxims of sound policy. This person was much attached to Pyrrhus, who had employed him on embassies to several cities with whom he had negotiations to transact. Cineas, through the whole course of these employments, confirmed, by his conduct, the truth of this expression of Euripides, "that the eloquence of an enemy is no less powerful than his sword;" and Pyrrhus accordingly declared, that he had gained more cities by the eloquence of Cineas, than he himself had conquered by the force of arms. For this reason he entertained the greatest esteem for him, conferred many honours upon him, and employed him in the most important affairs. A man of this character is always an inestimable treasure, and would constitute the happiness of a prince and his people, were his counsels attended to.

Cineas, perceiving that Pyrrhus was preparing to pass into Italy, and finding him one day disengaged from business, and in a temper not to be offended with innocent liberties, entered into a free conversation with that prince. "Your majesty intends," said he, "to march against the Romans; should the gods vouchsafe to render you victorious, what advantage shall you derive from your conquest?"—"Were the Romans once subdued," replied Pyrrhus, "all Italy would then be ours."—"Supposing ourselves masters of that country," continued Cineas, "how should we proceed next?" Pyrrhus, who did not yet perceive his drift, continued, "Sicily will then present itself to us, and you know the importance of that island."—"But will our expeditions," added Cineas, "end with the conquest of Sicily?"—"No, certainly," replied Pyrrhus, with emotion; "should we stop short in so glorious a career? If the gods are pleased to crown us with success, these would be only preludes to more glorious enterprises. Carthage, with all Africa, Macedonia, my ancient domain, every province in Greece, shall be part of our future conquests."—"And when we have conquered all we can, how shall we dispose of ourselves?"—"Dispose of ourselves! We will live at our ease. We will pass whole days in feasts and agreeable conversation, and think of nothing but enjoying ourselves."—"Ah! my lord," interrupted Cineas, "and what prevents us now from living at our ease, making entertainments, celebrating festivals, and enjoying ourselves to the utmost? Why should we go so far in search of a happiness already in our power, and pay so dear for what we may now enjoy without the least trouble?"

This discourse of Cineas affected Pyrrhus, but did not reform him. He could make no reasonable objection to what he had heard: but his natural ardour, more predominant, more durable, urged him on in pursuit of a phantom of glory, that was always presenting a delusive and glittering outside to his view, and would not permit him to enjoy the least repose, either by night or by day.

Monsieur Paschal has considered the reflection of Cineas, in the 26th chapter of his Thoughts; wherein he has explained, in an admirable manner, the origin of all the tumultuous employments of mankind, and of all which the world calls diversion or pastime. "The soul," says that great man, "discovers nothing in herself that can furnish her with contentment. Whatever she beholds there afflicts her when she considers it sedately. This obliges her to have recourse to external employments, that she may lose in them the remembrance of her real state. In this oblivion consists her joy; and, to render her miserable, no more is wanting than to oblige her to enter into, and converse with herself."

He then proceeds to justify the truth of this reflection by a variety of examples; after which he adds the following remarks: "When Cineas told Pyrrhus, who proposed to live at ease when he had conquered a large part of the world, that it would be better for him to hasten his intended happiness, by enjoying that repose which was then in his power, without going in quest of it through such a number of fatigues; he gave him advice that was attended with many difficulties, and which seemed almost as irrational as the design of that ambitious youth. Each of them supposed, that man was capable of being satisfied with himself and his present enjoyments without filling up the void in his heart with imaginary hopes, which is certainly false. Pyrrhus could not be happy, either before or after he had conquered the world; and perhaps the life of ease recommended to him by his minister would have proved less satisfactory to him, than the hurry of all the wars and expeditions which he meditated."

It is certain, however, that neither the philosopher nor the conqueror were capable of knowing thus thoroughly the heart of man. Pyrrhus, therefore, immediately despatched Cineas to the Tarentines with a detachment of 3000 foot; soon after which a large number of flat-bottomed vessels, galleys, and all sorts of transport-ships, arriving from Tarentum, he embarked on board them twenty elephants, 3000 horse, 20,000 heavy-armed foot, 2,000 archers, and 500 slingers.

All being ready, he set sail; but as soon as he had advanced into the open sea, a violent tempest arose from the north, and drove him out of his course.—The vessel in which he was, yielded at first to the fury of the storm, but the exertions of the pilot and mariners were employed so effectually, that he at last gained the coast of Italy, after a voyage of infinite fatigue and danger. The other ships were incapable of holding the same course. At last a strong gale sprung up from the land, and the waves beat so violently against the head of the king's ship, that they expected it to founder immediately. Pyrrhus did not hesitate a moment in this extremity, but threw himself into the sea, and was immediately followed by his friends and guards, who vied with each other to save him at the hazard of their own lives; but the night, which happened to be extremely dark, and the impetuous bursting of the waves upon the coast, from whence they were repelled with a loud roar, made it very difficult for them to assist him, till at last the king, after he had struggled with the winds and waves for a considerable part of the night, was cast the next morning on the shore, the wind being then considerably abated. The long fatigue he had sustained, weakened him to such a degree, that nothing but his courage, always great and invincible, prevented him from sinking under it.

In the mean time the Messapians, on whose coast the waves had cast him, hastened to him with the utmost speed, to tender him all the assistance in their power. They also went to meet some of his ships that had escaped the storm; but the cavalry they found on board were very inconsiderable in number, and the infantry amounted to no more than 2000 men, with two elephants. Pyrrhus, after he had drawn them up in a body, led them directly to Tarentum.

Cineas, as soon as he received intelligence of his approach, advanced to him with his troops. Pyrrhus, when he arrived at Tarentum, was extremely surprised to find the inhabitants solely engaged in pleasures, in which it was their usual custom to indulge, without the least moderation or intermission. And they now took it for granted, that whilst Pyrrhus fought for them, they might quietly continue in their own houses, solely employed in bathing, using exquisite perfumes, feasting, and recreations. Pyrrhus was unwilling to lay them under any constraint, till he had received intelligence that his ships were safe, and till the greatest part of his army had joined him. He treated them like one determined to be their master. He began with shutting up all the public gardens and places of exercise, where the inhabitants usually entertained themselves with news, and regulated all the management of the war as they walked together. He also suspended their feasts and public shows, and was altogether as severe upon the assemblies of newsmongers. In a word, he compelled them to take arms, and behaved at all musters and reviews with inexorable severity to those who had failed in their duty. In consequence of which, several who had never been accustomed to so rigorous a discipline, withdrew from the city: thinking it an insupportable servitude, to be debarred from the full enjoyment of their effeminate pleasures.

Pyrrhus, about this time, received information that Levinus the consul was advancing against him with a powerful army, and that he was then in Lucania, where he burnt and destroyed all the country around him. Though the allies of Pyrrhus had not yet sent him any succours, nevertheless as he thought it very dishonourable to permit the enemy to approach nearer him, and commit their ravages in his sight, he took the field with the few troops he had. But before he engaged in any hostilities, he despatched a herald to demand of the Romans, whether they would consent, before the commencement of the war, to an amicable accommodation of the differences between them and the Greeks of Italy, by referring the whole affair to his judgment and decision? To which Levinus the consul made this reply, "That the Romans neither took Pyrrhus for an arbiter, nor feared him as an enemy.

Pyrrhus, upon receiving this answer advanced with his troops, and encamped in a plain between the cities of Pandosia and Heraclea; and when he heard that the Romans were very near him, and were encamped on the other side of the river Siris, he mounted his horse, and approached the bank, to take a view of their situation. When he saw the appearance of their troops, their advanced guards, the fine order which was every where maintained, and the judicious disposition of their camp, he was astonished at what he saw; and addressing himself to one of his friends, who was then near him—"Megacles," said he, "the array of these barbarians is by no means barbarous; we shall see whether other circumstances will correspond with this appearance."¹ And already under apprehension for the success of the future, he resolved to await the arrival of the allies: thinking it sufficient, at that time, to post a body of troops on the bank of the river, to oppose the Romans, if they should attempt to pass; but this precaution was then too late, for the Roman infantry had already forded the stream, and the cavalry passed it where they found it practicable. The advanced troops of Pyrrhus, therefore, not finding themselves sufficiently strong, and fearing to be surrounded by their enemies, were obliged to join the main army with great precipitation; so that Pyrrhus, who had arrived there a few moments before, with the rest of his troops, had not time to dispute the passage with the enemy.

As soon as he saw a great number of Roman bucklers glittering on this side of the river, and their cavalry advancing towards him in fine order, he closed his ranks, and began the attack. The lustre and beauty of his arms, which were very magnificent, distinguished him in a particular manner; and his actions made it evident, that the reputation he had acquired did not exceed his merit. For while he engaged in the battle, without sparing his own person, and bore down all before him, he did not lose sight of the duties of general; and amidst the greatest dangers was perfectly cool, despatched his commands with as much tranquillity as if he had been in his palace; and sprung from place to place, to reinstate what was amiss, and sustain those who suffered most.

During the heat of the engagement, one of the Italian horse, with a lance in his hand, singled out Pyrrhus from all the rest of his troops, and followed him with the utmost ardour wherever he went, directing all his own motions by those of the king. And having at last found a favourable opportunity, he aimed a furious stroke at him, but wounded only his horse. At the same time Leonatus of Macedon killed the Italian's horse. Both horses being down, Pyrrhus was immediately surrounded by a troop of his friends, who carried him off, and killed the Italian, who fought with great bravery.

This adventure taught Pyrrhus to use more precaution than he had practised before, and obliged him to be more careful of himself; which is an indispensable duty in a general, on whose welfare that of a whole army depends. When he beheld his cavalry give way, he ordered his infantry to advance, and immediately drew it up. Then giving his mantle and arms to Megacles, one of his friends, he put on those of the latter, and vigorously charged the Romans, who received him with great intrepidity. The battle was obstinately disputed on both sides and the victory long continued doubtful. Authors say that each army gave way seven times, and as often returned to the charge.

Pyrrhus, by changing his arms, took a proper method for the preservation of his life; though, in the event, it almost proved fatal to him, and was on the point of wresting the victory out of his hands. The enemies threw themselves in throngs about Megacles, whom they took to be the king; and he was at last wounded by a horseman, who hurled him to the ground, after he had torn off his helmet and mantle, which he carried full speed to Levinus the consul; and as he showed them to him, cried out aloud, that he had slain Pyrrhus. These spoils being borne in triumph through all the ranks, filled the whole Roman army with inexpressible joy. All the field resounded with acclamations of victory, while the Grecian troops were struck with consternation and dismay.

Pyrrhus, who perceived the terrible effect of this mistake, flew bareheaded through all the lines, holding out at the same time his hand to the soldiers, and making himself known to them by his voice and gestures. The battle was then renewed, and the elephants were chiefly instrumental in deciding the victory. For when Pyrrhus saw the Romans broken by those animals, and that the horses, instead of approaching them, were so terrified that they ran away with their riders, he immediately led up the Thesalian cavalry against them, while they were in confusion, and put them to flight, after having made a great slaughter of them.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus writes, that near 15,000 Romans were killed in this battle, and that Pyrrhus lost 13,000 of his men. But other historians make the loss less on both sides.

Pyrrhus immediately made himself master of the enemy's camp, which they had abandoned, brought over several cities from their alliance, ravaged all the country around him, and advanced within fifteen leagues of Rome.

The Lucanians and Samnites having joined him after the battle, he severely reproached them for their delay. But his air and aspect made it evident, that he was exceedingly delighted at bottom, that his troops, in conjunction with the Tarentines alone, had defeated so well disciplined and numerous an army of the Romans, without the assistance of his allies.

The Romans, however, were not dejected at the great loss they had sustained; and instead of recalling Levinus, were solely intent on preparations for a second battle. This greatness of soul, which manifested so much steadiness and intrepidity, surprised and even terrified Pyrrhus. He, therefore, thought it prudent to despatch a second embassy, in order to sound their dispositions, and to see if they would not incline to some expedient for an amicable accommodation; and in the mean time returned to Tarentum. Cineas, therefore, being sent to Rome, had several conferences with the principal citizens, and sent presents in the name of the king to them and their wives: but not one would receive them. They all replied, and even their wives, that when Rome should have made a public treaty with the king, it would be time enough to express his satisfaction with regard to them.

When Cineas was introduced to the senate, he acquainted them with the proposals of his master, who offered to deliver up his prisoners to the Romans without any ransom, and to aid them in the conquest of all Italy; requiring, at the same time, no other return but their friendship, and a sufficient security for the Tarentines. Several of the senators seemed inclinable to a peace: and this was no unreasonable disposition. They had lately been defeated in a great battle, and were on the point of hazarding another of much more importance. They had likewise every thing to dread; the forces of Pyrrhus having been considerably augmented by the junction of several of the states of Italy his allies.

The Roman courage, in this conjuncture, seemed to stand in need of the animated spirit of the celebrated Appius Claudius, an illustrious senator, whose great age and loss of sight had obliged him to confine himself to his family, and retire from public affairs. When he understood, by the confused report which was then dispersed through the city, that the senators were disposed to accept the offers of Pyrrhus, he caused himself to be carried into the assembly, which kept a profound silence the moment he appeared. There the venerable old man, whose zeal for the honour of his country seemed to have inspired him with all his ancient vigour, made it evident, by reasons equally solid and affecting, that they were on the point of destroying, by an infamous treaty, all the glory which Rome had hitherto acquired. "Where," said he, with the warmth of a noble indignation, "where is the spirit that suggested the bold language you once uttered and whose accents rung through all the world, when you declared, that if the great Alexander himself had invaded Italy, when we were young, and our fathers in the vigour of their age, he never would have gained the reputation of being invincible, but would have added new lustre to the glory of Rome, either by his flight or death! Is it possible, then, that you now tremble at the mere name of a Pyrrhus, who has passed his days in cringing to one of the guards of that very Alexander, and who now wenders, like a wretched adventurer, from country to country to avoid the enemies he has at home; and who has the insolence to promise you the conquest of Italy, with those very troops who have not been able to secure to him a small tract of Macedonia!" He added many other things of the same nature, which rekindled the Roman bravery, and dispelled the apprehensions of the senators; who unanimously returned this answer to Cineas: "That Pyrrus should first retire from Italy; after which, if he should find himself disposed for peace, he might send an embassy to solicit it: but that, as long as he continued in arms in their country, the Romans would maintain the war against him with all their force, though he should even vanquish ten thousand such leaders as Levinus."

It is said, that Cineas, during his continuance at Rome in order to negotiate a peace, took a very method, as might be expected from a man of wisdom and address, to inform himself of the manners and customs of the Romans; to scrutinize their public as well as private conduct; to study the form and constitution of their government; and to obtain, as exact an account as possible of the forces and resources of the republic. When he returned to Tarentum, he gave the king a faithful relation of all the discoveries he had made in his conferences with the principal men of Rome, and told him, among other particulars, "That the senate seemed to him an assembly of kings." A just and noble idea of that august body! And with respect to the numerous inhabitants who filled the streets and all parts of the country, he added, "I greatly fear we are fighting with a hydra." Cineas, indeed, had some reason for this remark, for the consul Levinus had at that time an army in the field twice as numerous as the first, and there were left in Rome an infinite number of men, capable of bearing arms, and forming many armies as powerful as that which had been newly levied.

The return of Cineas to Tarentum was immediately succeeded by the arrival of ambassadors sent to Pyrrhus from the Romans, among whom was Iabricius, who, as Cineas informed the king, was highly esteemed at Rome as a very virtuous man, and one well experienced in military affairs, but that his fortune was extremely low. Pyrrhus received them with extraordinary marks of distinction, and treated them with all possible honours. The ambassadors, at their audience, said every thing suitable to the present conjuncture; and as they imagined he might be elated by the victory he had obtained over their troops, they represented to him the vicissitudes and inconsistency of fortune, which no prudence of man could foresee; that the greatest overthrows in the field were incapable of depressing the Roman fortitude, and consequently it could never be alarmed at any little disadvantage; that the examples of so many enemies as they had defeated, should teach Pyrrhus to reflect on the enterprise he was forming; that he would find, at all events, enemies prepared to receive him, and in a capacity to defend themselves. They concluded their remonstrances with leaving it to his choice, either to receive a ransom for their soldiers who were then his prisoners of war, or to exchange them for such of his troops as the Romans had taken from him.

Pyrrhus, after a consultation with his friends, answered the ambassadors to this effect: "Romans, it is with an ill grace you demand the prisoners I have taken from you, to employ them against me, after your refusal of the peace I proposed. If you have only view your own real interest and mine, it is not necessary to have recourse to such evasions. Be it your care to end, by an amicable treaty, the war you are maintaining against me and my allies, and I promise to restore you all my prisoners, as well your citizens as your confederates, without the ransom you offer me. If you reject this condition, it is in vain for you to imagine that Pyrrhus will ever be prevailed upon to release so great a number of soldiers."

When he had returned this answer to the ambassadors, he took Fabricius aside, and addressed him in the following manner: "As for you, Fabricius, I am sensible of your merit. I am likewise informed that you are an excellent general, and perfectly qualified for the command of an army; that justice and temperance are united in your character, and that you pass for a person of consummate virtue. But I am likewise acquainted with your poverty; and must confess, that fortune, in this particular alone, has treated you with injustice, by misplacing you in the class of indigent senators. In order, therefore, to supply that sole deficiency, I am ready to give you as much gold and silver as will raise you above the richest citizen of Rome; being fully persuaded, that no expense can be more honourable to a prince than that which is employed in the relief of great men, who are compelled by their poverty to lead a life unworthy of their virtue; and that this is the noblest purpose to which a king can possibly devote his treasures." At the same time, I must desire you to believe, that I have no intention to exact any unjust or dishonourable service from you as a return of gratitude. I expect nothing from you but what is perfectly consistent with your honour, and what will add to your authority and importance in your own country. Let me, therefore, conjure you to assist me with your influence in the Roman senate, which has hitherto assumed an air of too much inflexibility with relation to the treaty I proposed, and has never consulted the rules of moderation in any respect. Make them sensible, I entreat you, that I have given my solemn word to assist the Tarentines and other Greeks who are settled in this part of Italy; and I cannot in honour abandon them, especially as I am now at the head of a powerful army that has already gained me a battle. I must, however, acquaint you, that I am called, by some pressing affairs, to my own dominions; and this is the circumstance which makes me more earnestly wish for peace. As to any other particulars, if my quality as a king causes me to be suspected by the senate, because a number of other princes have openly violated the faith of treaties and alliances, without the least hesitation; become my surety yourself on this occasion; assist me with your counsels in all my proceedings, and command my armies under me. I want a virtuous man and a faithful friend; and you as much need a prince, whose liberalities may enable you to be more useful, and to do more good to mankind. Let us, therefore, consent to render mutual assistance to each other, in all the future events of our lives."

Pyrrhus, having expressed himself in this manner, Fabricius, after a few moments' silence, replied to him in these terms: "It is needless for me to make any mention of the experience I may possibly have in the conduct of public or private affairs, since you have been informed of that from others. With respect also to my poverty, you seem to be so well acquainted with it, that it would be unnecessary for me to assure you I have no money to turn to advantage, nor any slaves from whom I derive the least revenue: that my whole fortune consists in a house of no considerable appearance; and in a little spot of ground that furnishes me with my support. But if you believe my poverty renders my condition inferior to that of every other Roman, and that, while I am discharging the duties of an honest man, I am the less considered because I happen not to be of the number of the rich; permit me to acquaint you, that the idea you conceive of me, is not just, and that whether any other may have inspired you with that opinion, or whether you only suppose so yourself, you are deceived. Though I do not possess riches, I never did imagine my indigence a prejudice to me, whether I consider myself as a public or private person. Did my necessitous circumstances ever induce my country to exclude me from those glorious employments, that are the noble objects of the emulation of great souls? I am invested with the highest dignities, and see myself placed at the head of the most illustrious embassies. I assist also at the most august ceremonies, and even the most sacred functions of divine worship are confided to my care. Whenever the most important affairs are the subject of deliberation, I hold my rank in councils, and offer my opinion with as much freedom as another. I am upon an equal footing with the richest and most powerful persons in the republic; and if any circumstance causes me to complain, it is my receiving too much honour and applause from my fellow-citizens. The employments I discharge cost me nothing of my own, no more than any other Roman. Rome never reduces her citizens to a ruinous condition, by raising them to the magistracy. She gives all necessary supplies to those whom she employs in public stations, and bestows them with liberality and magnificence. Rome, in this particular, differs from any other cities, where the public is extremely poor, and private persons immensely rich. We are all in a state of affluence as long as the republic is so, because we consider her treasures as our own. As the rich and the poor are equally admitted to her employments, according as she judges them worthy of confidence, she places all her citizens upon an equality, and knows no distinction between them but that of merit and virtue. As to my own private affairs, I am so far from repining at my fortune, that I think I am the happiest of men when I compare myself with the rich, and find a certain satisfaction, and even pride, in that fortune. My little field, poor and unfertile as it is, supplies me with whatever I want, when I am careful to cultivate it as I ought, and to lay up the fruits it produces. What can I want more? Every kind of food is agreeable to my palate, when seasoned by hunger: I drink with delight when I thirst, and I enjoy all the sweetness of sleep when fatigued with toil. I content myself with a habit that covers me from the rigours of winter; and of all the various kinds of furniture necessary for the same uses, the meanest is, in my opinion, the most commodious. I should be unreasonable, and unjust, were I to complain of fortune, whilst she supplies me with all that nature requires. As to superfluities, I confess she has not furnished me with any; but then she has not inspired me with the least desire to enjoy them. Why should I then complain? It is true, the want of this abundance renders me incapable of relieving the necessitous, which is the only advantage the rich may be envied for enjoying. But when I impart to the republic, and my friends, some portion of the little I possess, and render my fellow-citizens all the services I am capable of performing; in a word, when I discharge all the duties incumbent on me, to the best of my ability, wherein can my conscience condemn me? If riches had ever been the least part of my ambition, I have so long been employed in the administration of the republic, that I have had a thousand opportunities of amassing great sums and even by irreproachable methods. Could any man desire one more favourable than that which occurred to me a few years ago? The consular dignity was conferred upon me, and I was sent against the Samnites, the Brutii, and the Lucanians, at the head of a numerous army. We ravaged a large tract of land, and defeated the enemy in several battles: we took many flourishing and opulent cities by assault; I enriched the whole army with their spoils; I returned every citizen the money which he had contributed to the expense of the war; and after I had received the honours of a triumph, I still brought 400 talents into the public treasury. After having neglected so considerable a booty, of which I had full power to appropriate any part to myself; after having despised such immense riches so justly acquired, and sacrificed the spoils of the enemy to the love of glory, in imitation of Valerius Publicola, and many other great men, whose disinterested generosity of mind has raised the glory of Rome to so illustrious a height; would it now become me to accept of the gold and silver you offer me? What idea would the world entertain of me? And what an example would I set to my fellow citizens? How could I bear their reproaches? how even their looks, at my return? Those awful magistrates, or censors, who are appointed to inspect our discipline and manners with a vigilant eye, would they not compel me to be accountable before all the world, for the presents you solicit me to accept? You shall keep then, if you please, your riches to yourself, and I my poverty and my reputation."

I take it for granted, that the historian furnished Pyrrhus and Fabricius with these speeches, but he has only painted their sentiments, especially those of the latter, in strong colours. For such was the character of the Romans in those glorious ages of the republic. Fabricius was really persuaded, that there was more glory and grandeur in being able to despise all the gold of a king, than there was in reigning over an empire.

Pyrrhus being desirous the next day to surprise the Roman ambassador, who had never seen an elephant, ordered the captain of those animals to arm the largest of them, and lead him to the place where he would be in conversation with Fabricius; the officer was then to place him behind a hanging of tapestry, that he might be ready to make his appearance at a certain signal. This was accordingly executed; and the sign being given, the tapestry was drawn aside, and presented to view the enormous animal, who stretched out his trunk over the head of Fabricius, and shook the apartment with a most terrible cry. Fabricius, instead of discovering the least surprise or consternation, turned very calmly to Pyrrhus, and said to him with a smile, "Neither your gold yesterday, nor your elephant to-day, can move me."

Whilst they were sitting at table in the evening, the conversation turned upon a variety of subjects; and after some conference on the affairs of Greece, and the several philosophers of note, Cineas introduced the doctrines of Epicurus, and related the particular opinions of his disciples, with reference to the gods, and the government of the world: declaring, that they represented pleasure as the end and sovereign good of man, and declined all dignities and employments, as destructive to happiness. To this he added, that they never ascribed to the Divinity either love, or hatred, or wrath; but maintained, that he was entirely regardless of mankind; and that they consigned him to a life of tranquillity, in which he passed all ages void of occupation, and plunged in an endless variety of delights and pleasures. The soft and voluptuous lives of the Tarentines might probably occasion this discourse. Whilst Cineas was going on with this subject, Fabricius, to whom such a doctrine was altogether new, cried out as loud as he was able, "Great Hercules, may Pyrrhus and the Samnites follow this doctrine, as long as they shall make war with the Romans."

Who of us moderns, were we to judge of the manners of the ancients by those which prevail in our age, would expect to hear the conversation between great warriors, at table, turn, not only on political systems, but points of erudition; for at that time, philosophical inquiries were considered as the principal part of learning? Are not such discourses as these, seasoned with improving reflections, and enlivened with sprightly replies, equal at least to those conversations, which frequently continue from the beginning to the end of the entertainment, and are passed without much expense of genius, in exclamations, worthy of Epicureans, on the delicacy of the provisions, and the admirable flavour of the wines and other liquors?

Pyrrhus, struck with admiration at the greatness of soul which he discovered in the Roman ambassador, and charmed with his manners and his wisdom, became more impatient than ever to contract an alliance with his city. He therefore took him apart, and conjured him a second time, to mediate an accommodation between the two states, and consent to reside at his court, where he should hold the first rank among all his friends and captains. "I would not advise you to persist in that request," replied Fabricius, whispering in his ear, and smiling; "and you seem to be but little acquainted with your own interest; for if those who now honour and admire you, should once happen to know me, perhaps they might be more desirous of having me for their king than yourself."

The prince, instead of being offended at this reply, esteemed him the more for making it; and would intrust the prisoners to none but him, that he might be certain they would be sent back to him, after they had embraced their relations and friends, and celebrated the Saturnalia, in case the senate should continue averse to a peace. They were accordingly sent to him at the expiration of the festival, the senate having ordered every prisoner to return to Pyrrhus, upon pain of death.

The command of the army being conferred on Fabricius the following year, an unknown person came into his camp, with a letter from the king's physician, who offered to take Pyrrhus off by poison, if the Romans would promise him a recompense proportionable to the great service he should render them, by putting an end to so destructive a war without any danger to themselves. Fabricius, who always retained the same probity and justice, even in time of war, which furnishes so many pretexts for departing from them; and who knew there were some rights, which ought to be preserved inviolable even with enemies themselves, was struck with a just horror at such a proposal; and as he would not suffer the king to conquer him with gold, he thought it would be infamous in himself to conquer the king by poison. After some conference, therefore, with his colleague Emilius, he wrote a letter to Pyrrhus, to caution him against that black treachery. His letter was conceived in these terms:

CAIUS FABRICIUS AND QUINTUS EMILIUS, CONSULS: TO KING PYRRHUS, HEALTH.

"You seem to form a wrong judgment both of friends and enemies; and this will be your own opinion, when you have read the letter which has been written to us. For you will then be sensible, that you are carrying on a war against people of virtue and honour, at the same time that you repose confidence in traitors and the worst of men. The information we now send you, results more from our affection for ourselves than for you; for we were unwilling that your death should give the world occasion to defame us, and to imagine that we had recourse to treachery, through despair of terminating this war happily by our valour."

Pyrrhus having received this letter, and ascertained the truth of the information it contained, caused his physician to be punished, and sent back all his prisoners to the consul without ransom, as a testimonial of his gratitude to Fabricius and the Romans. He likewise again deputed Cineas to attempt to negotiate a peace; but the Romans, who would not accept either a favour from their enemy, or a recompense for not committing the most execrable piece of injustice, though they did not refuse to accept the prisoners, yet returned an equal number of Tarentines and Samnites, as an equivalent; but as to the treaty of pacification, they would not permit Cineas to mention it, till Pyrrhus had returned to Epirus in the same fleet that landed him and his troops in Italy. But as his affairs made a second battle necesary, he assembled his army, and attacked the Romans near the city of Asculum.

The troops fought with great obstinacy on both sides, and the victory continued doubtful till the close of the battle. Pyrrhus, at the beginning of the action, having been driven into places where cavalry could not act, and against a river very difficult, as well in regard to its banks as to marshes on the sides of it, was treated very rudely by the enemy, and lost a great number of his men. But having at last disengaged himself from that disadvantageous situation, and regained the plain, where he could make use of his elephants, he advanced against the Romans with the greatest impetuosity, his ranks being all in good order and well closed; and as he met with a vigorous resistance, the slaughter became very great, and he himself was wounded. He, however, brought forward his elephants so judiciously, that they broke through the Roman infantry in several quarters, notwithstanding which they still maintained their ground. The two armies, fired with implacable rage, exerted the utmost efforts that bravery could inspire, and did not cease fighting till night parted them. The loss was almost equal on both sides, and amounted to 15,000 men in the whole. The Romans were the first who retreated, and gained their camp, which was near the field of battle. The advantage therefore seemed to remain with Pyrrhus, who continued longest in the field; but when one of his officers came to congratulate him on his victory, "if we gain such another," replied he, "we are inevitably ruined." And as he had really lost his best troops and bravest officers, he was very sensible of his inability to bring another army into the field against the Romans, whose very defeat inspired them with new vigour and ardour to continue the war.¹

Whilst he was revolving these melancholy thoughts in his mind,² and had the mortification to see himself in a manner destitute of all resource, and incapable of recurring to any honourable expedient to disengage himself from an enterprise which he had too inconsiderately undertaken, a dawn of hope and good fortune inspired him with

A. M. 3726. new resolution. A deputation was sent to him, at that critical juncture, from Sicily, with a commission to deliver Syracuse, Agrigentum, and the city of the Leontines, into his possession; and to implore the assistance of his arms to drive the Carthaginians from their island, and deliver them from their tyrants. Several couriers from Greece also arrived at his camp at the same time, to inform him that Ceraunus had been killed in a battle with the Gauls, in Macedonia, and that this kingdom seemed to invite him to ascend the throne.

Pyrrhus then found himself in a new perplexity. A moment before he was destitute of all hope, and now it flowed so fast upon him, that he was at a loss to determine which offer he ought to prefer. But after a long deliberation, and when he had maturely weighed the reasons that offered themselves on both sides, he resolved for Sicily, which would open him a passage into Africa, and conduct him to a more ample harvest of glory. In consequence of this resolution, he immediately despatched Cineas to treat with the cities, and to give them assurances of his speedy arrival; he then embarked for Sicily, after he had left a strong garrison in Tarentum, notwithstanding the repugnance of the inhabitants, who had the mortification to see themselves abandoned by Pyrrhus, and reduced at the same time to a state of slavery by his troops.

When he arrived in Sicily, he immediately became master of Syracuse, which was delivered up to him by Sostratus,³ who then governed that city, and by Theon, who commanded in the citadel. He also received from them money out of the public treasury, and about 200 ships, which facilitated his conquest of all Sicily. His insinuating and aTable behaviour at his first arrival, gained him the hearts of all the people; and as he had then an army of 30,000 foot and 2,500 horse, with a fleet of 200 sail, he dispossessed the Carthaginians of their settlements in that island, and obliged them to evacuate the city of Eryx, which was the strongest of all their places there, and the best furnished with people for its defence: he also defeated, in a great battle, the inhabitants of Messina, who were called Mamertines,⁴ whose frequent eruptions infested all Sicily, and he entirely demolished all their fortresses.

The rapid progress of his arms terrified the Carthaginians, who were now divested of all their acquisitions in Sicily, except the single city of Lilybæum; and they sent to purchase peace and his friendship with money and ships. But as he aspired to much greater things, he answered them, that the only method to obtain what they desired, would be to abandon Sicily, and consent to let the Libyan sea be the boundary between them and the Greeks. He now thought of nothing but great projects for himself and his family. He intended to bestow Sicily on his son Helenus, as a kingdom to which he had a right by birth, this prince being his son by the daughter of Agathocles; and he proposed to give his son Alexander the kingdom of Italy, which he looked upon as a certain conquest.

A continued series of prosperity, and the numerous forces under his command, had raised his hopes so high at that time, that he thought of nothing but accomplishing the great views that had drawn him into Sicily; the first and principal of which was the conquest of Africa. He had a sufficient number of vessels for that great expedition, but wanted mariners; in order, therefore, to obtain them, he obliged the cities to furnish him with men, and severally punished those who neglected to obey his orders.

In consequence of these proceedings, his power was soon changed into an insolent and tyrannical sway, which first drew upon him the hatred of the family and friends of Agathocles, whom he deprived of all the wealth they had received from that prince, and bestowed it upon his own creatures. In the contempt of the customs of that country,⁵ he also conferred the first dignities, and the government of cities, on his guards and centurions, whom he continued in the magistracy as long as he thought proper, and without any regard to the time prescribed by the laws. And so to all judicial proceedings, with respect to private property, and other affairs of that nature, he either decided them by his own arbitrary sentence, or left them to the determination of his courtiers, whose sole views were to enrich themselves by sordid gain, and live in all manner of luxury, profusion and debauchery.

A conduct so oppressive and different from that by which he at first had so well succeeded could not fail to alienate the affections of the people from him; and when he became sensible that he was universally hated, and that the Sicilians, exasperated at his odious government, were solicitous to shake off the yoke, he placed in most of the cities such garrisons as he knew were at his devotion, under pretext that the Carthaginians were preparing to invade him. He also seized the most illustrious citizens of each city, and caused them to be put to death, after he had charged them with treasonable conspiracies against him. Of this number was Theon, the commander of the citadel; and all the important services he had rendered the king of Epirus, did not suffice to exempt him from so cruel a policy; though it was allowed that he had contributed more than any other person to reduce Sicily under Pyrrhus. He also intended to have Sostratus seized, but as he had some suspicion of what was designed against him, he found means to quit the city. A prince hazards all things when he loses the affection of his people, which is the strongest tie that unites them to their sovereign. This barbarous and unjust treatment of the two principal citizens of Syracuse, who had conducted most to the progress of his power in that island, rendered him entirely odious and insupportable to the Sicilians. Such was the character of Pyrrhus: the vigour and impetuosity of his conduct in the enterprises he undertook, facilitated his conquest of kingdoms and provinces, but he wanted the art of preserving them. The aversion which the cities conceived against him was so great, that some of them entered into a league with the Carthaginians, and others with the Mamertines, in order to destroy him.

At this juncture, when he beheld nothing but new insurrections and revolts kindling all around, he received letters from the Samnites and Tarentines, which informed him that they had been dispossessed of all their lands, and were then shut up in their cities, where it would be impossible for them to sustain the war, unless he would hasten to their assistance. These letters arrived at a proper time for affording him an honourable pretext for his departure, and preventing it from appearing a flight from Sicily, as if he despaired of succeeding any longer in that island.

As he was embarking at Syracuse,² the Carthaginians attacked him in a such a manner, as obliged him to fight, in the very port, against those barbarians, where he lost several of his ships. This, however, did not prevent him from sailing to Italy with those that remained; but upon his arrival there he found a great body of Mamertines, who had passed over thither before him, to the number of near 10,000 men, and greatly incommoded his march, by frequently harassing his troops and making repeated attacks upon his rear guard.

Livy³ and Dionysius of Halicarnassus tell us one circumstance not very much to the honour of Pyrrhus's memory. At Locris was a celebrated temple, consecrated to Proserpine, and held in the greatest veneration by all the inhabitants of that country, as well as by strangers, and no one had ever presumed to violate it, though it was certain that immense treasures were deposited within it. Pyrrhus, who then wanted money extremely, was not so scrupulous, but carried off all the riches of the goddess, and lodged them in his ships. The next day, if the story may be credited, his fleet was shattered by a violent tempest, and all the vessels that were laden with these rich and sacred spoils, were cast upon the coast of Locris. This proud prince, says Livy, being convinced, by this cruel disaster, that the gods were not imaginary beings, caused all the treasures to be replaced in the temple with the utmost devotion. The goddess, however, was not appeased by this involuntary restitution; and the author who relates this event, represents this impious sacrilege as the cause of all the future calamities which happened to Pyrrhus, and particularly of the unfortunate death which put an end to his enterprises.

Pyrrhus, after he had suffered by

A. M. 3730. this tempest, arrived at Tarentum Ant. J. C. 274. with 20,000 foot and 3000 horse; and when he had reinforced them with the best troops he could find in that city, he advanced, by long marches, against the Romans, who were encamped in the country of the Samnites.

These people retained a secret resentment against Pyrrhus, for deserting them when he undertook his expedition into Sicily; for which reason he was joined by very few of their troops. This, however, did not prevent him from dividing his army into two bodies: one of which he sent into Lucania, to oppose the consul who was there at that time, and to render him incapable of assisting his colleague; the other he led himself against Manius Curius, the other consul, who had intrenched himself in a very advantageous post near the city of Beneventum, where he waited for the succours that were advancing to him from Lucania.

Pyrrhus hastened to attack this last, before the other had joined him; and with this view he selected his best troops, with such of the elephants as were strongest, and of the most service in the field; after which he began his march about the close of the evening, in order to surprise the consul in his camp. The enemy, however, discovered him the next morning as he was descending the mountains, and Manius having marched out of his intrenchments with a body of troops, fell upon the first he met. These he soon put into confusion, and obliged them to have recourse to flight, which spread a universal terror among the rest, great numbers of whom were slain, and even some of the elephants taken.

This success emboldened Manius to draw all his troops out of their intrenchments, in order to combat in the open plain. One of his wings had the advantage, at the beginning of the battle, and pushed the enemies with great vigour; but the other was overthrown by the elephants, and driven back to their camp. In this emergency, he sent for the troops he had left behind him, to guard the intrenchments, and who were all fresh and under arms. These forces advanced in the critical moment and with their pikes and darts compelled the elephants to turn their backs, and fall upon their own battalions; which created such confusion and disorder, that the Romans at last obtained a complete victory, which, in some sense, was of no less value to them than the conquest of all nations. For the intrepidity they discovered in this engagement, and the gallant actions they performed in all the battles they fought with such an enemy as Pyrrhus, increased their reputation, as well as their fortitude and confidence in their own bravery, and caused them to be considered as invincible. This victory over Pyrrhus rendered them indisputable masters of all Italy between the two seas; and this acquisition was soon succeeded by the wars with Carthage, in which, having at last subdued that potent rival, they no longer beheld any power capable of opposing them.

In this manner did Pyrrhus find himself fallen from all the high hopes he had conceived, with relation to Italy and Sicily, after he had consumed six whole years in those wars, and entirely ruined his own affairs. It must be acknowledged, however, that he preserved an invincible fortitude of mind, amidst all these disgraces; and his experience in military affairs, with his valour and intrepidity, caused him always to pass for the first of all the kings and generals of his time. But whatever he acquired by his great exploits, he soon lost by his vain hopes: for his impatience to pursue what he had not yet attained, rendered him incapable of preserving and securing what was already in his possession. This disposition of his made Antigonus compare him to a man who had lucky throws on the dice, but played his men very ill.

He at length returned to Epirus,⁴ with 8000 foot and 500 horse; but as his revenues were not sufficient for the subsistence of these troops, he was industrious to find out some new war for their support; and having received a reinforcement of some Gauls who joined him, he threw himself into Macedonia, where Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, then reigned. His intention was only to ravage the country, and carry off a great booty; but when he had once made himself master of several cities without any difficulty, and had also seduced 2000 of Antigonus's soldiers over to his party, he indulged the most exalted hopes, marched against Antigonus himself; attacked him in the defiles, and put his whole army into disorder. A large body of other Gauls, who formed the rear-guard of Antigonus, courageously sustained his efforts for some time, and the encounter became very warm, but most of them were at last cut to pieces, and those who commanded the elephants, being surrounded by his troops, surrendered themselves prisoners, and delivered up the elephants. The Macedonian phalanx was all that now remained; but the troops who composed this corps were struck with terror and confusion at the defeat of their rear-guard. Pyrrhus perceiving that they seemed to refuse fighting him, stretched out his hand to the commanders and other officers, calling them each by their name, and by this expedient drew over to himself all the infantry of Antigonus, who was obliged to have recourse to flight, in order to preserve some of the maritime places in their obedience to him.

Pyrrhus was exceedingly animated by this victory, as may be judged by the following inscription on the spoils which he consecrated to the Itonian Minerva.¹ "Pyrrhus, king of the Molossians, consecrates to the Itonian Minerva, these bucklers of the fierce Gauls, after he had defeated the whole army of Antigonus. Let no one be surprised at this event. The descendants of Æacus are still as they originally were, perfectly brave and valiant."

Pyrrhus, after this victory, made himself master of all the cities of Macedonia, and having taken possession of Ægææ, he treated the inhabitants with great severity, and garrisoned the city with part of his Gauls, a people the most insatiable and rapacious after money of any. The moment they took possession of the city, they began with plundering the tombs of the Macedonian kings, whose remains were deposited there, carried off all their riches enclosed in those monuments, and with sacrilegious insolence scattered the ashes of those princes in the air. Pyrrhus lightly passed over this infamous action, either because the important affairs he then had upon his hands engaged his whole attention; or that his pressing occasion for the service of these barbarians, rendered him unwilling to alienate their affection from him, by too strict an inquiry into this proceeding, which would make it necessary for him to punish the delinquents; and so criminal a connivance lowered him very much in the esteem of the Macedonians.

Though his affairs were not established on so secure a foundation as to give him just reasons to be void of apprehension, he conceived new hopes, and engaged in new enterprises.² Cleonymus the Spartan came to solicit him to march his army against Lacedæmonia, and Pyrrhus lent a willing ear to that proposal. This Cleonymus was of the royal race. Cleomenes, his father, who was king of Sparta, had two sons, Acrotatus and Cleonymus. The former, who was the eldest, died before his father, and left a son named Areus. After the death of Cleomenes, a dispute, with relation to the sovereignty, arose between Areus and Cleonymus; and as this latter seemed to be a man of a violent and despotic disposition, the contest was decided in favour of Areus. Cleonymus, when he was far advanced in years, espoused a very beautiful woman, whose name was Chelidonia, the daughter of Leotychidas. This young lady conceived a violent passion for Acrotatus, the son of king Areus, who was very amiable, finely shaped, and in the flower of his youth. This circumstance rendered her marriage not only a very melancholy, but dishonourable affair to her husband Cleonymus, who was extremely transported with love and jealousy; for his disgrace was public, and every Spartan was acquainted with the contempt which his wife entertained for him. Animated, therefore, with a burning impatience to avenge himself at once on his partial citizens and his faithless wife, he prevailed on Pyrrhus to march against Sparta, with an army of 25,000 foot, 2000 horse, and twenty-four elephants.

These great preparations for war made it immediately evident, that Pyrrhus was more intent to conquer Peloponnesus for himself, than to make Cleonymus master of Sparta. This, indeed, he strongly disavowed in all his discourse; for when the Lacedæmonians sent ambassadors to him, during his residence at Megalopolis, he assured them that no hostilities were intended by him against Sparta, and that he only came to restore liberty to those cities which Antigonus possessed in that country. He even declared to him that he designed to send his youngest children to Sparta, if they would permit him so to do, that they might be educated in the manners and discipline of that city, and have the advantage above all other kings and princes, of being trained up in so excellent a school.

With these flattering promises he amused all such as presented themselves to him in his march; but those persons must be very thoughtless and imprudent who place any confidence in the language of politicians, with whom artifice and deceit pass for wisdom, and sincerity for weakness and want of judgment. Pyrrhus had no sooner advanced into the territories of Sparta, than he began to ravage and plunder all the country around him.

He arrived, in the evening, before Lacedæmon, Cleonymus desired him to attack the city without a moment's delay, that they might take advantage of the confusion of the inhabitants, who had no suspicion of a siege, and of the absence of king Areus, who was gone to Crete to assist the Gortynians. The helots and friends of Cleonymus were so confident of success, that they were then actually preparing his house for his reception, firmly persuaded he would sup there that very night with Pyrrhus. But this prince, who looked upon the conquest of the city as inevitable, deferred the assault till the next morning. That delay saved Sparta, and showed that there are favourable and decisive moments which must be seized immediately, and which, once neglected, never return.

When night came, the Lacedæmonians deliberated on the expediency of sending their wives to Crete, but were opposed by them in that point: one among them, in particular, whose name was Archidamia, rushed into the senate with a drawn sword, and after she had uttered her complaints, in the name of the rest, demanded of the men who were there assembled, "What could be their inducement to entertain so bad an opinion of them, as to imagine they could consent to live after the destruction of Sparta."

The same council gave direction for opening a trench parallel to the enemy's camp, in order to oppose their approaches to the city, by placing troops along that work; but as the absence of their king, and the surprise with which they were then seized, prevented them from raising a sufficient number of men to form a front equal to that of the enemy, and engage them in the open field, they resolved to shut themselves up as securely as possible, by adding to each extremity of the ditch another kind of intrenchment, formed by a barricade of carriages sunk in the earth up to the axle-trees of the wheels, that by being thus firmly fixed they might check the impetuosity of the elephants, and prevent the cavalry from assaulting them in flank.

While the men were employed in this work, their wives and daughters came to join them, and after they had exhorted those who were appointed for the encounter to take some repose, while the night lasted, they proceeded to measure the length of the trench, and took the third part of it for their own share in the work, which they completed before day. The trench was nine feet in breadth, six in depth, and 900 in length.

When day appeared, and the enemies began to be in motion, those women presented arms to all the young men, and as they were retiring from the trench they had made, they exhorted them to behave in a gallant manner; entreating them, at the same time, to consider how glorious it would be for them to conquer in the sight of their country, or to breathe their last in the arms of their mothers and wives, after they had proved themselves worthy of Sparta by their valour. As for Chelidonia, she withdrew to her chamber, and prepared a cord, which she intended should be the fatal instrument of her death, to prevent her from falling into the hands of her husband, if the city should happen to be taken.

Pyrrhus, in the meantime, advanced at the head of his infantry, to attack the Spartans in front, who waited for him on the other side of the trench, with their bucklers closely joined together. The trench was not only very difficult to be passed, but the soldiers of Pyrrhus could not even approach the edge of it, nor maintain a good footing, because the earth, which had been newly thrown up, easily gave way under them. When his son Ptolemy saw this inconvenience, he drew out 2000 Gauls, with a select band of Chaonians, and filed off along the trench to the place where the carriages were disposed, in order to open a passage; but these were ranged so thick, and sunk to such a depth in the earth, as rendered his design impracticable. The Gauls endeavoured to surmount this difficulty by disengaging the wheels, in order to draw the carriages into the adjoining river.

The young Acrotatus was the first who saw the danger, and immediately hurried through the city with 300 soldiers. Having taken a large compass, he poured upon the rear of Ptolemy's troops, without being discovered in his approach, because he advanced through hollow ways. Upon this sudden attack, as their ranks were broken, and their troops thrown into disorder, they crowded and pressed upon each other, and most of them rolled into the ditch, and fell around the chariots. In a word, after a long encounter, which cost them a vast quantity of blood, they were repulsed, and obliged to have recourse to flight. The old men, and most of the women, stood on the other side of the trench, and beheld with admiration the undaunted bravery of Acrotatus. As for him, covered with blood, and exulting in his victory, he returned to his post amidst the universal applause of the Spartan women, who extolled his valour, and envied, at the same time, the glory and happiness of Chelidonis: an evident proof that the Spartan ladies were not extremely delicate on the subject of conjugal chastity.

The battle was still hotter along the edge of the ditch, where Pyrrhus commanded, and which was defended by the Lacedæmonian infantry: the Spartans fought with great intrepidity, and several among them distinguished themselves very much: particularly Phyllius, who after having opposed the enemy for a considerable time, and killed, with his own hand, all those who attempted to force a passage where he fought; finding himself, at last, faint with the many wounds he had received, and the large quantity of blood he had lost, called to one of the officers who commanded at the post, and after having resigned his place to him, he retired a few paces, and fell down dead amidst his countrymen, that the enemies might not be masters of his body.

Night obliged both parties to discontinue the engagement; but the next morning it was renewed by break of day. The Lacedæmonians defended themselves with new efforts of ardour and bravery, and the women would not forsake them, but were always at hand to furnish arms and refreshments to such as wanted them, and also to assist in carrying off the wounded. The Macedonians were indefatigable in their endeavours to fill up the ditch with vast quantities of wood, and other materials, which they threw upon the arms and dead bodies; and the Lacedæmonians redoubled their efforts to prevent their effecting that design.

But all on a sudden, Pyrrhus, who had forced himself a passage at the place where the chariots had been disposed, was seen pushing forwards full speed to the city. Those who defended this post uttered loud cries, which were answered by dismal shrieks from the women, who ran from place to place in the utmost consternation. Pyrrhus still advanced, and bore down all who opposed him. He was now within a small distance of the city, when a shaft from a Cretan bow pierced his horse, and made him so furious, that he ran with his master into the very midst of the enemies, and fell dead with him to the ground. Whilst his friends crowded about him to extricate him from the danger he was in, the Spartans advanced in great numbers, and with their arms were reputed the Macedonians beyond their trench.

Pyrrhus then caused a general retreat to be sound ed, in expectation that the Lacedæmonians, who had lost a great number of men, and were most of them wounded, would be inclined to surrender the city, which was then reduced to the last extremity, and seemed incapable of sustaining a new attack. But at the very instant when every thing seemed desperate, one of the generals of Antigonus arrived from Corinth, with a very considerable body of foreign troops; which had scarce entered the city before king Areus appeared with 2000 foot, which he had brought from Crete.

These two reinforcements, which the Lacedæmonians received the same day, did but animate Pyrrhus the more, and add new ardour to his ambition. He was sensible that it would be more glorious for him to take the city in spite of its new defenders, and in the very sight of its king; but, after he had made some attempts, and was convinced that he should gain nothing but wounds he desisted from his enterprise, and began to ravage the country, with an intention to pass the winter there; but he was diverted from his design by a new ray of hope, which soon drew him off to another quarter.

Aristeas and Aristippus, two of the principal citizens of Argos, had A. M. 3733. excited a great sedition in that city. Ant. J. C. 271.

The latter of these was desirous of supporting himself by the favour and protection of Antigonus; and Aristeas, in order to frustrate his design, immediately invited Pyrrhus to espouse his party. The king of Epirus, always fond of new pursuits, considered his victories as so many steps to greater advantages; and thought his defeats furnished him with indispensable reasons for entering upon a new war, to repair his losses. Neither good nor ill success, therefore, could inspire him with a disposition for tranquillity; for which reason he had no sooner given audience to the courier of Aristeas, than he began his march to Argos. King Areus formed several ambuscades to destroy him by the way, and having possessed himself of the most difficult passes, cut to pieces the Gauls and Molossians who formed his rear-guard. Ptolemy, who had been detached by Pyrrhus, his father, to succour that guard, was killed in the engagement, upon which his troops disbanded and fled. The Lacedæmonian cavalry, commanded by Eualcus, an officer of great reputation, pursued them with so much ardour, that he insensibly advanced to a great distance from his infantry, who were incapable of keeping up with him.

Pyrrhus being informed of his son's death, which affected him with the keenest sorrow, immediately led up the Molossian cavalry against the pursuers; and throwing himself among their thickest troops, made such a slaughter of the Lacedæmonians, as in a moment covered him with blood. He was always intrepid and terrible in battles; but on this occasion, when grief and revenge gave a new edge to his courage, he even surpassed himself, and effaced the lustre of his conduct in all former battles, by the superior valour and intrepidity which he now displayed. He continually sought Eualcus in the throng, and having at last singled him out, he spurred his horse against him, and struck him through with his javelin, after having been in great danger himself. He then sprung from his horse, and made a terrible slaughter of the Lacedæmonians, whom he overthrew in heaps upon the dead body of Eualcus. This loss of the bravest officers and troops of Sparta, proceeded altogether from the temerity of those who, after they had gained a complete victory, suffered it to be wrested out of their hands, by pursuing those that fled with a blind and imprudent eagerness.

Pyrrhus having thus celebrated as it were the funeral solemnities of Ptolemy by this great battle, and mitigated his affliction in some measure by satiating his rage and vengeance in the blood of those who had slain his son, continued his march to Argos; and upon his arrival there, was informed that Antigonus possessed the heights upon the borders of the plain. He formed his camp near the city of Nauplia, and sent a herald the next morning to Antigonus, with an offer to decide their quarrel by a single combat; but Antigonus contented himself with replying, "That if Pyrrhus was grown weary of life, there were abundance of methods for putting an end to it."

The inhabitants of Argos despatched ambassadors at the same time to both these princes, to entreat them to withdraw their troops, and not reduce their city into subjection to either of them, but allow it to continue in a state of friendship with both. Antigonus readily consented to this proposal, and sent his son as a hostage to the Argives. Pyrrhus also promised to retire; but as he offered no security for the performance of his word, they began to suspect his sincerity, and indeed with sufficient reason.

As soon as night appeared he advanced to the walls, and having found a gate left open by Aristæas, he had time to pour his Gauls into the city, and to seize it without being perceived. But when he would have introduced his elephants, he found the gate too low; which obliged him to cause the towers to be taken down from their backs, and to be replaced, when those animals had entered the city. All this could not be effected, amidst the darkness, without much trouble, noise, and confusion, and without a considerable loss of time, which caused them to be discovered. The Argives, when they beheld the enemy in the city, fled to the citadel, and to those places that were best calculated for their defence, and sent a deputation to Antigonus to urge him to advance with speed to their assistance. He accordingly marched that moment, and caused his son, with the other officers, to enter the city at the head of his best troops.

In this very juncture of time, king Areus also arrived at Argos, with 1000 Cretans, and as many Spartans as had made most haste. These troops, when they had all joined each other, charged the Gauls with the utmost fury, and put them into disorder. Pyrrhus hastened to sustain them, but in the tumult and confusion which were occasioned by the darkness of the night, it was impossible for him to make himself either heard or obeyed. When day appeared he was not a little surprised to see the citadel filled with enemies; and as he then imagined all was lost, he thought of nothing but a timely retreat. But as he had some apprehension with respect to the city gates, which were much too narrow, he sent orders to his son Helenus, whom he had left without, with the greatest part of the army, to demolish part of the wall, that his troops might have a free passage out of the city. The person to whom Pyrrhus gave this order in great haste, having misunderstood his meaning, delivered a quite contrary message, in consequence of which Helenus immediately drew out his best infantry, with all the elephants he had left, and then advanced into the city to assist his father, who was preparing to retire the moment the other entered the place.

Pyrrhus, as long as the place afforded him a sufficient extent of ground, appeared with a resolute mien, and frequently faced about and repulsed those who pursued him; but when he found himself engaged in the narrow street which led to the gate, the confusion, which already was very great, became infinitely increased by the arrival of the troops whom his son brought to his assistance. He frequently called aloud to them to withdraw, in order to clear the street, but in vain, for as it was impossible for his voice to be heard, they still continued to advance. And to complete the calamity in which they were involved, one of the largest elephants sunk down across the middle of the gate, and filled up the whole extent in such a manner, that they could neither advance nor retire. The confusion occasioned by this accident became then inexpressible.

Pyrrhus observing the disorder of his men, who broke forward, and were driven back like the waves of the sea, took off the glittering crest which distinguished his helmet, and caused him to be known, and then, confiding in the goodness of his horse, he sprung into the throng of the enemies who pursued him; and while he was fighting with an air of desperation, one of the adverse party advanced up to him, and pierced his cuirass with a javelin. The wound however was neither great nor dangerous, and Pyrrhus immediately turned upon the man from whom he received it, and who happened to be only a private soldier, the son of a poor woman of Argos. The mother beheld the combat from the top of a house, as did also the rest of the women.

The moment she saw her son engaged with Pyrrhus, she almost lost her senses, and was chilled with horror at the danger to which she beheld him exposed. Amidst the impressions of her agony, she caught up with both hands a large tile, and threw it down upon Pyrrhus. The mass fell directly upon his head, and his helmet being too weak to ward off the blow, his eyes were immediately covered with darkness, his hands dropped the reins, and he sunk down from his horse without being then observed. But he was soon discovered by a soldier, who put an end to his life by cutting off his head.

The noise of this accident was immediately spread in all parts. Alcioneus, the son of Antigonus, took the head from the soldier, and rode away with it full speed to his father, at whose feet he threw it; but met with a very ill reception for having acted in a manner so unbecoming his rank. Antigonus, recollecting the fate of his grandfather Antigonus, and that of Demetrius his father, could not refrain from tears at so mournful a spectacle, and caused magnificent honours to be rendered to the remains of Pyrrhus. After having made himself master of his camp and army, he treated his son Helenus, and the rest of his friends, with great generosity, and sent them back to Epirus.

One cannot refuse the title of a great captain to Pyrrhus, as he was so particularly esteemed by the Roman ambassadors; and especially if we consider the glorious testimony given in his favour by a person the most worthy of belief, with regard to the merit of a warrior, and the best qualified to form a competent judgment on that head. Livy reports,¹ from an historian whom he cites, without, however, pretending to vouch for its authenticity, that Hannibal, when he was asked by Scipio, whom he thought to be the most able and consummate general, placed Alexander in the first rank, Pyrrhus in the second, and himself only in the third.

The same general also characterized Pyrrhus, by adding, "That he was the first who taught the art of encamping; that no one was more skillful in choosing his posts, and drawing up his troops; that he had a peculiar art of conciliating affection, and attaching people to his interest; and this to such a degree, that the people of Italy were more desirous of having him for their master, though a stranger, than to be governed by the Romans themselves, who for so many years had held the first rank in that country."

Pyrrhus might possibly be master of all these great qualities; but I cannot comprehend why Hannibal should represent him as the first who taught the art of encamping. Were not several Grecian kings and generals masters of this art before him? The Romans, indeed, learned it from him, and Hannibal's evidence must extend no farther. However, these extraordinary qualities alone are not sufficient to constitute a great commander; he even did not display them on several occasions. He was defeated by the Romans near Asculum, merely from having chosen his ground ill. He failed in his attempt on Sparta, by deferring the attack for a few hours. He lost Sicily, by not conciliating the people; and was himself killed at Argos, for venturing too rashly into an enemy's city. We might also enumerate a variety of other errors committed by him, with reference even to military affairs.

Is it not entirely inconsistent with the rank and duty of a great general, and especially of a king, to be always exposing his person, without the least precaution, like a private soldier; to charge in the foremost ranks like a common adventurer; to be more valiant of a personal action, which only shows strength and intrepidity, than of that wise and attentive conduct, so essential to a general vigilant for the safety of all, and who never confounds his own merit and functions with those of a private soldier? We may even observe the same defects to have been very apparent in the kings and generals of this age, who undoubtedly were led into it by the false lustre of Alexander's successful temerity.

May it not also be said, that Pyrrhus was deficient in not observing any rule in his military enterprises, and in plunging blindly into wars, without reflection, without cause, through natural constitution, passion, habit, and mere incapacity to continue in a state of tranquillity, or pass any part of his time to his satisfaction, unless he was tilting with all the world? The reader will, I hope, forgive my making use of that expression, since a character of this nature seems, in my opinion, very much to resemble that of the heroes and knights errant of romances.

But no fault is more obvious in Pyrrhus's character, nor must have shocked my readers more, than his forming his enterprises without the least thought, and abandoning himself, without examination, to the least appearances of success; frequently changing his views, on such slight grounds, as discover no consistency of design, and even little judgment; in a word, beginning every thing, and ending nothing. His whole life was a continued series of uncertainty and variation; and while he suffered his restless and impetuous ambition to hurry him, at different times, into Sicily, Italy, Macedonia, and Greece, he was no where so little as in Epirus, the land of his nativity and his hereditary dominions. Let us then allow him the title of a great captain, if valour and intrepidity alone are sufficient to deserve it; for in these qualities no man was ever his superior. When we behold him in his battles, we think ourselves spectators of the vivacity, intrepidity, and martial ardour, of Alexander; but he certainly had not the qualities of a good king, who, when he really loves his people, make his valour consist in defending them, his happiness in making them happy, and his glory in procuring them peace and security.

An embassy was also sent from

A. M. 3731. Rome to Egypt the following year.² Ant. J. C. 273. in return to the civilities of Ptolemy. The ambassadors were Q. Fabius Gurgus, Cn. Fabius Pictor, with Numerius, his brother, and Q. Ogulnius. The disinterestedness which they displayed, sufficiently indicated the greatness of their souls. Ptolemy gave them a splendid entertainment, and took that opportunity to present each of them with a crown of gold; which they received, because they were unwilling to disoblige him by declining the honour he intended them; but they went the next morning and placed them on the head of the king's statues erected in the public squares of the city. The king having likewise tendered them very considerable presents, at their audience of leave, they received them as they before accepted of the crowns; but before they went to the senate, to give an account of their embassy, after their arrival at Rome, they deposited all these presents in the public treasury, and made it evident, by so noble a conduct, that persons of honour ought, when they serve the public,³ to propose no other advantage to themselves, than the credit of acquitting themselves well of their duty. The republic, however, would not suffer itself to be exceeded in generosity of sentiments. The senate and people came to a resolution that the ambassadors, in consideration of the services they had rendered the state, should receive a sum of money equivalent to that they had deposited in the public treasury. This, indeed, was an amiable contest between generosity and glory; and one is at a loss to know, to which of the antagonists to ascribe the victory. Where shall we now find men who devote themselves in such a manner to the public good, without any interested expectations of a return; and who enter upon employments in the state, without the least view of enriching themselves? But let me add too, where shall we find states and princes, who know how to esteem and recompense merit in this manner? We may observe here, says an historian,⁴ three fine models set before us, in the noble liberality of Ptolemy, the disinterested spirit of the ambassadors, and the grateful equity of the Romans.

The Greeks, after they had been subjected by the Macedonians, and rendered dependent on their authority, seem, by losing their liberty, to have also lost that courage and greatness of soul, by which they had been till then so eminently distinguished from other people. They appear entirely changed, and to have lost all similitude to their ancient character. Sparta, that was once so bold and imperious, and in a manner possessed of the sovereignty of all Greece, patiently bowed down her neck, at last, beneath a foreign yoke; and we shall soon behold her subjected to domestic tyrants, who will treat her with the utmost cruelty. We shall see Athens, once so jealous of her liberty, and so formidable to the most powerful kings, running headlong into slavery, and, as she changes her masters, successively paying them the homage of the basest and most abject adulation. Each of these cities will, from time to time, make some efforts to reinstate themselves in their ancient liberties, but all feeble, and without success.

Antigonus Gonatas,⁵ king of Macedonia, became very powerful. A. M. 3736. some years after the death of Pyrrhus. Ant. J. Antigonus, in order to frustrate the confederacy which these two states had formed against him, and to prevent the consequences that might result from it, immediately began hostilities with the siege of Athens; but Ptolemy soon sent a fleet thither, under the command of Patroclus, one of his generals; while Areus, king of Lacedæmon, put himself at the head of an army, to succour that city by land. Patroclus, as soon as he arrived before the place, advised Areus to attack the enemy, and promised to make a descent, at the same time, in order to assault them in the rear. This counsel was very judicious, and could not have failed of success had it been carried into execution but Areus, who wanted provisions for his troops thought it more advisable to return to Sparta. The fleet, therefore, being incapable of acting alone, sailed back to Egypt, without doing any thing. This is the usual inconvenience to which troops of different nations are exposed, when they are commanded by chiefs who have neither any subordination nor good intelligence between them. Athens, thus abandoned by her allies, became a prey to Antigonus, who put a garrison in it.

Patroclus happened, in his return, to stop at Canus, a maritime city of Caria, where he met with Sotades, a poet universally decried for the unbounded licentiousness both of his verses and his manners. His satiric poetry never spared either his best friends, or the most worthy persons; and even the sacred characters of kings were not exempted from his malignity. When he was at the court of Lysimachus, he affected to blacken the reputation of Ptolemy by atrocious calumnies; and when he was entertained by the latter, he traduced Lysimachus in the same manner. He had composed a virulent satire against Ptolemy, wherein he inserted many cutting reflections on his marriage with Arsinoë, his own sister; and he had fled from Alexandria to save himself from the resentment of that prince. Patroclus thought it his duty to make an example of a wretch who had affronted his master in such an insolent manner. He accordingly caused a weight of lead to be fastened to his body, and then ordered him to be thrown into the sea. The generality of poets who profess satire, are a dangerous and detestable race of men, who have renounced all probity and sense of shame, and whose quill, dipped in the bitterest gall, respects neither rank nor virtue.

The affairs of Ptolemy were greatly perplexed by a revolt excited in Egypt¹ by a prince from whom he never suspected having any thing of that nature to fear. Magas, governor of Cyrenaica, and Libya, having set up the standard of rebellion against Ptolemy his master and benefactor, caused himself to be proclaimed king of those provinces. Ptolemy and he were brothers by the same mother; for the latter was the son of Berenice and Philip, a Macedonian officer, who was her husband before she was espoused by Ptolemy Soter. Her solicitations, therefore, obtained for him this government when she was advanced to the honours of a crown, upon the death of Ophellas, as I have formerly observed. Magas had so well established himself in his government by long possession, and by his marriage with Apame, the daughter of Antiochus Soter, king of Syria, that he endeavoured to render himself independent; and as ambition knows no bounds, his pretensions rose still higher. He was not contented with wrestling from his brother the two provinces he governed, but formed a resolution to dethrone him. With this view he advanced into Egypt, at the head of a great army, and, in his march towards Alexandria, made himself master of Parætonium, a city of Marmarica.

The intelligence he received of the revolt of the Marmaridæ in Libya, prevented him from proceeding any farther in this expedition; and he immediately returned to regulate the disorders in his provinces. Ptolemy, who had marched an army to the frontiers, had now a favourable opportunity of attacking him in his retreat, and entirely defeating his troops; but a new danger called him likewise to another quarter. He detected a conspiracy which had been formed against him, by 4000 Gauls, whom he had taken into his pay, and who intended no less than to drive him out of Egypt, and seize it for themselves. In order, therefore, to frustrate their design, he found himself obliged to return to Egypt, where he drew the conspirators into an island in the Nile, and shut them up so effectually there, that they all perished by famine, except those who chose rather to destroy one another, than languish out their lives in that miserable manner.

Magas, as soon as he had calmed the troubles which occasioned his return, renewed his designs on Egypt, and, in order to succeed more effectually, engaged his father-in-law, Antiochus Soter, to enter into his plan. It was then resolved, that Antiochus should attack Ptolemy on one side, while Magas invaded him on the other; but Ptolemy, who had secret intelligence of this treaty, anticipated Antiochus in his design, and gave him so much employment in all his maritime provinces, by repeated descents, and the devastations made by the troops he sent into those parts, that this prince was obliged to continue in his own dominions, to concert measures for their defence; and Magas, who had relied upon a diversion to be made in his favour by Antiochus, thought it not advisable to enter upon any action, when he perceived his ally had not made the effort on which he depended.

Phileterus² who founded the kingdom of Pergamus, died the following year, at the age of fourscore. He was a eunuch, and had been originally a servant of Docimus, an officer in the army of Antigonus; who having quitted that prince to enter into the service of Lysimachus, was followed by Phileterus. Lysimachus, finding him a person of great capacity, made him his treasurer, and intrusted him with the government of the city of Pergamus, in which his treasures were deposited. He served Lysimachus very faithfully in this post for several years; but his attachment to the interests of Agathocles, the eldest son of Lysimachus, who was destroyed by the intrigues of Arsinoë the younger, daughter of Ptolemy Soter, as I have formerly related; and the affliction he testified at the tragical death of that prince, caused him to be suspected by the young queen; and she accordingly took measures to destroy him. Phileterus, who was sensible of her intentions, resolved upon a revolt, and succeeded in his design, by the protection of Seleucus; after which he supported himself in the possession of the city and treasures of Lysimachus; being favoured in his views by the troubles which arose upon the death of that prince, and that of Seleucus, which happened seven months after. He conducted her affairs with so much art and capacity, amidst all the divisions of the successors of those two princes, that he preserved the city, with all the country around it, for the space of twenty years, and formed it into a state, which subsisted for several generations in his family, and became one of the most potent states of Asia. He had two brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, the former of whom, who was the eldest, had a son named also Eumenes, who succeeded his uncle, and reigned twenty-two years.

In this year began the first Punic war, which continued for the space of twenty-four years, between the Romans and the Carthaginians.

³ Bithynia was anciently denominated Mysia, Mygdonia, and Bebrycia, as well as Bithynia. It enjoyed its own kings for more than 200 years, when the last of them left it as a legacy to the Romans. It was then re-conquered by Mithridates, king of Pontus; reduced to its former subjection by Lucullus and Cotta; and, after the defeat of Domitius Calpurnius, again conquered by Pharnaces, son of Mithridates, who kept it till his overthrow at Zela by Cæsar; and from that time it remained a Roman province, and was included by Constantine in the diocese of Pontus, when he made a new division of the empire. Under Valentinian, Bithynia was divided into two provinces, of which Nice and Nicomedia were the respective capitals, and so continued till it became subject to the Turkish princes of the house of Seljook, from whom it was recovered in the 13th century, but finally lost to the Greek empire in the reign of the younger Andronicus. It is now included in the great province of Anatolia, or Anadolia, and governed by a Pasha of three tails, who resides at Nicomedia.

Bithynia is a romantic and beautiful country, intersected with lofty mountains and fertile valleys, abounding in fine forests, and well watered by the two large streams of the Sangarius and Parthenius, with their numberless tributaries.

ed it Nicomedia, from his own name. Great mention is made of it in the history of the Lower Empire, because several of the Roman emperors resided there.

Antiochus Soter was desirous to improve the death of Philoterus to his own advantage, and take that opportunity to seize his dominions; but Eumenes, his nephew and successor, raised a fine army for his defence, and obtained such a complete victory over him near Sardis, as not only secured him the possession of what he already enjoyed, but enabled him to enlarge his dominions considerably.

Antiochus¹ returned to Antioch A. M. 3743. after this defeat, where he ordered Ant. J. C. 261. one of his sons to be put to death for raising a commotion in his absence, and caused the other, whose name was the same as his own, to be proclaimed king; shortly after which he died, and left him all his dominions. This young prince was his son by Stratonice, the daughter of Demetrius, who, from his mother-in-law, became his consort, in the manner I have before mentioned.

Antiochus the son,² when he came to the crown, was espoused to Laodice, his sister, by the father's side. He afterwards assumed the surname of Theos, which signifies God, and distinguishes him, at this day, from the other kings of Syria who were called by the name of Antiochus. The Milesians were the first who conferred it upon him to testify their gratitude for delivering them from the tyranny of Timarchus, governor of Caria under Ptolemy Philadelphus, who was not only master of Egypt, but of Cœle-syria, and Palestine, with the provinces of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria in Asia Minor. Timarchus revolted from his sovereign, and chose Miletus for the seat of his residence. The Milesians, in order to free themselves from this tyrant, had recourse to Antiochus, who defeated and killed him. In acknowledgment for which they rendered him divine honours, and even conferred upon him the title of God. With such impious flattery was it usual to treat the reigning princes of those ages!³ The Lemnians had likewise bestowed the same title on his father and grandfather, and did not scruple to erect temples to their honour; and the people of Smyrna were altogether as obsequious to his mother Stratonice.

Berosus,⁴ the famous historian of Babylon, flourished in the beginning of this prince's reign, and dedicated his history to him. Pliny informs us, that it contained the astronomical observations of 480 years. When the Macedonians were masters of Babylon, Berosus made himself acquainted with their language, and went first to Cos, which had been rendered famous as the birth-place of Hippocrates, and there established a school, in which he taught astronomy and astrology. From Cos he proceeded to Athens, where, notwithstanding the utility of his art, he acquired so much reputation by his astrological predictions, that the citizens erected a statue to him, with a tongue of gold,⁵ in the Gymnasium, where the youths performed all their exercises. Josephus and Eusebius have transmitted to us some excellent fragments of this history, that illustrate several passages in the Old Testament, and without which it would be impossible to trace any exact succession of the kings of Babylon.

Ptolemy being solicitous to enrich his kingdom, conceived an expedient to draw into it all the maritime commerce of the East; which, till then, had been in the possession of the Tyrians, who transacted it by sea, as far as Elath; and from thence by land to Rhinocorura, and from this last place by sea again, to the city of Tyre. Elath and Rhinocorura were two sea-ports; the first on the eastern shore of the Red Sea, and the second at the extremity of the Mediterranean, between Egypt and Palestine, and near the mouths of the river of Egypt.

Ptolemy,⁷ in order to draw this commerce into his own kingdom, thought it necessary to form a city on the western shore of the Red Sea, from whence the ships were to set out. He accordingly built it almost on the frontiers of Ethiopia, and gave it the name of his mother Berenice; but the port not being very commodious, that of Myos-Hornos was preferred as being very near, and much better; and all the commodities of Arabia, India, Persia, and Ethiopia were landed here. From thence they were conveyed on camels to Coptus, where they were again shipped, and brought down the Nile to Alexandria, which transmitted them to all the West, in exchange for its merchandise, which was afterwards exported to the East. But as the passage from Coptus to the Red Sea lay across the deserts, where no water could be procured, and which had neither cities nor houses to lodge the caravans; Ptolemy, in order to remedy this inconvenience, caused a canal to be opened along the great road, and to communicate with the Nile that supplied it with water. On the edge of this canal houses were erected, at proper distances, for the reception of passengers, and to supply all necessary accommodations for them and their beasts of burden.

Useful as all these labours were, Ptolemy did not think them sufficient; for, as he intended to engross all the traffic between the East and West into his dominions, he thought his plan would be imperfect, unless he could protect what he had facilitated in other respects. With this view, he caused two fleets to be fitted out, one for the Red Sea, and the other for the Mediterranean. This last was extremely fine,⁸ and some of the vessels which composed it much exceeded the common size. Two of them, in particular, had thirty benches of oars; one twenty; four rowed with fourteen; two with twelve; fourteen with eleven; thirty with nine; thirty-seven with seven; five with six, and seventeen with five. The number of the whole amounted to 112 vessels. He had as many more, with four and three benches of oars, beside a prodigious number of small vessels. With this formidable fleet he not only protected his commerce from all insults; but kept in subjection, as long as he lived, most of the maritime provinces of Asia Minor, as Cilicia, for instance, with Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria, as far as the Cyclades.

Magnus, king of Cyrene and Libya, growing very aged and infirm, caused overtures of accommodation to be tendered to his brother Ptolemy, with the proposal of a marriage between Berenice, his only daughter, and the eldest son of the king of Egypt, and a promise to give her all his dominions for her dowry. The negotiation succeeded, and a peace was concluded on those terms.

Magnus,⁹ however, died before the execution of the treaty, having continued in the government of Libya, and Cyrenaica, for the space of fifty years. Towards the close of his days he abandoned himself to pleasure, and particularly to excess at his table, which greatly impaired his health. His widow Apame, whom Justin calls Arsinoe, resolved, after his death, to break off her daughter's marriage with the son of Ptolemy, as it had been concluded without her consent. With this view, she employed persons in Macedonia to invite Demetrius, the uncle of king Antigonus Gonatas to come to her court, assuring him, at the same time, that her daughter and crown should be his. Demetrius arrived there in a short time; but as soon as Apame streams. The former still flows, as in the days of Strabo, between flowery meadows and smiling slopes, in general 100 yards wide, very deep and rapid.

beheld him, she contracted a violent passion for him, and resolved to espouse him herself. From that moment he neglected the daughter to attach himself to the mother; and as he imagined that her favour raised him above all things, he began to treat the young princess, as well as the ministers and officers of the army, in such an insolent and imperious manner, that they formed a resolution to destroy him. Berenice herself conducted the conspirators to the door of her mother's apartment, where they stabbed him in his bed, though Apame employed all her efforts to save him, and even covered him with her own body. Berenice, after this, went to Egypt, where her marriage with Ptolemy was consummated, and Apame was sent to her brother Antiochus Theos, in Syria.

This princess had the art to exasperate her brother so effectually against Ptolemy, that she at last spirited him up to a war, which continued for a long space of time, and was productive of fatal consequences to Antiochus, as will be evident in the sequel.

Ptolemy did not place himself at the head of his army,² his declining state of health not permitting him to expose himself to the fatigues of a campaign and the inconveniences of a camp; for which reason he left the war to the conduct of his generals. Antiochus, who was then in the flower of his age, took the field at the head of all the forces of Babylon and the East, with a resolution to carry on the war with the utmost vigour. History has not preserved the particulars of what passed in that campaign, or perhaps the advantages obtained on either side were not very considerable, and the event not worthy of much notice.

Ptolemy did not forget to improve his library,³ notwithstanding the war, and continually enriched it with new books. He was exceedingly curious in pictures and designs by great masters. Aratus, the famous Sicyonian, was one of those who collected for him in Greece; and he had the good fortune to gratify the taste of that prince for those works of art to such a degree, that Ptolemy entertained a friendship for him, and presented him with twenty-five talents, which he expended in the relief of the necessitous Sicyonians, and the redemption of such of them as were detained in captivity.

While Antiochus was employed in his war with Egypt, a great insurrection was fomented in the East, and his distance at that time rendered him incapable of taking the necessary steps to check it with sufficient expedition. The revolt, therefore, daily gathered strength, till it at last became incapable of remedy. These troubles gave birth to the Parthian empire.

The cause of these commotions proceeded from Agathocles,⁴ governor of the Parthian dominions for Antiochus. This officer attempted to offer violence to a youth of the country, whose name was Tiridates; upon which Arsaces, the brother of the boy, a person of low extraction but of great courage and honour, assembled some of his friends, in order to deliver his brother from the brutality intended him. They accordingly fell upon the governor, killed him on the spot, and then fled for safety with several persons whom they had drawn together for their defence against the pursuit to which such a bold proceeding would inevitably expose them. Their party grew so numerous, by the negligence of Antiochus, that Arsaces soon found himself strong enough to drive the Macedonians out of that province, and assume the government himself. The Macedonians had always continued masters of it, from the death of Alexander; first under Eumenes, then under Antigonus, next under Seleucus Nicator, and lastly under Antiochus.

Much about the same time,⁵ Theodotus also revolted in Bactriana, and from a governor, became king of that province; he subjected the thousand cities it contained, while Antiochus was amusing himself with the Egyptian war: and strengthened himself so effectually in his new acquisitions, that it became impossible to reduce him afterwards. This example was followed by all the other nations in those parts, each of whom threw off the yoke at the same time; by which means Antiochus lost all the eastern provinces of his empire beyond the Tigris. This event happened, according to Justin, when L. Manlius Vulso, and M. Atilius Regulus,⁶ were consuls at Rome: that is to say, the fourteenth year of the first Punic war.

The troubles and revolts in the East made Antiochus at last desirous to disengage himself from the war with Ptolemy.⁷ A treaty of peace was accordingly concluded between them; and the conditions of it were, that Antiochus should divorce Laodice, and espouse Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy; that he should also disinherit his issue by the first marriage, and secure the crown to his children by the second. Antiochus, after the ratification of the treaty, repudiated Laodice, though she was his sister by the father's side, and had brought him two sons: Ptolemy then embarked at Pelusium, and conducted his daughter to Seleucia, a maritime city, near the mouth of the Orontes, a river of Syria. Antiochus came thither to receive his bride, and the nuptials were solemnized with great magnificence. Ptolemy had a tender affection for his daughter, and gave orders to have regular supplies of water from the Nile transmitted to her; believing it better for her health than any other water whatever, and therefore he was desirous she should drink none but that. When marriages are contracted from no other motives than political views, and are founded on such unjust conditions, they are generally attended with calamitous and fatal events.

These particulars of the marriage of Antiochus with the daughter of Ptolemy had been foretold by the prophet Daniel. I shall here repeat the beginning of this prophecy, which has already been explained elsewhere, that the reader may at once behold and admire the prediction of the greatest events in our history, and their literal accomplishment at the appointed time.

"I will now show thee the truth."⁸ These words were spoken to Daniel, on the part of God, by the man clothed in linen. "Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia;" namely, Cyrus, who was then upon the throne; his son Cambyzes; and Darius, the son of Hystaspes. "And the fourth shall be far richer than they all: And by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Greece." The monarch here meant was Xerxes, who invaded Greece with a very formidable army.

"And a mighty king shall stand up,⁹ that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will." In this part of the prophecy we may easily trace Alexander the Great.

"And when he shall stand up,¹⁰ his kingdom shall be broken (by his death,) and shall be divided to wards the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled for his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others beside those:" namely, beside the four greater princes. We have already seen the vast empire of Alexander parcelled out into four great kingdoms;¹¹ with ont including those foreign princes who founded other kingdoms in Cappadocia, Armenia, Bithynia, Heraclea, and on the Bosphorus. All this was presented to Daniel.

This prophet then proceeds to the treaty of peace, and the marriage we have already mentioned.

"The king of the South shall be strong,¹ and one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion. And in the end of years they shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the South shall come to the king of the North to make an agreement: but he shall not retain the power of the arm, neither shall he stand, nor his arm: but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times."

It will be necessary to observe, that Daniel, in this passage, and throughout all the remaining part of the chapter before us, confines himself to the kings of Egypt and Syria, because they were the only princes who engaged in wars against the people of God.

"The king of the South shall be strong."² This king of the South was Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, king of Egypt; and the king of the North was Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria. And, indeed, such was their exact situation with respect to Judea, which has Syria to the north, and Egypt to the south.

According to Daniel, the king of Egypt, who first reigned in that country after the death of Alexander, was Ptolemy Soter, whom he calls the king of the South, and declares that he shall be strong. The exactness of this character is fully justified by what we have seen in his history: for he was master of Egypt, Libya, Cyrenaica, Arabia, Palestine, Coele-Syria, and most of the maritime provinces of Asia Minor; with the island of Cyprus: as also of several isles in the Ægean sea, which is now called the Archipelago, and even some cities of Greece, as Sicyon and Corinth.

The prophet,³ after this, mentions another of the four successors to this empire, whom he calls Princes or Governors. This was Seleucus Nicator, the king of the North; of whom he declares, that he "should be more powerful than the king of the South, and his dominion more extensive;" for this is the import of the prophet's expression, "he shall be strong above him, and have dominion." It is easy to prove, that his territories were of greater extent than those of the king of Egypt; for he was master of all the East, from mount Taurus to the river Indus; and also of several provinces in Asia Minor, between mount Taurus and the Ægean sea; to which he added Thrace and Macedonia, a little before his death.

Daniel then informs us, "of the coming of the daughter of the king of the South, to the king of the North, and mentions the treaty of peace which was concluded on this occasion between the two kings."⁴ This evidently points out the marriage of Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy king of Egypt, with Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, and the peace concluded between them in consideration of this alliance; every circumstance of which exactly happened according to the prediction before us. The sequel of this history will show us the fatal events of this marriage, which was also foretold by the prophet.

In the remaining part of the chapter he relates the most remarkable events of future times, under these two races of kings, to the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, the great persecutor of the Jewish nation. I shall be careful, as these events occur in the series of this history, to apply the prophecy of Daniel to them, that the reader may observe the exact accomplishment of each prediction.

In the meantime, I cannot but recognize in this place, with admiration, the divine origin of the Scriptures, which relate in so particular and circumstantial a manner, a variety of singular and extraordinary facts, above 300 years before they were transacted. What an immense chain of events extends from the prophecy to the time of its accomplishment; by the breaking of any single link, the whole would be disconcerted! With respect to the marriage alone, what hand, but that of the Almighty, could have conducted so many different views, intrigues, and passions, to the same point? What knowledge but his could, with so much certainty, have foreseen such a number of distinct circumstances, subject not only to the freedom of will, but even to the irregular impressions of caprice? And what man but must adore that sovereign power which God exercises, in a secret but certain manner, over kings and princes, whose very crimes he renders subservient to the execution of his sacred will and the accomplishment of his eternal decrees; in which all events, both general and particular, have their appointed time and place fixed beyond the possibility of failing, even those which depend the most on the choice and liberty of mankind!

As Ptolemy was curious,⁵ to an uncommon degree, in the statues, designs, and pictures of excellent masters, as well as in books; he saw, during the time he continued in Syria, a statue of Diana, in one of the temples, with which he was highly pleased. Antiochus made him a present of it, at his request, and he carried it into Egypt. Some time after his return, Arsinoe was seized with an indisposition, and dreamed that Diana appeared to her, and acquainted her, that Ptolemy was the occasion of her illness, by his having taken her statue out of the temple where it was consecrated to her divinity. Upon this the statue was sent back, as soon as possible, to Syria, in order to be replaced in the proper temple. It was also accompanied with rich presents to the goddess, and a variety of sacrifices were offered up to appease her displeasure; but they were not succeeded by any favourable effect. The queen's distemper was so far from abating, that she died in a short time, and left Ptolemy inconsolable at her loss; and more so, because he imputed her death to his own indiscretion, in having removed the statue of Diana out of the temple.

This taste for statues, pictures, and other rare curiosities of art, may be very commendable in a prince, and other great men, when indulged to a certain degree; but when a person abandons himself to it entirely, it degenerates into a dangerous temptation, and frequently prompts him to notorious injustice and violence. This is evident by what Cicero relates of Verres, who practised a kind of piracy in Sicily, where he was prætor, by stripping private houses, and even the temples, of all their finest and most valuable curiosities. But though a person should have no recourse to such heinous methods, it is still very shocking and offensive, says Cicero, to say to a person of distinction, worth, and fortune, "Sell me this picture, or that statue,"⁶ since it is in effect declaring, "You are unworthy to have such an admirable piece in your possession, which suits only a person of my rank and taste." I mention nothing of the enormous expenses into which a man is drawn by this passion; for these exquisite pieces have no price but what the desire of possessing them sets upon them, and that we know has no bounds.⁷

Though Arsinoe was older than Ptolemy, and too far advanced in years to have any children when he espoused her, he however retained a constant and tender passion for her to the last, and rendered all imaginable honours to her memory after her death. He gave her name to several cities, which he caused to be built, and performed a number of other remarkable things, to testify how well he loved her.

Nothing could be more extraordinary than the design he formed of erecting a temple to her,⁸ at Alexandria, with a dome rising above it, the concave part of which was to be lined with adamant, in order to keep an iron statue of the queen suspended in the air. This design was the invention of Dinocrates, a famous architect in those times; and the moment he proposed it to Ptolemy, that prince gave orders for beginning the work without delay. The experiment however, remained imperfect, for want of sufficient time; for Ptolemy and the architect dying within a very short time after this resolution, the project was entirely discontinued. It has long been said, and even believed, that the body of Mahomet was suspended in this manner, in an iron coffin, by a loadstone fixed in the vaulted roof of the chamber where his corpse was deposited after his death; but this is a mere vulgar error, without the least foundation.

Ptolemy Philadelphus survived A. M. 3757. his beloved Arsinoë but a short Ant. J. C. 247. time.¹ He was naturally of a tender constitution, and the luxurious manner of life he led contributed to the decay of his health. The infirmities of old age, and his affliction for the loss of a consort whom he loved to adoration, brought upon him a languishing disorder, which ended his days in the sixty-third year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign. He left two sons and a daughter,² whom he had by his first wife Arsinoë, the daughter of Lysimachus, a different person from the last mentioned queen of that name. His eldest son Ptolemy Evergetes, succeeded him in the throne; the second bore the name of Lysimachus, his grandfather by the mother's side, and was put to death by his brother for engaging in a rebellion against him. The name of the daughter was Berenice, whose marriage with Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, has already been related.

SECTION IX.—CHARACTER AND QUALITIES OF PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS.

Ptolemy Philadelphus had certainly great and excellent qualities; and yet we cannot propose him as a perfect model of a good king, because those qualities were counterpoised by defects altogether as considerable. He dishonoured the early part of his reign, by his resentment against a man of uncommon merit, I mean Demetrius Phalereus, because he had given some advice to his father, contrary to the interest of Philadelphus, but entirely conformable to equity and natural right. His immense riches soon drew after them a train of luxury and effeminate pleasures, the usual concomitants of such high fortunes, which contributed not a little to enervate his mind. He was not very industrious in cultivating the military virtues; but we must acknowledge at the same time, that a remissness of this nature is not always a misfortune to a people.

He, however, made an ample compensation for this neglect, by his love of the arts and sciences, and his generosity to learned men. The fame of his liberalities invited several illustrious poets to his court, particularly Callimachus, Lycophron, and Theocritus; the last of whom gives him a very high character in some of his Idyllia. We have already seen his extraordinary taste for books; and that he spared no expense in the augmentation and embellishment of the library founded by his father, from whence both those princes have derived as much glory as could have redounded to them from the greatest conquests. As Philadelphus had abundance of wit, and his happy natural disposition had been carefully cultivated by able masters, he always retained a peculiar taste for the sciences, but in such a manner as suited the dignity of a prince; since he never suffered them to engross his whole attention, but regulated his propensity to those grateful amusements by prudence and moderation. In order to perpetuate this taste in his dominions, he erected public schools and academies at Alexandria, where they long flourished in great reputation. He loved to converse with men of learning, and as the greatest masters in every kind of science were emulous to obtain his favour, he extracted from each of them (if I may use that expression) the flower and quintessence of the sciences in which they excelled. This is the inestimable advantage which princes and great men possess; and happy are they when they know how to use the opportunity of acquiring, in agreeable conversations a thousand things, not only curious, but useful and important, with respect to government.

This intercourse of Philadelphus with learned men, and his care to give due honour to the arts, may be considered as the source of those measures he pursued, through the course of his long reign, to make commerce flourish in his dominions; in which attempt no prince ever succeeded more effectually than himself. The greatest expenses, in this particular, could never discourage him from persisting in what he proposed to accomplish. We have already observed, that he built whole cities in order to protect and facilitate his intended traffic; that he opened a very long canal through deserts destitute of water, and maintained a very numerous and complete navy in each of the two seas, merely for the defence of his merchants. His principal point in view was to secure to strangers all imaginable safety, convenience, and freedom, in his ports, without fettering trade in any degree, or endeavouring to turn it from its proper channel, in order to make it subservient to his own particular interest; as he was persuaded, that commerce was like some springs, that soon cease to flow, when diverted from their natural course.

These were views worthy a great prince, and a consummate politician, and their lasting effects were infinitely beneficial to his kingdom. They have even continued to our days, strengthened by the principles of the first establishment, after a duration of above 2000 years; opening a perpetual flow of new riches, and new commodities of every kind, into all nations; drawing continually from them a return of voluntary contributions; uniting the East and West by the mutual supply of their respective wants; and establishing on this basis a commerce that has constantly supported itself from age to age without interruption. Those great conquerors and celebrated heroes, whose merit has been so highly extolled, not to mention the ravages and desolation they have occasioned to mankind, have scarce left behind them any traces of the conquests and acquisitions they have made for aggrandizing their empires; or at least those traces have not been durable, and the revolutions to which the most potent states are obnoxious, divest them of their conquests in a short time, and transfer them to others. On the contrary, the commerce of Egypt, established thus by Philadelphus, instead of being shaken by time, has rather increased through a long succession of ages, and become daily more useful and indispensable to all nations. So that, when we trace it up to its source, we shall be sensible that this prince ought to be considered not only as the benefactor of Egypt, but of all mankind in general to the latest posterity.

What we have already observed, in the history of Philadelphus, with respect to the inclination of the neighbouring people to transplant themselves in crowds into Egypt, preferring a residence in a foreign land to the natural affection of mankind for their native soil, is another glorious panegyric on this prince; as the most essential duty of kings, and the most grateful pleasure they can possibly enjoy, amidst the splendours of a throne, is to gain the love of mankind, and to make their government desirable. Ptolemy was sensible, as an able politician, that the only sure expedient for extending his dominions without any act of violence, was to multiply his subjects and attach them to his government, by their interest and inclination; to cause the land to be cultivated in a better manner; to make arts and manufactures flourish; and to augment, by a thousand judicious measures, the power of a prince and his kingdom, whose real strength consists in the multitude of his subjects.

As soon as Antiochus Theos had received intelligence of the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus,† his father-in-law, he di-

Ant. J. C. 246. vanced Berenice, and recalled Laodice and her children. Laodice, who knew the variable disposition and inconstancy of Antiochus, and was apprehensive that the same levity of mind would induce him to return to Berenice again, resolved to improve the present opportunity to secure the crown for her son. Her own children were disinherited by the treaty made with Ptolemy; by which it was also stipulated, that the issue Berenice might have by Antiochus should succeed to the throne, and she then had a son. Laodice, therefore, caused Antiochus to be poisoned, and when she saw that he was dead, she placed in his bed a person named Artemon, who very much resembled him both in his features and the tone of his voice, to act the part she had occasion for. He acquitted himself with great dexterity; taking great care, in the few visits that were paid him, to recommend his dear Laodice and her children to the lords and people. In his name were issued orders, by which his eldest son Seleucus Callinicus was appointed his successor. His death was then declared, upon which Seleucus peaceably ascended the throne, and enjoyed it for the space of twenty years. It appears by the sequel, that his brother Antiochus, surnamed Hierax, had the government of the provinces of Asia Minor, where he commanded a very considerable body of troops.

Laodice, not believing herself safe as long as Berenice and her son lived, concerted measures with Seleucus to destroy them also; but Berenice being informed of their design, escaped with her son to Daphne, where she shut herself up in the asylum built by Seleucus Nicator. But being at last betrayed by the perfidy of those who besieged her there by the order of Laodice, first her son and then herself, with all the Egyptians who had accompanied her to that retreat, were murdered in the blackest and most inhuman manner.

This event was an exact accomplishment of what the prophet Daniel had foretold with relation to this marriage. "The king's daughter of the South shall come to the king of the North to make an agreement;‡ but he shall not retain the power of the arm, neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in those times." I am not surprised that Porphyry, who was a professed enemy to Christianity, should represent those prophecies of Daniel as predictions made after the several events to which they refer; for could they possibly be clearer if he had even been a spectator of the acts he foretold?

What probability was there that Egypt and Syria, which, in the time of Daniel constituted part of the Babylonian empire, as tributary provinces, should each of them be governed by kings who originally sprung from Greece? Yet the prophet saw them established in those dominions above 300 years before. He beheld these two kings in a state of war and saw them afterwards reconciled by a treaty of peace ratified by a marriage. He also observed that it was the king of Egypt, and not the king of Syria, who cemented the union between them by the gift of his daughter. He saw her conducted from Egypt to Syria, in a pompous and magnificent manner; but was sensible that this event would be succeeded by a strange catastrophe. In a word, he discovered that the issue of this princess, notwithstanding all the express precautions in the treaty for securing their succession to the crown, in exclusion of the children by a former marriage, were so far from ascending the throne, that they were entirely exterminated; and that the new queen herself was delivered up to her rival, who caused her to be destroyed, with all the officers who conducted her out of Egypt into Syria, and who, till then, had been her strength and support. 'Great God! how worthy are thy oracles to be believed and revered.' Testis monia tua credibilia facta sunt nimis.

While Berenice was besieged and blocked up in Daphne, the cities of Asia Minor, which had received intelligence of her treatment, were touched with compassion at her misfortune: in consequence of which they formed a confederacy, and sent a body of troops to Antioch for her relief. Her brother Ptolemy Euergetes was also as expeditious as possible to advance thither with a formidable army; but the unhappy Berenice and her children were dead before any of these auxiliary troops could arrive. When they therefore saw that all their endeavours to save the queen and her children were rendered ineffectual, they immediately determined to revenge her death in a remarkable manner. The troops of Asia joined those of Egypt, and Ptolemy, who commanded them, was as successful as he could desire in the satisfaction of his just resentment. The criminal proceeding of Laodice, and of the king her son, who had made himself an accomplice in her barbarity, soon alienated the affection of the people from them; and Ptolemy not only caused Laodice to suffer death, but made himself master of all Syria and Cilicia; after which he passed the Euphrates, and conquered all the country as far as Babylon and the Tigris; and if the progress of his arms had not been interrupted by a sedition which obliged him to return to Egypt, he would certainly have subdued all the provinces of the Syrian empire. He, however, left Antiochus, one of his generals, to govern the provinces he had gained on this side of mount Taurus; and Xanthippus was intrusted with those that lay beyond it; Ptolemy then marched back to Egypt, laden with the spoils he had acquired by his conquests.

This prince carried off 40,000 talents of silver,§ with a prodigious quantity of gold and silver vessels, and 2,500 statues, part of which were those Egyptian idols that Cambyzes, after his conquest of that kingdom, had sent into Persia. Ptolemy gained the hearts of his subjects by replacing those idols in their ancient temples, when he returned from this expedition; for the Egyptians, who were more devoted to their superstitious idolatry than all the rest of mankind, thought they could not sufficiently express their veneration and gratitude to a king, who had restored their gods to them in such a manner. Ptolemy derived from this action the title of Euergetes, which signifies a benefactor, a title infinitely preferable to all appellations which conquerors have assumed from a false idea of glory. An epithet of this nature is the true characteristic of kings, whose solid greatness consists in the inclination and ability to improve the welfare of their subjects; and it were to be wished, that Ptolemy had merited this title by actions more worthy of it.

All this was also accomplished exactly as the prophet Daniel had foretold, and we need only cite the text, to prove what we advance.¶ "But out of a branch of her root (intimating the king of the South who was Ptolemy Euergetes, the son of Ptolemy Philadelphus) shall one stand up in his estate, who shall come with an army, and shall enter into the forress of the king of the North (Seleucus Callinicus), and shall deal against them, and shall prevail. And shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver, and of gold, and he shall continue more years than the king of the North. So the king of the South shall come into his kingdom (that is the kingdom of Seleucus), and shall return into his own land," namely, into Egypt.

When Ptolemy Evergetes set out on this expedition, his queen Berenice, who tenderly loved him, being apprehensive of the dangers to which he would be exposed in the war, made a vow to consecrate her hair, if he should return in safety. This was most probably a sacrifice of the ornament she most esteemed; and when she at last saw him return with so much glory, the accomplishment of her promise was her immediate care; in order to which she caused her hair to be cut off, and then dedicated it to the gods in the temple which Ptolemy Philadelphus had founded in honour of his beloved Arsinoe on Zephyrion, a promontory in Cyprus, under the name of the Zephyrian Venus. This consecrated hair being lost soon after by some unknown accident, Ptolemy was extremely offended with the priests for their negligence; upon which Conon of Samos, an artful courtier, and also a mathematician, being then at Alexandria, took upon him to affirm, that the locks of the queen's hair had been conveyed to heaven; and he pointed out seven stars near the lion's tail, which till then had never been part of any constellation; declaring, at the same time, that those were the hair of Berenice. Several other astronomers, either to make their court as well as Conon, or that they might not draw upon themselves the displeasure of Ptolemy, gave those stars the same name, which is still used to this day. Callimachus, who had been at the court of Philadelphus, composed a short poem on the hair of Berenice, which Catullus afterwards translated into Latin, which version is come down to us.

Ptolemy, in his return from this expedition, passed through Jerusalem, where he offered a great number of sacrifices to the God of Israel, in order to render homage to him, for the victories he had obtained over the king of Syria; by which action he evidently discovered his preference of the true God to all the idols of Egypt. Perhaps the prophecies of Daniel were shown to that prince, and he might conclude, from what they contained, that all his conquests and successes were owing to that God who had caused them to be foretold so exactly by his prophets.

Seleucus had been detained for
A. M. 3759. some time in his kingdom, by the Ant. J. C. 245. apprehension of domestic troubles; but when he received intelligence that Ptolemy was returning to Egypt, he set sail with a considerable fleet to reduce the revolted cities. His enterprise was, however, ineffectual; for, as soon as he advanced into the open sea, his whole navy was destroyed by a violent tempest; as if heaven itself, says Justin,⁴ had made the winds and waves the ministers of his vengeance on this parricide. Seleucus, and some of his attendants, were almost the only persons who were saved, and it was with great difficulty that they escaped naked from the general wreck. But this dreadful stroke, which seemed intended to overwhelm him, contributed, on the contrary, to the re-establishment of his affairs. The cities of Asia which had revolted, through the horror they conceived against him, after the murder of Berenice and her children, no sooner received intelligence of the great loss he had now sustained, than they imagined him sufficiently punished; and as their hatred was then changed into compassion, they all declared for him anew.

This unexpected change having
A. M. 3760. reinstated him in the greatest part Ant. J. C. 244. of his dominions, he was industrious to raise another army to recover the rest. This effort, however, proved as unsuccessful as the former; his army was defeated by the forces of Ptolemy, who cut off the greatest part of his troops. He fled to Antioch, with as small a number of men as had been left him when he escaped from the shipwreck at sea; as if, says a certain historian, he had recovered his former power only to lose it a second time with the greater mortification, by a fatal vicissitude of fortune.⁵

After this second blow, the cities of Smyrna and Magnesia, in Asia Minor, were induced by mere affection for Seleucus, to form a confederacy in his favour, by which they mutually stipulated to support him with all their forces. They were greatly attached to his family, from whom they probably had received many extraordinary favours: they had ever rendered divine honours to his father, Antiochus Theos, and also to Stratonice, the mother of this latter. Callinicus retained a grateful remembrance of the regard these cities had testified for his interest, and afterwards granted them several advantageous privileges. They caused the treaty we have mentioned to be engraven on a large column of marble, which still subsists, and is now in the area before the theatre at Oxford. This column was brought out of Asia, by Thomas Earl of Arundel, at the beginning of the reign of Charles the First, and, with several other antique marbles, presented to the university of Oxford by his grandson, Henry Duke of Norfolk, in the reign of Charles the Second. All the learned world ought to think themselves indebted to noblemen who are emulous to adorn and enrich universities in such a generous manner; and I wish that in this respect the same zeal had been testified for that of Paris, the mother of all the rest, and whose antiquity and reputation, in conjunction with the abilities of her professors, and her attachment to the sacred persons of kings, have rendered her worthy of being favoured in a peculiar manner by princes and great men. The establishment of a library in this illustrious seminary would be an immortal honour to the person who should lay the foundation of such a work.

Seleucus, in the extremities to which he was reduced, had made application to his brother Antiochus, whom he promised to invest with the sovereignty of the provinces of Asia Minor that were contiguous to Syria, provided he would join him with his troops, and act in concert with him. The young prince was then at the head of an army in those provinces; and though he was but fourteen years of age,⁶ yet, as he had all the ambition and malignity of mind that appear in men of an advanced age, he immediately accepted the offers made him, and advanced in quest of his brother, not with any intention to secure to him the enjoyment of his dominions, but to seize them for himself. His avidity was so great, and he was always so ready to seize for himself whatever came in his way, without the least regard to justice, that he acquired the surname of Hierax,⁷ which signifies a bird that pounces on all he finds, and thinks every thing good upon which he lays his talons.

When Ptolemy received intelligence that Antiochus was preparing
A. M. 3761. to act in concert with Seleucus
Ant. J. C. 243. against him, he reconciled himself with the latter, and concluded a truce with him for ten years, that he might not have both these princes for his enemies at the same time.

Antigonus Gonatas died much about this period, at the age of
A. M. 3762. eighty or eighty-three years; after Macedonia, and forty-four in Greece. He was succeeded by his son Demetrius, who reigned ten years, and made himself master of Cyrenaica and all Libya. Demetrius first married the sister of Antiochus Hierax;¹ but Olympias, the daughter of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, engaged him after the death of her husband Alexander, who was likewise her brother, to espouse her daughter Phthia. The first wife, being unable to support this injurious proceeding, retired to her brother Antiochus, and earnestly pressed him to declare war against her faithless husband: but his attention was then taken up with other views and employments.

In fact, Antiochus still continued his military preparations, as if he designed to assist his brother, in pursuance of the treaty between them; but his real intention was to dethrone him,² and he concealed the virulent disposition of an enemy under the name of a brother. Seleucus penetrated his scheme, and immediately passed mount Taurus, in order to check his progress. Antiochus founded his pretext on the promise which had been made him of the sovereignty of the provinces of Asia Minor,³ as a compensation for assisting his brother against Ptolemy; but Seleucus, who then saw himself disengaged from that war without the aid of his brother, did not conceive himself obliged to perform that promise. Antiochus resolving to persist in his pretensions, and Seleucus refusing to allow them, it became necessary to decide the difference by arms. A battle was accordingly fought near Ancyra, in Galatia, wherein Seleucus was defeated, and escaped with the utmost difficulty from the enemy. Antiochus was also exposed to great dangers, notwithstanding his victory. The troops to whose valour he was chiefly indebted for it, were a body of Gauls whom he had taken into his pay, most probably some of those who had settled in Galatia. These traitors, upon a confused report that Seleucus had been killed in the action, had formed a resolution to destroy Antiochus, persuading themselves that they should be absolute masters of Asia, after the death of those two princes. Antiochus, therefore, was obliged, for his own preservation, to distribute all the money of the army among them.

Eumenes,⁴ a prince of Pergamus, being desirous of taking advantage of this conjuncture, advanced with all his forces against Antiochus and the Gauls, in full expectation to ruin them both, in consequence of their division. The imminent danger to which Antiochus was then exposed, obliged him to make a new treaty with the Gauls, wherein he stipulated to renounce the title of their master, which he had before assumed, for that of their ally: and he also entered into a league offensive and defensive with that people. This treaty, however, did not prevent Eumenes from attacking them; and as he came upon them in such a sudden and unexpected manner as did not allow them any time to recover after their fatigues, or to furnish themselves with new recruits, he obtained a victory over them, which cost him but little, and laid all Asia Minor open to him.

Eumenes,⁵ after this fortunate event, abandoned himself to intemperance and excess at his table, and died after a reign of twenty years. As he left no children, he was succeeded by Attalus, his cousin-german, who was the son of Attalus, his father's younger brother. This prince was

A. M. 3763. Ant. J. C. 241. wise and valiant, and perfectly qualified to preserve the conquests that he inherited. He entirely reduced the Gauls, and then established himself so effectually in his dominions, that he took upon himself the title of king; for though his predecessors had enjoyed all the power, they had never hitherto ventured to assume the title of sovereigns. Attalus, therefore, was the first of his house who took it upon him, and transmitted it, with his dominions, to his posterity, who enjoyed it to the third generation.

Whilst Eumenes, and, after him, Attalus, were seizing the provinces of the Syrian empire in the West, Theodotus and Arsaces were following their example in the East. The latter hearing that Seleucus had been slain in the battle of Ancyra,⁶ turned his arms against Hyrcania, and annexed it to Parthia, which he had already dismembered from the empire. He then erected these two provinces into a kingdom, which in the process of time, became very formidable to the empire of the Romans. Theodotus dying soon after, Arsaces made a league offensive and defensive with his son, who bore the same name, and succeeded his father in Bactria; and they mutually supported themselves in their dominions by this union. The two brothers, notwithstanding these transactions, continued the war against each other, with the most implacable warmth, not considering that while they contended with each other for the empire which their fathers had left them, the whole would be gradually wrested from them by their common enemies.

The treasure and forces of Antiochus being exhausted by the several overthrows and losses he had sustained, he was obliged to wander from one retreat to another, with the shattered remains of his party, till he was at last entirely driven out of Mesopotamia. Finding, therefore, that there was no place in all the empire of Syria, where he could possibly continue in safety, he retired for refuge to Ariarathe, king of Cappadocia, whose daughter he had espoused. Ariarathe, notwithstanding this alliance, was soon weary of entertaining a son-in-law who became a burden to him; for which reason he determined to destroy him. Antiochus, being informed of his design, avoided the danger by a speedy retreat into Egypt; where he rather chose to deliver himself up to Ptolemy, the professed enemy of his house, than to trust a brother whom he had so highly offended. He, however, had reason to repent of this proceeding, for immediately after his arrival in Egypt, Ptolemy caused him to be seized and imprisoned under a strong guard, and detained him several years in that confinement, till at last he found means to escape by the assistance of a courtesan; but as he was quitting that kingdom he had the misfortune to be assassinated by a band of robbers.

Ptolemy, in the mean time, devoted the sweets of peace to the cultivation of the sciences in his dominions, and the enlargement of his father's library at Alexandria with all sorts of books: but as a proper collection could not well be made without an able librarian, to whose care it would be likewise necessary to consign them, Evergetes,⁷ upon the death of Zenodotus, who had held that office from the time of Ptolemy Soter, the grandfather of that prince, sent to Athens for Eratosthenes, the Cyrenean, who was then in great reputation, and had been educated by Callimachus, a native of the same country. He was a man of universal learning; but none of his works have been transmitted to us, except his catalogue of the kings of Thebes in Egypt, with the years of their respective reigns, from Menes or Misraim, who first peopled Egypt after the deluge, to the Trojan war. This catalogue contains a succession of thirty-eight kings, and is still to be seen in Syncellus.

When Seleucus saw himself extricated from the troubles his brother had occasioned, his first cares were employed in the re-establishment of order and tranquillity at home; and when he had accomplished this he turned his thoughts to the reduction of the provinces of the East which had revolted from him. This last attempt, however was not attended with success; for Arsaces had been allowed too much time to strengthen himself in his usurpation. Seleucus, therefore, after many ineffectual endeavours to recover those territories, was obliged to discontinue his enterprise in a dishonourable manner. He, perhaps, might have succeeded better in time, if new commotions, which had been excited in his dominions during his absence, had not compelled him to make a speedy return, in order to suppress them. This furnished Arsaces with a new opportunity of establishing his power so effectually, that all future efforts were incapable of shaking it.

Seleucus,¹ however, made a new attempt, as soon as his affairs would admit; but this second expedition proved more unfortunate than the first: for he was not only defeated, but taken prisoner by Arsaces, in a great battle. The Parthians celebrated, for many succeeding years, the anniversary of this victory, which they considered as the first day of their liberty, though in reality it was the first of their slavery; for the world never produced greater tyrants than those Parthian kings to whom they were subjected. The Macedonian yoke, if they had continued to submit to it, would have been much more supportable than their oppressive government. Arsaces now began to assume the title of king, and firmly established this empire of the East, which, in process of time, counterpoised the Roman power, and became a barrier which all the armies of that people were incapable of forcing. All the kings who succeeded Arsaces made it an indispensable law, and counted it an honour, to be called by his name; in the same manner as the kings of Egypt retained that of Ptolemy, as long as the race of Ptolemy Soter governed that kingdom. Arsaces raised himself to a throne, from the lowest condition of life, and became as memorable among the Parthians, as Cyrus had been among the Persians, or Alexander among the Macedonians, or Romulus among the Romans.² This verifies that passage in holy Scripture, which declares,³ "that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."

Onias,⁴ the high-priest of the Jews, had neglected to send to Ptolemy A. M. 373. Ant. J. C. 230. lemy the usual tribute of twenty talents, which his predecessors had always paid to the kings of Egypt, as a testimonial of the homage they rendered to that crown. The king sent Athenion, one of his courtiers, to Jerusalem, to demand the payment of the arrears, which then amounted to a great sum; and to threaten the Jews, in case of refusal, with a body of troops, who should be commissioned to expel them from their country, and divide it among themselves. The alarm was very great at Jerusalem on this occasion, and it was thought necessary to send a deputation to the king, in the person of Joseph, the nephew of Onias, who, though in the prime of his youth, was universally esteemed for his prudence, probity, and justice. Athenion, during his continuance at Jerusalem, had conceived a great regard for his character, and as he set out for Egypt before him, he promised to render him all the good offices in his power with the king. Joseph followed him in a short time, and on his way met with several of the most considerable persons of Coele-syria and Palestine, who were also going to Egypt, with an intention to offer terms for farming the great revenues of those provinces. As the equipage of Joseph was far from being so magnificent as theirs, they treated him with little respect, and considered him as a person of no great capacity. Joseph concealed his dissatisfaction at their behaviour, but drew from the conversation that passed between them, all the information he could desire, with relation to the affair that brought them to court, without seeming to have any particular view in the curiosity which he expressed.

When they arrived at Alexandria, they were informed that the king had taken a progress to Memphis, and Joseph was the only person among them who set out to wait upon that monarch, without losing a moment's time. He had the good fortune to meet him as he was returning from Memphis, with the queen and Athenion in his chariot. The king, who had been highly prepossessed in his favour by Athenion, was extremely delighted to see him, and invited him into his chariot. Joseph, to excuse his uncle, represented the infirmities of his great age, and the natural tardiness of his disposition, in such an engaging manner, as satisfied Ptolemy, and created in him an extraordinary esteem for the advocate who had so effectually pleaded the cause of that pontiff. He ordered him an apartment in the royal palace of Alexandria, and allowed him a place at his table.

When the appointed day came for purchasing, by auction, the privilege of farming the revenues of the provinces, the companions of Joseph in his journey to Egypt, offered no more than 8000 talents for the provinces of Coele-syria, Phenicia, Judea, and Samaria. Joseph, who had discovered, in the conversation that passed between them in his presence, that this purchase was worth double the sum they offered, reproached them for depreciating the king's revenues in that manner, and offered twice as much as they had done. Ptolemy was well satisfied to see his revenues so considerably increased; but being apprehensive that the person who proffered so large a sum, would be in no condition to pay it, he asked Joseph what security he would give him for the performance of his agreement? The Jewish deputy calmly replied, that he had such persons to offer for his security on that occasion, as he was certain his majesty could have no objections to. Upon being ordered to mention them, he named the king and queen themselves; and added, that they would be his securities to each other. The king could not avoid smiling at this little pleasantry, which put him into so good a humour, that he allowed him to farm the revenues without any other security than his verbal promise for payment. Joseph acted in that station for the space of ten years, to the mutual satisfaction of the court and provinces. His rich competitors, who had farmed those revenues before, returned home in the utmost confusion, and had reason to be sensible, that a magnificent equipage is a very inconsiderable indication of merit.

King Demetrius died,⁵ about this time, in Macedonia, and left a son, A. M. 377. Ant. J. C. 232. named Philip, in an early state of minority; for which reason his guardianship was assigned to Antigonus, who, having espoused the mother of his pupil, ascended the throne, and reigned for the space of twelve years. He was magnificent in promises, but extremely frugal in performance, which occasioned his being surnamed Doson.⁶

Five or six years after this period,⁷ Seleucus Callinicus, who for some time had continued in a state of captivity in Parthia, died in that country by a fall from his horse. Arsaces had always treated him as a king during his confinement. His wife was Laodice, the sister of Andromachus, one of his generals, and he had two sons and a daughter by that marriage. He espoused his daughter to Mithridates, king of Pontus, and consigned Phrygia to her for her dowry. His sons were Seleucus and Antiochus, the former of whom, surnamed Ceraunus, succeeded him in the throne.

We are now arrived at the period wherein the republic of the Achæans begins to appear with lustre in history, and is in a condition to sustain wars, particularly against that of the Lacedæmonians. It will, therefore, be necessary for me to represent the present state of those two republics; and I shall begin with that of the Achæans.

SECTION II. THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF THE ACHÆANS. ARATUS DELIVERS SICYON FROM TYRANNY. THE CHARACTER OF THAT YOUNG GRECIAN. HE IS ENABLED, BY THE LIBERALITIES OF PTOLEMY EUERGETES, TO CHECK A SEDITION READY TO BREAK OUT IN SICYON. TAKES CORINTH FROM ANTIGONUS, KING OF MACEDONIA. PREVAILS ON THE CITIES OF MEGARA, TRAZENE, EPIDAUROS, AND MEGALAPOLIS, TO ACCEDE TO THE ACHÆAN LEAGUE; BUT IS NOT SUCCESSFUL WITH RESPECT TO ARGOS.

THE republic of the Achæans was not considerable at first, either for the number of its troops,¹ the immensity of its riches, or the extent of its territory, but derived its power from the great reputation it acquired for the virtues of probity, justice, love of liberty; and this reputation was very ancient. The Crotonians and Sybarites adopted the laws and customs of the Achæans, for the re-establishment of good order in their cities. The Lacedæmonians and Thebans had such an esteem for their virtue, that they chose them, after the celebrated battle of Leuctra, as umpires of the differences which subsisted between them.

The government of this republic was democratical, that is to say, in the hands of the people. It preserved its liberty to the times of Philip and Alexander; but under those princes, and in the reigns of those who succeeded them, it was either in subjection to the Macedonians, who had made themselves masters of Greece, or else was oppressed by cruel tyrants.

It was composed of twelve cities,² in Peloponnesus, but all together not equal to a single one of considerable rank. This republic did not signalize herself immediately by any thing great and remarkable, because, amongst all her citizens, she produced none of any distinguished merit. The sequel will discover the extraordinary change which a single man was capable of introducing among them by his great qualities. After the death of Alexander, this little state was involved in all the calamities inseparable from discord. The spirit of patriotism no longer prevailed among them, and each city was solely attentive to its particular interest. Their state had lost its former solidity, because they changed their master as often as Macedonia became subject to new sovereigns. They first submitted to Demetrius; after which to Cassander; and last of all to Antigonus Gonatas, who left them in subjection to tyrants of his own establishing, that they might not withdraw themselves from his authority.

Towards the beginning of the A. M. 3724. cxxvith Olympiad, about the time Ant. J. C. 280. of the death of Ptolemy Soter, the father of Philadelphus, and the expedition of Pyrrhus into Italy, the republic of the Achæans resumed their former customs, and renewed their ancient concord. The inhabitants of Patræ and Dyme laid the foundations of this happy change. The tyrants were expelled from the cities, which then united as in former times, and constituted no more than one body of a republic: all affairs were decided by a public council: the registers were committed to a common secretary; the assembly had two presidents, who were nominated by the cities in their respective turns; but it was soon thought advisable to reduce them to one.

The good order which reigned in this little republic, where freedom and equality, with a love of justice and the public good, were the fundamental principles of their government, drew into their community several neighbouring cities, who received their laws, and associated themselves into their privileges. Sicyon was one of the first that acceded in this manner, by means of Aratus, one of its citizens, whom, in the sequel, we shall see acting a very great part, and becoming very illustrious.

Sicyon,¹ which had long groaned under the yoke of her tyrants, had lately attempted to shake it off, by placing Clinias, one of her first and bravest citizens, at her head; and the government already began to flourish and assume a better form, when Abantidas, in order to seize the tyranny into his own hands found means to get rid of Clinias. Some of his relations and friends he expelled from the city; and took off others by death: he also searched for Aratus the son of Clinias, who was then but seven years of age, in order to destroy him; but the infant escaped, with some other persons, amid the disorder that filled the house when his father was killed; and as he was wandering about the city, in the utmost consternation and distress, he accidentally entered unseen into a house which belonged to the tyrant's sister.² This lady was naturally generous, and as she also believed that this destitute infant had taken refuge under her roof by the impulse of some deity, she carefully concealed him; and when night came caused him to be secretly conveyed to Argos.

Aratus, being thus preserved from so imminent a danger, conceived in his soul from henceforth an implacable aversion to tyrants, which always increased with his age. He was educated with the utmost care by some hospitable friends of his father at Argos.

The new tyranny of Sicyon had passed through several hands in a short time, when Aratus, who began to arrive at a state of manhood, was solicitous to deliver his country entirely from oppression. He was greatly respected, as well for his birth as his courage, which was accompanied with a gravity superior to his age, and a strong and clear understanding. These qualities, which were well known at that time, caused the exiles from Sicyon to cast their eyes upon him in a peculiar manner, and to consider him as their chief resource, and a person destined to be their future deliverer; in which conjecture they were not deceived.

Aratus, who was then in the twentieth year of his age, formed a confederacy against Nicocles, who was A. M. 3752. Ant. J. C. 252 tyrant at that time; and though the spies, whom the latter sent to Argos, kept a vigilant eye on his conduct, he concealed his design so well, he pursued his measures with so much prudence and secrecy, that he scaled the walls of Sicyon, and entered the city by night. The tyrant was fortunate enough to secure himself a retreat through subterranean passages; and when the people assembled in a tumultuous manner, without knowing what had been transacted, a herald cried with a loud voice, that "Aratus, the son of Clinias, invited the citizens to resume their liberty." Upon which the crowd immediately flocked to the palace of the tyrant, and burned it to ashes in a few moments; but not a single man was killed or wounded on either side; the good genius of Aratus not suffering an action of this nature to be polluted with the blood of his citizens; in which circumstance he made his joy and triumph consist. He then recalled all those who had been banished, who were no fewer than 500.

Sicyon then began to enjoy some repose, but Aratus was not fully relieved from inquietude and perplexity. With respect to the situation of affairs without, he was sensible that Antigonus cast a jealous eye on the city, and had meditated expedients for making himself master of it, from the time of its having recovered its liberty. He beheld the seeds of sedition and discord sown within, by those who had been banished, and was extremely apprehensive of their effect. He imagined, therefore, that the safest and most prudent conduct in this delicate juncture, would be to unite Sicyon in the Achæan league, in which he easily succeeded: and this was one of the greatest services he was capable of rendering his country.

The power of the Achæans was indeed but inconsiderable; for, as I have already observed, they were only masters of three very small cities. Their country was neither good nor rich, and they inhabited a coast which had neither ports nor any other maritime stations of security. But with all this mediocrity and seeming weakness, they of all people made it most evident, that the forces of the Greeks could be always invincible when under good order and discipline, and with a prudent and experienced general at the head of them. Thus did those Achæans (who were so inconsiderable in comparison of the ancient power of Greece,) by constantly adhering to good counsels, and continuing strictly united together, without blasting the merit of their fellow-citizens with the malignant breath of envy; not only maintain their liberties, amidst so many potent cities, and such a number of tyrants, but restored freedom and safety to most of the Grecian states.

Aratus, after he had engaged his city in the Achæan league, entered himself among the cavalry, and was not a little esteemed by the generals, for the promptitude and vivacity which he discovered in the execution of their orders: for though he had infinitely contributed to the power and credit of the league, by strengthening it with his own reputation and all the forces of his country, he yet appeared as submissive as the meanest soldier to the general of the Achæans, notwithstanding the obscurity of the city from whence that officer was selected for such an employment. This is certainly an excellent example for young princes and noblemen, when they serve in armies, which will teach them to forget their birth, on those occasions, and to demand respect only from their exact submission to the orders of their commanders.

The conduct and character of Aratus were the constant subject of admiration. He was naturally polite and obliging; his sentiments were great and noble; and he entirely devoted himself to the good of the state, without any interested views. He was an implacable enemy to tyrants, and regulated his friendship and enmity by the public utility. He was qualified, in many particulars, to appear at the head of affairs; his expressions were always proper; his thoughts just; and even his silence judicious. He conducted himself with a complacency of temper, in all differences that arose in any deliberations of moment, and had no superior in the happy art of contracting friendships and alliances. He had a wonderful facility in forming enterprises against an enemy; in making his designs with impenetrable secrecy; and in executing them happily by his patience and intrepidity. It must, however, be acknowledged, that this celebrated Aratus did not seem to be the same man at the head of an army; nothing could then be discovered in him but dilatoriness, irresolution, and timidity; whilst every prospect of danger was insupportable to him. Not that he really wanted courage and boldness, but these qualities seemed to be benumbed by the greatness of the execution, and he was only timorous on certain occasions and at intervals. It was from this disposition of his, that all Peloponnesus was filled with the trophies of his conqueror, and the monuments of his own defeats. In this manner, says Polybius, has nature compounded different and contrary qualities together, not only in the bodies of men, but even in their minds; and hence it is that we are to account for the surprising diversity we frequently perceive in the same persons. On some occasions they appear lively, heroic, and undaunted; and at others, all their vigour, vivacity, and resolution entirely abandon them.

I have already observed, that those citizens who had been banished, gave Aratus great perplexity. His disquiet was occasioned by their claim to the land and houses which they possessed before their exile; the greatest part of which had been consigned to other persons, who afterwards sold them, and disappeared upon the expulsion of the tyrant. It was reasonable that these exiles should be reinstated in their former possessions after their recall from banishment, and they made application to that effect with all imaginable importunity. On the other hand, the greatest part of what they claimed had been alienated to fair purchasers, who consequently expected to be reimbursed, before they delivered up such houses and lands to the claimants. The pretensions and complaints on this occasion were vigorously urged on both sides, and Sicyon was in the utmost danger of being ruined by a civil war which seemed inevitable. Never was any affair more perplexing than this. Aratus was incapable of reconciling the two parties, whose demands were equally equitable, and it was impossible to satisfy them both at the same time, without expending very considerable sums, which he was in no condition to furnish. In this emergency, he could think of no resource but the goodness and liberality of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, which he himself had experienced on the following occasion.

That prince was extremely curious in portraits and other paintings: Aratus, therefore, who was an excellent judge of such performances, collected all the works of the greatest masters which he could possibly procure, especially those of Pampylus and Melanthus, and sent them to the king. Sicyon was still in great reputation for the arts, and painting in particular; the true taste of which was preserved there in all its ancient purity. It is even said, that Apelles, who was then admired by all the world, had been at Sicyon, where he frequented the schools of these two painters, to whom he gave a talent (equal to 1000 crowns,) not so much to acquire perfection in the art from them, as in order to obtain a share in their great reputation. When Aratus had reinstated his city in its former liberties, he destroyed all the pictures of the tyrants; but when he came to that of Aristaratus, who reigned in the time of Philip, and whom the painter had represented in the attitude of standing in a triumphant chariot, he hesitated a long time whether he should deface it or not; for all the capital scholars of Melanthus had contributed to the completion of that piece, and it had even been touched by the pencil of Apelles. This work was so inimitable in its kind, that Aratus could not avoid being affected with its beauties; but his aversion for tyrants prevailed over his admiration of the picture, and he accordingly ordered it to be destroyed.

The fine taste of Aratus for painting had recommended him to the good graces of Ptolemy; and he, therefore, thought he might take the liberty to implore the generosity of that prince, in the melancholy situation to which he was then reduced. With this view he embarked for Egypt; but was exposed to many dangers and disappointments, before he could arrive in that kingdom. He had a long audience of Ptolemy, who esteemed him the better the more he knew him; and presented him with 150 talents for the benefit of his city. Aratus carried away forty talents when he set out for Peloponnesus, and the king remitted him the remainder in separate payments.

His fortunate return occasioned universal joy in Sicyon, and he was invested with full power to decide the pretensions of the exiles, and regulate the partitions to be made in their favour. But as a wise politician, who is not anxious to engross the decision of all affairs to himself, and is not afraid of diminishing his reputation by admitting others to share it with him, he firmly refused the honours designed him, and nominated for his coadjutors fifteen citizens of the greatest repute, in conjunction with whom he at last restored harmony and peace among the inhabitants, and refunded to the several purchasers all the sums they had expended for the lands and houses they had actually bought. It has always been observed, that glory pursues those who are industrious to decline it. Aratus, therefore, who thought himself in need of good counsels to assist him in the determination of this important affair (and persons of the greatest merit always entertain the same diffidence of themselves,) had all the honour of this affair. His conduct was infinitely applauded; statues were erected to him, and the people, by public inscriptions, declared him the father of the people and the deliverer of his country. These are qualities that infinitely transcend those of the most celebrated conquerors.

A success so illustrious gave Antigonus jealousy, and even fear; in consequence of which, at a public entertainment, he artfully enhanced the merit and capacity of this young man by extraordinary praises, possibly with an intention either to gain him over to his own interest, or to render him an object of suspicion to Ptolemy. He insinuated, in terms sufficiently intelligible, that Aratus, having discovered by his own experience, the vanity of the Egyptian pride, intended to attach himself to his service; and that he, therefore, was resolved to employ him in his affairs; he concluded this train of artifice with entreating all the lords of his court, who were then present, to regard him in future as their friend. The particulars of this discourse were soon repeated to Ptolemy, who was not a little surprised and afflicted when he heard them: and he complained to Aratus of this injurious charge: but the latter easily justified himself to that monarch.

Aratus having been elected general of the Achæans, for the first time ravaged Locris, and all the territory of Calydon, and advanced with a body of 10,000 men to succour the Boeotians; but was so unfortunate as not to arrive among them till after the battle of Chæroneia,¹ in which they were defeated by the Ætolians.

Eight years after this transaction, he was elected general of the Ant. J. C. 244. Achæans a second time, and rendered great service to all Greece, by an action which Plutarch considers as equal to any of the most illustrious enterprises of the Grecian leaders.

The isthmus of Corinth, which separates the two seas, unites the continent of Greece with that of Peloponnesus; the citadel also of Corinth, distinguished by the name of Acro-Corinthus, is situated on a high mountain, exactly in the middle of those two continents, which are there divided from each other by a very narrow neck of land; by which means this fortress, when furnished with a good garrison, cuts off all communication by land and sea, from the inner part of the isthmus, and renders the person who possesses it, with a good body of troops, absolute master of all Greece. Philip called this citadel the shackles of Greece, and as such it was an object of desire and jealousy to all the neighbouring states, and especially to kings and princes, who consequently were desirous of seizing it for their own use.

Antigonus, after having for a long time, and with extreme anxiety, sought an opportunity to render himself master of this place, was so fortunate as to carry it by surprise, and made no scruple to congratulate himself as much on this unexpected success, as on a real triumph. Aratus, on the other hand, entertained hopes of wresting this fortress from him, in his turn; and while all his thoughts were employed to that effect, an accidental circumstance furnished him with an opportunity of accomplishing his design.

Erginus, an inhabitant of Corinth, had taken a journey to Sicyon, in order to transact some affairs in that city; and had there contracted an intimate acquaintance with a banker, who was a particular friend of Aratus. As the citadel of Corinth happened to be the subject of one of their conversations, Erginus told his friend, that as he often went to visit his brother Diocles, who was a soldier of the garrison, he had observed on the steepest side, a small winding path hewn in the rock, which led to a part of the wall of the citadel which was very low. The banker was very attentive to this account, and, with a smile, desired his friend to tell him, whether he and his brother would be disposed to gain a large sum of money, and make their fortunes? Erginus immediately comprehended the bent of this question, and promised to sound his brother Diocles on that head. Some few days after this conversation he returned to the banker, and engaged to conduct Aratus to that part of the mountain where the height of the wall did not exceed fifteen feet, adding at the same time, that himself and his brother would assist him in executing the rest of his enterprise. Aratus promised, on his part, to give them sixty talents, if the affair should happen to succeed; but as it became requisite to deposit that sum in the hands of the banker, for the security of the two brothers, and as Aratus was neither master of so many talents, nor had any inclination to borrow them, for fear of raising suspicion by that proceeding, and letting his design get wind, he pledged all his gold and silver plate, with his wife's jewels, to the banker, as a security for the promised sum.

Aratus had so great a soul, says Plutarch, and such an ardour for great actions, that when he considered with himself, how universally Epaminondas and Phocion had been reputed the most worthy and just men in all Greece, for refusing the presents that had been offered to them; and preferring virtue to all the riches in the world, he was anxious to surpass them, and to refine upon their generosity and disinterested spirit. And indeed there is a wide difference between the mere refusal of presents, and the sacrifice of a person's whole fortune for the service of the public. Aratus parted with all his fortune, and that too without its being known, for an enterprise, wherein he alone was exposed to all the danger. Where is the man, cries Plutarch, amidst the enthusiasm into which this amiable action had wrought him, who can possibly be incapable of admiring so uncommon and surprising an instance of magnanimity! Who, even at this time, can forbear to interest himself in this great exploit, and to combat in imagination by the side of so great a man, who paid so dearly for so extraordinary a danger, and pledged the most valuable part of his fortune, only to procure an opportunity of advancing into the midst of his enemies in the dead of night, when he knew he should be compelled to fight for his own life, without any other security than the hopes of performing a noble action.

It may justly be remarked on this occasion, that the taste for glory, disinterestedness, and the public good, were perpetuated among the Greeks, by the remembrance of those great men who had distinguished themselves in past ages by such glorious sentiments.

This is the great advantage which attends history written like that of the Greeks, and the principal benefit to be derived from it.

The preparations for the enterprise were thwarted by a variety of obstructions, any one of which seemed sufficient to have rendered it ineffectual; but when all these were at last surmounted, Aratus ordered his troops to pass the night under arms. He then selected 400 men, most of whom were unacquainted with the design he intended to execute: they were all furnished with scaling-ladders, and he led them directly to the gates of the city by the walls of Juno's temple. The sky was then unclouded, and the moon shone extremely bright, which filled the adventurers with just apprehensions of being discovered. But in a little time a dark fog arose very fortunately from the sea, and shed a thick gloom over all the adjacent parts of the city. All the troops then seated themselves on the ground, to take off their shoes, as well to lessen the noise, as to facilitate their ascent by the scaling-ladders, from which they should not then be so liable to slip. In the mean time, Erginus, with seven resolute young men, habited like travellers, passed through the gate without being perceived, and killed the sentinel and guards who were there upon duty. The ladders were then fixed on the wall, and Aratus ascended with 100 of his boldest troops, giving orders to the rest to follow him as fast as they were able; and having drawn up his ladders, he descended into the city, and marched at the head of his 100 men, towards the citadel, with the utmost joy, as having already succeeded by passing undiscovered.

As they were proceeding in their march, they saw a small guard of four men, with lights in their hands, by whom they were not perceived, because the darkness of the night shrouded them from their view. Aratus and his men shrunk back against some walls and ruins that were near, where they disposed themselves into an ambuscade, from whence they started as the four men were passing by, and killed three of their number. The fourth, who received a deep wound on his head, fled from the place, and cried out as loud as he was able, that the enemies were entered the city. The trumpets in a moment sounded the alarm, and all the inhabitants crowded together at the noise. The streets were already filled with people, who flocked from all quarters, and blazing with innumerable lights which were immediately set up in every part of the city, and also on the ramparts of the castle, whilst every place resounded with confused and undistinguishable cries.

Aratus still continued his progress, notwithstanding the alarm, and endeavoured to climb the steep rocks: he made way, however, at first, very slowly, and with great labour, because he had missed the path that led to the wall through numberless windings, which it was almost impracticable to trace out. While he was thus perplexed, the clouds dispersed, as if a miracle had interposed in his favour: the moon then appeared in its former brightness, and discovered all the intricacies of the path, till he arrived on the spot of ground at the foot of the wall, which had been formerly described to him. The skies were then happily covered with clouds again, and the moon was once more immersed in darkness.

The 300 soldiers whom Aratus had left without, near the temple of Juno, having entered the city, which was then filled with confusion and tumult, and also illuminated with a prodigious number of lights; and not being able to find the path which Aratus had taken, drew up into a close body, under a bending rock which shaded them at the bottom of the precipice, where they waited in the utmost anxiety and distress. Aratus was then skirmishing on the ramparts of the citadel, and the noise of the combatants might easily be heard below; but as the sound was repeated by the echoes of the neighbouring mountains, it was impossible to distinguish the place from whence it proceeded. Those soldiers, therefore, not knowing which way to bend their course, Archelaus, who commanded the troops of king Antigonus, having drawn out a considerable number of troops, mounted the ascent with loud shouts, and a great blast of trumpets, with an intention to assault Aratus in his rear, and in his march passed by those 300 men without perceiving them; but when he advanced a little beyond them, they started from the place of their concealment, as if they had been planted expressly in ambuscade, and fell upon him with great resolution, killing all who first came in their way. The rest of the troops, and even Archelaus himself, were then seized with such a consternation, that they fled from their enemies, who continued to attack them in their retreat, till they had all dispersed themselves in the city.

This defeat was immediately succeeded by the arrival of Erginus, who had been sent by those that were fighting on the walls of the citadel, to acquaint them that Aratus was engaged with the enemies, who made a very vigorous defence, and was in great need of immediate assistance. The troops that moment desired him to be their conductor; and as they mounted the rocks, they proclaimed their approach by loud cries, to animate their friends, and redouble their ardour. The beams of the moon, which was then in the full, played upon their armour, and, in conjunction with the length of the way by which they ascended, made them appear more numerous, while the midnight silence rendered the echoes much more strong and audible; by which means their shouts seemed those of a much greater body of men than they really were. When they at last had joined their companions, they charged their enemies with a vigour that soon dispersed them, upon which they posted themselves on the wall, and became absolute masters of the citadel by break of day; so that the sun's first rays saw them victorious. The rest of their troops arrived at the same time from Sicyon; and the Corinthians, after they had willingly thrown open the city gates to receive them, assisted them in making the troops of Antigonus prisoners of war.

Aratus, when he had effectually secured his victory descended from the citadel into the theatre which was then crowded with a vast concourse of people, drawn thither by their curiosity to see him, and to hear him speak. After he had posted his Achæans on each side of the avenues of the theatre, he advanced from the bottom of the stage completely armed, with a countenance completely changed by his want of rest and the long fatigue he had sustained. The bold and manly joy with which this extraordinary success had inspired him, was obscured by the languor his extreme weakness and decay of spirits had occasioned. The moment he appeared in the theatre, all the people were emulous to testify their profound respect and gratitude, by repeated applauses and acclamations. Aratus, in the mean time, shifted his lance from his left to his right hand; and then leaning his body and one knee a little against it, he continued for some time in that posture.

When the whole theatre was at last silent, he exerted all the vigour he had left, and acquainted them, in a long discourse, with the particulars of the Achæan league, exhorted them to accede to it, and at the same time delivered to them the keys of their city, which, till then, had never been in their power from the time of Philip. As to the captains of Antigonus, he restored Archelaus, whom he had taken prisoner, to his liberty; but caused Theophrastus to suffer death, for refusing to quit the city.

Aratus made himself master of the temple of Juno, and of the port of Lechæum, where he seized twenty-five of the king's ships. He also took 500 war horses, and 400 Syrians, whom he afterwards sold. The Achæans kept the citadel, in which they placed a garrison of 400 men.

An action so bold and successful as this could not fail to be productive of very fortunate events. The inhabitants of Megara quitted the party of Antigonus and joined Aratus. Their example was soon followed by the people of Træzene and Epidaurus, who acceded to the Achæan league.

Aratus also brought Ptolemy, king of Egypt, into the confederacy, by assigning the superintendence of the war to him, and electing him generalissimo of their troops by land and sea. This event gained him so much credit and reputation among the Achæans, that as the nomination of the same man to the post of captain-general for a succession of years was expressly prohibited by the laws, Aratus was, however, elected every other year, and he, either by his counsels or personal conduct, enjoyed that command without any discontinuation: for it was evident to all mankind, that neither riches nor the friendship of kings, no, nor even the particular advantages of Sicyon, his native place, nor any other consideration whatever, had the least preference in his mind, to the welfare and aggrandizement of the Achæans. He was persuaded, that all weak cities resemble those parts of the body which thrive and exist only by their mutual union, and infallibly perish when once they are separated; as the sustenance by which they subsist is discontinued from that moment. In like manner cities soon sink into ruin, when the social bands which connect them are once dissolved; but they are always seen to flourish, and improve in power and prosperity, when they become parts of a large body, and are associated by a unity of interest. A common precaution then reigns through the whole, and is the happy source of life, from whence all the vigour that supports them is derived.

All the views of Aratus, and all his enterprises, while he continued in his employment, tended entirely to the expulsion of the Macedonians out of Peloponnesus, and the abolition of all kinds of tyranny; the re-establishment of the cities in their ancient liberty, and the exercise of the laws. These were the only motives which prompted him to oppose the enterprises of Antigonus Gonatas, during the life of that prince.

He also pursued the same conduct with respect to Demetrius,¹ A. M. 3762. who succeeded Antigonus, and Ant. J. C. 242 reigned for the space of ten years.

The Ætoliars had at first joined Antigonus Gonatas, with an intention to destroy the Achaean league; but embroiled themselves with Demetrius his successor, who declared war against them.

A. M. 3770. The Achæans, forgetting on this
Ant. J. C. 234. occasion the ill treatment they had received from that people, marched to their assistance, by which means a strict union was re-established between them, which became very advantageous to all the neighbouring cities.

Illyria was then governed by several petty kings, who subsisted chiefly by rapine, and exercised a sort of piracy against all the neighbouring countries. Agron, the son of Pleurates, Scerdilædes, Demetrius of Pharus, so called from a city of Illyria, subject to him, were the petty princes who infested all the neighbouring parts; and attacked Corcyra, and the Acarnanians in particular.

A. M. 3776. Teuta reigned after the death of her husband Agron, who had ended his days by intemperance, and left a young son, named Pinæus. These people, harassed in the manner I have mentioned, had recourse to the Ætoliars and Achæans, who readily undertook their defence; though their good services were repaid only with ingratitude. The people of Corcyra made an alliance with the Illyrians, soon after this event, and received Demetrius of Pharus, with his garrison, into their city.

The Romans were so offended at the piracies with which this people infested their citizens and merchants, that they sent an embassy to Teuta, to complain of those injurious proceedings. That princess caused one of the ambassadors to be slain, and the other to be thrown into prison, which provoked the Romans to declare war against her, to revenge so outrageous an insult. The two consuls, L. Posthumius Albinus, and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, set out with a commission to invade Illyria by land and sea. The people of Corcyra, in concert with Demetrius of Pharus, delivered up to the consul Fulvius the garrison they had received into their city; and the Romans, after they had reinstated Corcyra in its former liberties, advanced into Illyria, and conquered great part of the country; and consigned several cities to Demetrius, as a compensation for his treacherous conduct in their favour.

Teuta, reduced to the utmost extremity, implored peace of the Romans, and obtained it, on her engagement to pay a yearly tribute, and deliver up all Illyria, except a few places which she was permitted to enjoy; but the most beneficial article for the Greeks was, her being restrained from sailing beyond the city of Lissus with more than two small vessels, and even those were not to carry any arms. The other petty kings, who seemed to have been dependent on Teuta, were comprehended in this treaty, though it expressly mentioned none but that princess.

The Romans then caused themselves to be respected in Greece by a solemn embassy, and this was the first time that their power was known in that country. They sent ambassadors to the Ætoliars and Achæans, to communicate to them the treaty they had lately concluded with the Illyrians. Others were also despatched to Corinth and Athens; and the Corinthians then declared for the first time, by a public decree, that the Romans should be admitted to celebrate the Isthmian games, with the same privileges as the Greeks. The freedom of the city was also granted them at Athens, and they were permitted to be initiated into the great mysteries.

Aratus, after the death of Demetrius, who reigned only ten years, found the dispositions of the people very favourable to his designs. Several tyrants, whom that prince had supported with all his credit, and to whom he paid large pensions, having lost their support by his death, made a voluntary resignation of the authority they had usurped over their citizens; others of them, either intimidated by the menaces of Aratus, or prevailed upon by his promises, followed their example, and he procured several considerable advantages for them all, that they might have no temptation to repent of their conduct.

Aratus, who beheld with regret the subjection of the people of Argos to the tyrant Aristomachus, undertook their deliverance; and made it a point of honour to restore liberty to that city, as a recompense for the education he had received there; and he had also considered the accession of so potent a city to the Achaean league, as highly advantageous to the common cause; but his measures to this effect were rendered unsuccessful at that time. Aristomachus was soon after slain by his domestics; and before there could be any opportunity to regulate affairs, Aristippus, a tyrant more detestable than his predecessor, seized the supreme power into his own hands, and had the dexterity to maintain himself in that usurpation, even with the consent of the Argives. But looking upon Aratus as a mortal enemy, during whose life he imagined his own would always be in danger, he resolved to destroy him by the assistance of king Antigonus Doson, who agreed to be the minister of his vengeance. He had already prepared assassins in all parts, who only waited for an opportunity of executing their bloody commission. No prince or commander can ever have a more effectual guard, than the firm and sincere affection of those they govern; for, when once the nobility and people have been accustomed not to fear their prince, but to fear for him, innumerable eyes and ears are attentive to all that passes. This Aratus was so happy as to experience in the present conjuncture.

Plutarch, on this occasion, draws a fine contrast between the troubles and anxieties of Aristippus, and the peace and tranquillity of Aratus. That tyrant, says he, who maintained such a body of troops for the security of his person, and who had shed the blood of all those of whom he entertained any dread, was incapable of enjoying a moment's repose, either by night or day. Every circumstance alarmed him; his soul was the seat of terror and anxiety, that knew no intermission; and he even trembled at his own shadow. A dreadful guard continually watched round his house with drawn swords; and as his life was perpetually in their power, he feared them more than all the rest of mankind. He never permitted them to enter his palace, but ordered them to be stationed in the porticoes which surrounded it. He drove away all his domestics the moment he had supped; after which he shut the gate of his court with his own hands, and then retired with his concubine into an upper apartment, which he entered by a trap-door. When this was let down, he placed his bed upon it, and slept, as we may suppose a man to sleep in his condition, whose soul is a perpetual prey to trouble, terror, and apprehension. The mother of his concubine removed, each night, the ladder by which he ascended into his chamber, and replaced it in its former situation the next morning. Aratus, on the other hand, who had acquired perpetual power, not by force of arms, but merely by his virtue and the effect of the laws, appeared in public with a plain robe and a mind void of fear; and whereas, among all those who possess fortresses, and maintain guards, with the additional precaution of arms, gates, and traps, as so many ramparts for their safety, few escape a violent death; Aratus, on the contrary, who always showed himself an implacable enemy to tyrants, left behind him a posterity which subsists, says Plutarch, to this day, and is still honoured and respected by all the world.

Aratus attacked the tyrant with open force, but acted with very little prudence or resolution in the first engagement, when even one of the wings of his army had defeated the enemy; for he caused a retreat to be sounded very unseasonably, and resigned the victory to the foe, which drew upon him a number of severe reproaches. He however made amends for his fault in a second battle, wherein Aristippus and above 1500 of his men lost their lives. Aratus, though he had obtained so signal a victory, and without losing one man, was however unable to make himself master of the city of Argos, or restore liberty to the inhabitants; as Agias, and the young Aristomachus, had thrown themselves with a body of the king's troops into the place.

He succeeded better with respect to the city of Megalopolis, where Lysias had usurped the supreme power. This person had none of the violent and inhuman characteristics of tyrants, and had seized the sovereignty from no other inducement than a false idea of the happiness and glory which he imagined inseparable from supreme power; but he resigned the tyranny, either through fear, or a conviction of his error, upon the remonstrances of Aratus, and caused his city to accede to the Achaean league. That league was affected to such a degree by so generous an action, that they immediately chose him for their general; and as he at first was emulous of surpassing Aratus, he engaged in several enterprises which seemed unnecessary at that juncture, and among the rest, declared war against the Lacedæmonians. Aratus employed his utmost influence to oppose him in those measures, but his endeavours were misinterpreted as the effects of envy. Lysias was elected general a second time, and then a third, and each of them commanded alternately. But when he was observed to act in opposition to his rival on all occasions, and, without the least regard to decency, was continually repeating his injurious treatment of a virtue so solid and sincere as that of Aratus; it became evident that the zeal he affected was no more than a plausible outside, which concealed a dangerous ambition; and they deprived him of the command.

As the Lacedæmonians will, for the future, have a considerable share in the wars sustained by the Achæans, it seems necessary to give a brief account of the condition of that people in this place.

SECTION III.—AGIS KING OF SPARTA ATTEMPTS TO REFORM THE STATE, AND ENDEAVOURS TO REVIVE THE ANCIENT INSTITUTIONS OF LYCURGUS, IN WHICH HE PARTLY SUCCEEDS; BUT FINDS AN ENTIRE CHANGE IN SPARTA, AT HIS RETURN FROM A CAMPAIGN IN WHICH HE HAD JOINED ARATUS AGAINST THE ÆTOLIANS. HE IS AT LAST CONDEMNED TO DIE, AND EXECUTED ACCORDINGLY.

When the love of wealth had crept into the city of Sparta,¹ and had afterwards introduced luxury, avarice, indolence, effeminacy, profusion, and all those pleasures which are generally the inseparable attendants of riches: and when these had broken down all the strong barriers which the wisdom of Lycurgus had formed with the view of excluding them for ever; Sparta beheld herself fallen from her ancient glory and power, and was reduced to an abject and humble state, which continued to the reign of Agis and Leonidas, of whom we are now to treat.

Agis, the son of Eudamidas, was of the house of the Eurytionide, and the sixth descendant from Agesilaus, who made an expedition into Asia. Leonidas, the son of Cleonymus, was of the family of the Agiæ, and the eighth prince that reigned in Sparta, after Pausanias, who defeated Mardonius in the battle of Platea.

I have already related the dispute that arose in Sparta between Cleonymus and Agis,² in regard to the sovereignty, which was obtained by the latter; and he afterwards caused Pyrrhus to raise the siege of Lacedæmon. He was succeeded by his son Acrotatus, who reigned seven or eight years, and left a young son named Areus, from his grandfather. This prince was under the tuition of Leonidas, but died in a short time; upon which Leonidas rose from the regency to the throne.

Though all the Spartans had been depraved and perverted by the general corruption into which the government was fallen, this depravity and remoteness from the ancient manners of that people was most conspicuous in the conduct of Leonidas; who had resided for several years in the palaces of the satrapæ, and had for many years made his court to Seleucus; he had even espoused a wife in Asia, contrary to the laws of his country, and had afterwards employed his utmost endeavors to introduce all the pomp and pride of princes into a free country, and a government founded on moderation and justice.

Agis was the reverse of this character. He was then in the twentieth year of his age, and though he had been educated amidst riches,³ and the luxury of a house remarkable for being equally voluptuous and haughty, he, from the first, renounced all those insidious pleasures; and instead of testifying the least regard for the splendid vanities of dress, he made it his glory to appear in a plain habit, and to re-establish the public meals, baths and all the ancient discipline of Sparta. He even declared openly, "That he should not value being king, if it were not for the hopes of reviving the ancient laws and discipline of Sparta." These noble sentiments were a demonstration that Agis had formed a true notion of regal power; the most essential duty and true glory of which are derived from the establishment of good order in all the branches of a state, by giving due force to customs established by wise laws.

This discipline began to be disregarded the moment Sparta had ruined the Athenian government, and began to abound in gold. The same partition however, of lands, which had been made by Lycurgus, and the number of hereditary possessions established by him, having been preserved through all successions of descent, and each father transmitting his part in the same manner as he had received it himself; this order and equality, which had been preserved without interruption, suspended in some measure the ill effects of those other abuses which then prevailed. But as soon as this prudent institution began to be struck at, by a law which permitted every man to dispose of his house and patrimony, in his own lifetime, or bequeath them by will to whom he pleased after his death; this new law effectually sapped the best foundation of the Spartan polity. Epitades, one of the Ephori, introduced this law to avenge himself on one of his sons, whose conduct had displeased him.

It is indeed surprising, that a whole state should so easily be induced to change such an ancient and fundamental custom as this, merely to gratify the resentment of one man. The pretext for this change was undoubtedly the augmentation of paternal authority in their several families; since it was not then possessed of any motives that could ensure filial respect; the children of that community having nothing to hope or fear, as they received all alike the fortune they could expect, immediately from the state, and with an absolute independency on their parents. This domestic inconvenience, in which every father thought himself concerned, and which seemed to regard good order in all families, created strong impressions in those who had the greatest share in the administration, and rendered them incapable of considering the much greater inconveniences which would inevitably result from this change, and whose pernicious effects were soon felt by the state.⁴

This proceeding is sufficient to convince us how dangerous it is to change the ancient laws,⁵ on the basis of which a state, or community, has long subsisted; and what precautions ought to be taken against bad impressions which may arise through particular inconveniences, from which the wisest institutions cannot be exempted: how much prudence, penetration into future events, and experience, are necessary to those who take upon them to balance and compare the advantages and defects of ancient customs, with any new regulations which are proposed to be substituted in their stead.

² Josephus relates, that Agis king of Lacedæmon sent letters to Onias the high-priest of the Jews, in which he acknowledged an affinity between that people and the Lacedæmonians. The origin of this affinity is not easily to be distinguished, nor is it less difficult to reconcile the time of Agis with that of Onias.

It may be justly affirmed, that the ruin of Sparta was occasioned by this new law, which authorized the alienation of hereditary estates. The great men were daily enlarging their fortunes, by dispossessing the heirs of the estates which belonged to them; in consequence of which, all patrimonial possessions were soon engrossed by a very inconsiderable number of persons; poverty prevailed through the whole city, and sunk the people into a mean and disgraceful indolence of mind; by extinguishing that ardour for virtue and glory, which, till then, had rendered the Spartans superior to all the other states of Greece, and by infusing into the hearts of the people an insupportable envy and aversion for those who had unjustly divested them of all their possessions.

The number of native Spartans in that city was reduced to about 700; and not many more than 100 of these had preserved their family estates. All the rest were a populace overwhelmed by poverty, destitute of revenues, and excluded from a participation in honours and dignities: these acted with reluctance and indifference in wars against a foreign enemy, because they were sensible the rich would be the only gainers by their victories; in a word, they were constantly waiting for an opportunity to change the present situation of affairs, and withdraw themselves from the oppressions they sustained.

Such was the state of Sparta A. M. 3756. when Agis entertained the design Ant. J. C. 248. of redressing the flagrant abuses which then prevailed; at the same time that Aratus was employing his endeavours for the deliverance of his country. The enterprise was noble, but extremely hazardous. He observed, contrary to his expectation, that all the young men were disposed to enter into his views, while the generality of those in years, in whose minds corruption had taken the deepest root, trembled at the very name of Lycurgus and reformation. He began by conciliating his uncle Agesilaus, a man of great eloquence and reputation, but strongly possessed with the love of riches; which was the very circumstance that rendered him the more favourable to the designs of Agis. He was ready to sink under a load of debts, and hoped to discharge them without any expense to himself, by changing the form of government.

Agis then endeavoured, by his means, to bring over his own mother, who was the sister of Agesilaus. Her power was very great in the city, by the large party of friends, and the vast number of her slaves and debtors; and her credit gave her an extraordinary influence in the most important affairs. When Agis had opened his design to her, she was struck with consternation on the first glance, and employed all the arguments she could invent to dissuade him from it; but when Agesilaus joined his own reflections with those of the king, and had made his sister comprehend the advantages that would accrue to Sparta from the execution of such a design, and represented to her the glory which her family would for ever derive from it, this lady, as well as those of her sex with whom she was most intimate, being then animated by the noble ambition of the young prince, immediately changed their sentiments, and were so struck with the beauty of the project, that they themselves pressed Agis to enter upon the execution of it as soon as possible. They likewise sent to all their friends, and exhorted them to concur with him in that affair.

Appication was also made by them to the other ladies of the city, as they were very sensible that the Lacedæmonians had always expressed the greatest deference to their wives, whom they allowed to exercise more authority, in all transactions of state, than they themselves assumed in their private and domestic affairs. Most of the riches of Sparta were at that time in the hands of the women, and this proved a great obstruction to the designs of Agis. They unanimously opposed his scheme, rightly foreseeing, that the plain manner of life to was endeavouring to re-establish, and on which so many commendations were bestowed, would not only be destructive to all their luxurious pleasures, but divest them of all the honours and power they derived from their riches.

Amidst the consternation which this proposal gave them, they addressed themselves to Leonidas and conjured him, as his age gave him an ascendant over Agis, to employ his whole authority in dissuading his colleague from the accomplishment of his plan. Leonidas was very inclinable to support the rich, but as he dreaded the indignation of the people, who were desirous of this change, he could not presume to oppose Agis in an open manner, but contented himself by crossing his designs by indirect measures. He had a private conference with the magistrates, wherein he took the liberty to calumniate Agis, as a person who was offering to the poor the property of the rich, with a partition of lands, and a general abolition of debts, as a compensation to them for the tyranny he was preparing to usurp; in consequence of which proceedings, instead of forming citizens for Sparta, he was only raising a body of guards for the security of his own person.

Agis, in the mean time, having succeeded so far as to cause Lysander, who concurred with him in his views, to be elected one of the Ephori, brought into the council a decree which he himself had drawn up, the principal articles of which were these: 1. All debtors were to be discharged from their debts. 2. All the lands which extended from the valley of Pelene to mount Taygetus, and the promontory of Malea, and likewise to Selasia, should be parcelled out into 4,500 lots. 3. The lands which lay beyond those limits should be divided into 15,000 lots. 4. The latter portions were to be distributed to those inhabitants of the adjacent parts, who were in a condition to bear arms. 5. Those lands, which lay within the limits already mentioned, should be reserved for the Spartans, whose due number, which was then considerably diminished, should be recruited out of such of the neighbouring people and strangers, as had received a liberal education, and were then in the flower of their age, and not disqualified for that class by any bodily defect. 6. All these should, at the times of repast, be disposed into fifteen halls, distinguished by the name of Phiditia; the least of which should contain 200, and the largest 400: and lastly, they were all to observe the same manner of life and discipline as their ancestors.

This decree being opposed by the senators whose sentiments differed from those of Agis, Lysander caused the people to be assembled, and in the strongest terms exhorted the citizens to consent to it. He was seconded by Mandroclides, a young Spartan whose heart glowed with zeal for the public welfare; and he represented to the people, with all the energy he could possibly express, every motive that could most affect them: the respect they owed to the memory of their illustrious legislator Lycurgus; the oath their ancestors had taken, in the names of themselves and all their posterity, to preserve those sacred institutions in the most inviolable manner; the glory and honour Sparta had enjoyed, during the time she strictly adhered to them; and the infamous degeneracy into which she had sunk, ever since they had been disregarded by her: he then set forth the miserable condition of the Spartans, those ancient masters of Greece, those triumphant conquerors of Asia, those mighty sovereigns by sea and land, who once had made the Great King tremble on his throne, but were now divested of their property, their lands, and houses, by the insatiable avarice of their own citizens, who had reduced them to the lowest extremes of poverty and shameful indigence; and, what might be considered as the completion of all their calamities, had exposed them to the insult and contempt of those to whom it was their right to prescribe laws. He then concluded, with entreating them not to be so far influenced by their obsequiousness to a handful of men, who even trampled them under their feet like so many despicable slaves, as to behold, with eyes of indifference, the dignity of their city entirely degraded and lost, but to recall to their remembrance those ancient oracles, which had more than once declared, that the love of riches would prove fatal to Sparta, and occasion its total ruin.

King Agis then advanced into the middle of the assembly, and declared, after a concise discourse, (for he thought his example would have more efficacy than any words he could utter,) that he was determined to deliver up, into the common stock, all his effects and estate, which were very considerable, consisting of large tracts of arable and pasture lands, besides 600 talents in specie; and that his mother and grandmother, together with the rest of his relations and friends, who were the richest persons in Sparta, would do the same.

The magnanimity of their young prince astonished all the people, who, at the same time, were transported with joy that they at last were so happy as to behold a king worthy of Sparta. Leonidas then dropped the mask, and opposed him to the utmost of his power for as he knew it would otherwise be necessary for him to make the same offer they had heard from Agis, so he was sensible, that his citizens would not think themselves under the same obligations to him as they were to his colleague, but that when every one should have equally contributed his whole fortune to the common stock, he alone would engross all the honour of that action, who had first set the example. He therefore demanded aloud of Agis, whether he did not think that Lycurgus was a just and able man, and one who had zealously consulted the welfare of his country? Agis having replied, that he had always considered him as such;

"Where do you find then," retorted Leonidas, "that Lycurgus ever ordained an abolition of debts, or gave the freedom of Sparta to strangers? Since, on the contrary, it was his firm persuasion, that the city would never be safe till all strangers were expelled from its walls." Agis answered, "That he was not surprised that such a person as Leonidas, who had been brought up in foreign countries, and had married into the family of a Persian grandee, should be so little acquainted with Lycurgus, as not to know that he had swept away all actual and possible debts, by banishing gold and silver from the city: that, with respect to strangers, his precautions were intended against none but those who could not accommodate themselves to the manners and discipline he had established: that these were the only persons he expelled from the city, not by any hostilities against their persons, but from the mere apprehension, that their method of life, and corruption of manners, might insensibly inspire the Spartans with the love of luxury and effeminacy, and an immoderate passion for riches."

He then produced several examples of poets and philosophers, particularly Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, who, although foreigners, had been highly esteemed and honoured at Sparta, because they taught the same maxims as Lycurgus had established.

This discourse won all the common people over to the party of Agis, but the rich men ranged themselves under Leonidas, and entreated him not to abandon them: they likewise addressed themselves to the senators, who had the principal power in this affair, as they alone were qualified to examine all proposals, before they could be received and confirmed by the people; and their solicitations were so effectual, that those who had opposed the decree of Agis, carried their point by one voice: upon which Lysander, who still continued in his employment, immediately determined to proceed against Leonidas, in virtue of an ancient law, by which "each descendant from Hercules was prohibited from espousing any foreign woman; and which made it death for any Spartan to settle among strangers." Sufficient proofs of delinquency in these particulars were produced against Leonidas, and Cleombrotus was prevailed upon, at the same time, to assist in the prosecution, and demand the crown, as being himself of the royal race, and the son-in-law of Leonidas.

Leonidas was so confounded at this proceeding and so apprehensive of the event, that he took sanctuary in the temple of Minerva, called Chalciceos, upon which the wife of Cleombrotus, quitting her husband, became a suppliant with her father. Leonidas was summoned to appear; but as he refused to comply, he was divested of his royalty, and it was then transferred to his son-in-law Cleombrotus.

Lysander quitted his employment about this period, the usual time for holding it being then expired. The new Ephori took this opportunity to commence a prosecution against him and Mandroclides, for having voted for the abolition of debts, and a new distribution of lands, contrary to the laws. Lysander and Mandroclides, finding themselves in danger of being condemned, persuaded the two kings, that if they would only be united with each other, they would have no cause to be disquieted by any decrees of the Ephori, who were privileged indeed to decide between them when they were divided in their sentiments, but had no right to interpose in their affairs, when they concurred in the same opinions.

The two kings taking advantage of this expedient, entered the assembly, where they compelled the Ephori to quit their seats, and substituted others in their stead, one of whom was Agesilaus. They then caused a band of young men to arm themselves, and gave orders for releasing the prisoners; in a word, they rendered themselves very formidable to their enemies, who now expected to be put to the sword, but not one person was killed on this occasion; and when Agis even knew that Agesilaus intended to cause Leonidas to be assassinated on his retreat to Tegæa, he ordered him safely to be conducted thither by a sufficient guard.

When the affair was on the point of being absolutely concluded without any opposition, so great was the terror which then prevailed, it was suddenly obstructed by a single man. Agesilaus had one of the largest and best estates in the whole country, and at the same time was deeply involved in debt: but as he was incapable of paying his creditors, and had no inclination to incorporate his estate into the common property, he represented to Agis, that the change would be too great and violent, and even too dangerous, should they attempt to carry their two points at the same time; namely, the abolition of debts, and the distribution of lands: whereas, if they began with conciliating the landed proprietors, by the annihilation of debts, they would afterwards more quietly and readily consent to the partition of lands. This specious reasoning misled Agis, and even Lysander himself was won over to this expedient by the artifices of Agesilaus; in consequence of which all contracts and obligations were taken from the several creditors, and carried into the public square, where they were piled into a large heap, and burned to ashes. As soon as the flames mounted into the air, the rich men and bankers, who had lent their money, returned home extremely dejected, and Agesilaus cried with an insulting air, "That he had never seen so fine and clear a fire before."

The people immediately after this transaction, demanded a distribution of the lands, and each of the kings gave orders for its accomplishment; but Agesilaus still continued to start fresh difficulties, and found out a variety of new pretences, to prevent the execution of that affair; by which means he gained time, till Agis was obliged to take the field at the head of an army. For the Achæans, who were in alliance with the Lacedæmonians, had sent to demand their assistance against the Ætolians, who threatened an irruption through the territories of the Megareans into Peloponnesus.

Aratus, who was then general of the Achæans, had already assembled his troops to oppose the enemy, and had also written to the Ephori, who, upon receipt of his letters, immediately sent Agis to their assistance. This prince set out with all possible expedition, and the soldiers testified an incredible joy at their marching under his command. The generality of them were young men in very low circumstances of life, who now saw themselves discharged from all their debts, and free, and also in expectation of sharing the lands at their return from this expedition; for which reasons they testified the utmost affection for Agis. The cities were charmed to see these troops pass through Peloponnesus, without committing the least disorder: and so quietly, that the sound of their march was hardly to be distinguished. The Greeks were entirely surprised, and made the following reflection: "What admirable discipline and order must formerly have been observed by the armies of Lacedæmon, when they were commanded by Agesilaus, Lysander, or the ancient Leonidas; since they even now display so much awe and respect for their general, though younger than any soldier in his camp!"

Agis joined Aratus near Corinth, at the very time when he was deliberating in a council of war, whether he should hazard a battle, and in what manner he should dispose his troops. Agis declared for a battle, and thought it not advisable to allow the enemies a passage into Peloponnesus; but added at the same time, that he intended to act as Aratus should judge proper, as he was the older officer of the two, and general of the Achæans; whereas he himself was only general of the auxiliary troops, and was not come thither to exercise any command over the league, but only to engage the enemy in conjunction with them for whose assistance he had been sent. The officers of Aratus, instead of treating him with as much deference as Agis had expressed, took the liberty to reproach him in sharp terms, for his disinclination to a battle; ascribing that to timidity, which in reality was the effect of prudence. But the vain fear of false infamy did not make him abandon his prudent schemes for the public good. He justified his conduct by the memoirs he writ on that occasion; wherein he observes, that as the husbandmen had already carried in their harvest, and gathered in all the fruits of the season, he judged it more advisable to let the enemy advance into the country, than to hazard an unnecessary battle at that juncture, when the welfare of the whole league lay at stake. When he had determined not to enter upon an action, he dismissed his allies, after he had bestowed the greatest commendations upon them; and Agis, who was astonished at his conduct, set out for Sparta with his troops.

The Ætolians entered Peloponnesus without any obstruction,¹ and in their march seized the city of Pellene, where their troops, who were intent on nothing but plunder, immediately dispersed themselves up and down, without the least order, and began to contend with each other for the spoils. Aratus, informed of these proceedings, would not suffer so favourable an opportunity to escape him. He was no longer the same man, and, without losing a moment's time, or waiting till all his troops had joined him, he advanced with those he then had against the enemy, who were become weak even by their victory, attacked them in the very place they had so lately taken, and forced them to abandon it, with the loss of 700 men. This action did him great honour, and changed the injurious reproaches which had been uttered against him, and which he had patiently suffered, into the highest applauses and panegyric.

Several states and princes having now entered into a confederacy against the Achæans, Aratus endeavoured to contract a friendship and alliance with the Ætolians, in which he easily succeeded; and not only a peace was concluded between them, but he also effectually negotiated an offensive and defensive league between the two nations of Ætolia and Achæa.

Agis,² when he arrived at Sparta,

A. M. 3760. found a great change in the state Ant. J. C. 244. of affairs. Agesilaus, who was one of the Ephori, being no longer restrained by fear as formerly, and entirely intent upon the gratification of his avarice, committed the greatest violence and injustice. When he found himself universally detested, he raised and maintained a body of troops, who served him as a guard when he went to the senate; and he caused a report to be spread, that he intended to continue in his office the succeeding year. His enemies, in order to elude the calamities with which they were threatened, caused Leonidas to be sent for in the most public manner from Tegea, and replaced him upon the throne, to the general satisfaction of the people, who were greatly irritated to see themselves abused in the hopes they had entertained of the partition of the lands, which had never been carried into execution.

Agesilaus saved himself by the assistance of his son, who was universally beloved; and the two kings took sanctuary: Agis in the temple of Minerva called Chalcioecos, and Cleombrotus in that of Neptune. As Leonidas seemed to be most exasperated against the latter, he left Agis, and advanced at the head of a band of soldiers into the temple where Cleombrotus had fled for refuge. He then reproached him with great warmth for assuming the regal power in violation of the ties of affinity between them, and for expelling them from his own country in so ignominious a manner. Cleombrotus, who had nothing to answer to these reproaches, continued seated in a profound silence, and with an aspect that sufficiently testified his confusion. His wife Chelonis stood near, with her two children at her feet. She had been equally unfortunate as a wife and daughter, but was equally faithful in each of these capacities, and had always adhered to the unfortunate. She had accompanied her father Leonidas during his exile, and now returned to her husband, whom she tenderly embraced, and at the same time became a supplicant for him to her father.

All those who were then present melted into tears at so moving a sight, and were struck with admiration at the virtue and tenderness of Chelonis, and the amiable force of conjugal love. This unfortunate princess pointing to her mourning habit and dishevelled tresses, "Believe me, O my father," said she, "this habit of woe which I now wear, this dejection which appears in my countenance, and this affliction into which you see me sunk, are not the effects of that compassion I entertain for Cleombrotus: but the remains of my grief for the calamities you have sustained in your flight from Sparta. On what, alas! shall I now resolve? While you reign for the future in Sparta, and triumph over the enemies who opposed you, shall I continue to live in the desolate state to which you now see me reduced? Or is it my duty to array myself in robes of royalty and magnificence, when I behold the husband I received from you in the flower of my youth, on the point of perishing by your hands? Should he be unable to disarm your resentment, and move your soul to compassion, by the tears of his wife and children, permit me to assure you, that he will be punished with more severity for his imprudence, than was even intended by yourself, when he shall see a wife who is so dear to him expiring at his feet; for you are not to think, that in my present condition I will ever consent to survive him. What appearance shall I make among the Spartan ladies, after my inability to inspire my husband with compassion for my father, and to soften my father into pity for my husband? What indeed shall I appear to them, but a daughter and a wife, always afflicted and condemned by her nearest relations!" Chelonis, at the conclusion of these mournful expressions, reclined her cheek on the head of Cleombrotus, while with her eyes that spoke their sorrow in their tears, she cast a languid look on those who were present.

Leonidas, after a few moments' discourse with his friends, ordered Cleombrotus to rise, and immediately quit Sparta; but earnestly importuned his daughter to continue there, and not forsake a father, who gave her such a peculiar proof of tenderness, as to spare, at her request, the life of her husband. His solicitations were, however, ineffectual, and the moment Cleombrotus rose from his seat, she placed one of her children in his arms, and clasped the other in her own; and, when she had offered up her prayers to the goddess, and kissed her altar, she became a voluntary exile with her husband. How extremely affecting was this spectacle! and how worthy the admiration of all ages is such a model of conjugal love! If the heart of Cleombrotus, says Plutarch, had not been entirely depraved by vain glory, and a boundless ambition to reign, he would have been sensible, that even banishment itself, with so virtuous a companion, was a felicity preferable to the condition of a sovereign.

When Leonidas had expelled Cleombrotus from Sparta, and substituted new Ephori instead of the former, whom he had deposed, he bent all his endeavours to insnare Agis; and began with persuading him to quit the asylum to which he had retired, and to reign in conjunction with himself. In order to which he assured him, that his citizens had pardoned all past proceedings, because they were sensible that his youth and inexperience, with his predominant passion for glory, had laid him open to the insinuations of Agesilaus. But as Agis suspected the sincerity of those expressions, and persisted in his resolution to continue in the temple, Leonidas no longer attempted to deceive him with plausible pretences. Amphares, Demochares, and Arcesilaus, who had frequently visited the young prince, continued their assiduities to him, and sometimes conducted him from the temple to the baths, and from thence conveyed him in safety to the temple; for each of them was his intimate friend.

This fidelity, however, was of no long continuance. Amphares had lately borrowed of Agesistrata, the mother of Agis, several rich suits of tapestry, and a magnificent set of silver plate. The hope of retaining those costly ornaments tempted him to betray the king, with his mother and grandmother. It was even said, that he was much more inclinable, than either of his two companions, to listen to the suggestions of Leonidas: and that no one was so industrious as himself to spirit up the Ephori (of whose number he was one) against Agis. As this prince went sometimes from the temple to the bath, they resolved to take that opportunity to surprise him; and when he was one day returning from thence, they advanced up to him, and after they had embraced him with an air of affection, they attended him in his way, and entertained him with their usual familiarity of conversation. At the end of one of the streets through which they passed, was a turning which led to the prison; and as soon as they arrived at that corner, Amphares seized Agis with an air of authority, and cried, "Agis, I must conduct you to the Ephori, to whom you are to be accountable for your behaviour." At the same instant Demochares, who was tall and strong, threw his mantle round his neck, and dragged him along, while the other pushed him forward, as they had previously agreed; and as no person came to assist him, because there was nobody in the street at that time, they accomplished their design, and threw him into prison.

Leonidas arrived at the same time with a great number of foreign soldiers, and surrounded the prison; the Ephori likewise came thither, and when they had sent for such of the senators as concurred with their opinion, they proceeded to examine Agis, as if he had been formally arraigned, and ordered him to justify himself, with respect to his intended innovations in the republic. One of the Ephori, pretending to have discovered an expedient for disengaging him from this criminal affair, asked him, whether Lysander and Agesilaus had not compelled him to have recourse to those measures: to which Agis replied, that he had not acted in consequence of any compulsion; but that his admiration of Lysander, and a sincere desire to imitate his conduct, were his only motives for attempting to restore the city to the same condition in which that legislator had left it. The same officer then demanding of him, whether he did not repent of that proceeding? The young prince answered with an air of steadiness, "That he never should repent of so virtuous, so noble, and so glorious an undertaking, though death itself were presented to his view in all its terrors." His pretended judges then condemned him to die, and immediately commanded the public officers to carry him to that part of the prison, where those on whom the sentence of condemnation had passed were usually strangled.

When Demochares saw that the officers of justice did not dare to lay their hands on Agis, and that even the foreign soldiers turned their eyes from such a spectacle of horror, and refused to be accessory to so inhuman an execution, he loaded them with threats and reproaches, and with his own hands dragged Agis to the dungeon. The people, who by this time were informed of the manner in which he had been seized, crowded to the gates of the prison, and began to be very tumultuous. The whole street was already illuminated with innumerable tapers; and the mother and grandmother of Agis ran from place to place, filling the air with their cries, and entreating the people that the king of Sparta might at least have the privilege to defend himself, and be judged by his own citizens. The zeal of the people did but animate the murderers to hasten the execution of Agis, lest he should be released by force that very night, if the people should have sufficient time allowed them for assembling together.

As the executioners were leading him to the place where they intended to strangle him, he beheld tears flowing from the eyes of one them, who was touched with his misfortune; upon which he turned to him, and said, "Weep not for me, my friend; for, as I am cut off in this manner, contrary to all laws and justice, I am much happier, and more to be envied, than those who have condemned me." When he had said these words, he offered his neck to the fatal cord without the least reluctance.

As Amphares came from the prison, at the close of this tragic scene, the first object he beheld was the disconsolate mother of Agis, who threw herself at his feet: he raised her from the earth, and assured her that Agis had nothing to fear; entreating her at the same time to enter the prison and see her son. She then desired him to permit her aged mother to attend her in that mournful visit. "Your request," said he, "is reasonable;" and he immediately conducted them into the prison, but ordered the door to be shut the moment they entered it. He then commanded the executioner to seize Archidamia, the grandmother of Agis, who had lived to a venerable old age among her citizens, with as much dignity and reputation as any lady of her time. When the executioner had performed his fatal office, the inhuman Amphares ordered the mother of Agis to enter the dungeon. This unhappy princess, the moment she came into that dismal place, beheld her son lying dead on the ground, and, at a little distance from him, her dead mother, with the fatal cord still about her neck. She assisted the executioners in untying it, after which she laid the corpse by her son, as decently as she could, and covered it with a cloth. When this pious office was completed, she cast herself upon the body of Agis, and after she had tenderly kissed his cold lips, "O my son," said she, "the excess of thy humanity and sweet disposition, and thy too great circumspection and lenity, have undone thee, and been fatal to us as well as thee!"

Amphares, who from the door had beheld and heard all that passed, entered that moment, and addressing himself with a savage air to the mother of Agis, "Since you knew," said he, "and approved the designs of your son, you shall share in his punishment." Agesistrata arose at those words, and running to the fatal cord, "May this," cried she, "at least be useful to Sparta!"

When the report of these executions was dispersed through the city, and the inhabitants beheld the bodies brought out of the prison; the indignation occasioned by this barbarity was universal, and every one declared, that from the time the Dorians had first established themselves in Peloponnesus, so atrocious and horrible an action had never been committed. It must indeed be acknowledged, that all the blackest crimes in nature were here united, and under circumstances which infinitely aggravated their atrocity; and we may even add too, that the murder of the king included and surpassed them all: so barbarous an execution, in opposition to that respect with which nature inspires the most savage people for the most sacred person of their sovereign, is such a blemish on a nation, as all succeeding ages can never obliterate.

Agis having been destroyed in this manner, Leonidas was not expeditious enough in seizing his brother Archidamus, who saved himself by flight; but he secured Agiatis, the consort of that unhappy king, whom he carried off from her own house, with the young child she had by him, and then compelled her to espouse his son Cleomenes, who was not marriageable at that time: but Leonidas determined that the widow of Agis should not be disposed of to any other person, as she inherited a large estate from her father Gylippus, and likewise excelled all the Grecian ladies in beauty as well as wisdom and virtue. She endeavoured to avoid this marriage by all the means in her power, but to no effect. And when she at last was obliged to consent to her nuptials with Cleomenes, she always retained a mortal aversion to Leonidas: but behaved with the utmost complacency and kindness to her young spouse, who, from the first day of his marriage, conceived a most sincere and passionate esteem and affection for her, which never abated; and even sympathized with her in the tenderness she preserved for Agis, and the regard she expressed for his memory, and that too in such a degree, that he would frequently listen to her with the greatest attention, while she related to him the great designs he had formed for the regulation of the government.

SECTION IV.—CLEOMENES ASCENDS THE THRONE OF SPARTA, AND ENGAGES IN A WAR AGAINST THE ACHÆANS, OVER WHOM HE OBTAINS SEVERAL ADVANTAGES. HE REFORMS THE GOVERNMENT OF SPARTA, AND RE-ESTABLISHES THE ANCIENT DISCIPLINE. ACQUIRES NEW ADVANTAGES OVER ARATUS AND THE ACHÆANS. ARATUS APPLIES FOR SUCOUR TO ANTIGONUS, KING OF MACEDONIA, BY WHOSE AID THE ACHÆANS OBTAIN REPEATED VICTORIES, AND TAKE SEVERAL PLACES FROM THE ENEMY.

CLEOMENES had a noble soul,¹ and an ardent passion for glory, joined with the same inclination for temperance and simplicity of manners as Agis had always expressed; but he had not that prince's excessive sweetness of disposition, nor the timidity and precaution which accompanied it. Nature, on the contrary, had infused into him a vigour and vivacity of mind, which ardently prompted him to whatever appeared great and noble. Nothing seemed to him so glorious as to reign over his citizens with their own good will and consent; but, at the same time he did not think it inconsistent with the glory of a wise administration, to employ some violence in reducing to compliance with a measure of public utility an inconsiderable number of obstinate and unjust persons, who opposed it merely from a view of private interest.

He was far from being satisfied with the state of affairs which then prevailed in Sparta. All the citizens had long been softened by indolence and a voluptuous life; and the king himself, who was fond of tranquillity, had entirely neglected public affairs. No person whatever had testified any regard for the public good, every individual being solely intent upon his private interest, and the aggrandizement of his family at the public expense. Instead of any care in disciplining the young people, and forming them to temperance, patience and the equality of freedom, it was even dangerous to mention any thing of that nature, as Agis himself had perished by attempting to introduce it among them.

It is also said, that Cleomenes, who was still very young, had heard some philosophical lectures at the time when Spherus, who came from the banks of the Boristhenes, settled in Lacedæmon, and applied himself in a very successful manner to the instruction of youth. This person was one of the principal disciples of Zeno, the Cilian.² The Stoic philosophy, which he then professed, was exceeding proper to infuse courage and noble sentiments into the mind but, at the same time, was capable of dangerous effects in a disposition naturally warm and impetuous; and, on the other hand, might be rendered very beneficial by being grafted on a mild and moderate character.

After the death of Leonidas, who did not long survive the condemnation and murder of Agis, his son Cleomenes succeeded him in the throne; and though he was then very young, it gave him pain to consider that he had only the empty title of king, while the whole authority was engrossed by the Ephori, who shamefully abused their power. He from that time grew solicitous to change the form of government; and as he was sensible that few persons were disposed to concur with him in his views, he imagined the accomplishment of it would be facilitated by a war, and therefore endeavoured to embroil his city with the Achæans, who, very fortunately for his purpose, had given Sparta some occasion of complaint against them.

Aratus from the very beginning of his administration, had been industrious to negotiate a league between all the states of Peloponnesus, through a persuasion, that if he succeeded in that attempt, they would have nothing to fear for the future from a foreign enemy; and this was the only point to which all his measures tended. All the other states, except the Lacedæmonians, the people of Elis, and those of Arcadia, who had espoused the party of the Lacedæmonians, had acceded to this league. Aratus, soon after the death of Leonidas, began to harass the Arcadians, in order to make an experiment of the Spartan courage, and at the same time to make it evident that he despised Cleomenes, as a young man without the least experience.

When the Ephori received intelligence of this act of hostility, they caused their troops to take the field under the command of Cleomenes; they indeed were not numerous, but confidence in the general by whom they were commanded, inspired them with all imaginable ardour for the war. The Achæans marched against them with 20,000 foot and 1000 horse, under the command of Aristomachus. Cleomenes came up with them near Pallantium, a city of Arcadia, and offered them battle; but Aratus was so intimidated by this bold measure, that he prevailed upon the general not to hazard an engagement, and then made a retreat; which drew upon him very severe reproaches from his own troops, and sharp railery from the enemy, whose numbers did not amount to 5000 men in the whole. The courage of Cleomenes was so much raised by this retreat, that he assumed a loftier air amongst his citizens, and reminded them of an expression used by one of their ancient kings, who said, "That the Lacedæmonians never inquired after the number of their enemies, but where they were." He afterwards defeated the Achæans in a second encounter; but Aratus, taking the advantage even of his defeat, like an experienced general, turned his arms immediately against Mantinea, and before the enemy could have any suspicion of his design, made himself master of that city, and put a garrison into it.

Cleomenes, after his return to Sparta, began to think seriously on the execution of his grand design, and had influence enough to cause Archidamus, the brother of Agis, to be recalled from Messene. As that prince was descended from the other royal house of Sparta, he had an incontestable right to the crown and Cleomenes was persuaded, that the authority of the Ephori would receive a much greater diminution, when the throne of Sparta should be filled by its two kings, whose union would enable them to counterbalance their power. But, unhappily for his purpose, the same persons who had been guilty of the death of Agis, found means to assassinate his brother Archidamus.³

Cleomenes, soon after this event, gained a new advantage over the Achæans, in an action near Megalo-

polis, wherein Lysias was slain, in consequence of engaging too far in the pursuit of the Lacedæmonians, who had been repulsed when the encounter first began. This victory was very honourable to the young king, and increased his reputation to a great degree. He had imparted his design to a small number of select and faithful friends, who served him in a very reasonable manner. When he returned to Sparta, he concerted his march so as to enter the city when the Ephori were at supper; at which time, a set of persons who had been chosen for that action, entered the hall with their drawn swords, and killed four of these magistrates,¹ with ten of those who had taken arms for their defence. Agesilaus, who had been left for dead on the spot, found means to save himself; after which no other person whatever sustained any violence; and, indeed, what had been already committed was sufficient.

The next day, Cleomenes caused the names of four-score citizens, whom he intended to banish, to be fixed up in places of public resort. He also removed from the hall of audience all the seats of the Ephori except one, where he himself was to sit when administering justice; and after he had convoked an assembly of the people, he explained to them his reasons for the conduct he had pursued; representing to them, in what an enormous manner the Ephori had abused their power, by suppressing all lawful authority, and not only banishing their kings, but even causing them to be destroyed without the least form of justice, and menacing those who were desirous of again beholding Sparta happy in the most excellent and divine form of government. He then added, that the conduct he pursued rendered it sufficiently evident, that, instead of consulting his own particular interest, his whole endeavours were employed to promote that of the citizens, by reviving among them the discipline and equality which the wise Lycurgus had formerly established, and from whence Sparta had derived all her glory and reputation.

When he had expressed himself in this manner, he was the first to consign his whole estate to the common stock, and was seconded in that action by Megistones, his father-in-law, who was very rich. The rest of his friends, and at length all the other citizens, then complied with this example, and the lands were distributed agreeably to the intended plan. He even assigned a portion to each of those who had been banished, and promised to recall them as soon as affairs could be settled in a state of tranquillity. He then filled up the proper number of citizens with persons of the best character in all the adjacent parts, and raised 4000 foot, whom he taught to use lances instead of javelins, and to wear bucklers with strong handles, and not with leather straps buckled on, as had before been the custom.

His next cares were devoted to the education of children; in order to which he endeavoured to re-establish the Læonic discipline, wherein the philosopher Sphærus very much assisted him. The exercises and public meals soon resumed their ancient order and gravity; most of the citizens voluntarily embracing this wise, noble, and regular method of life, to which the rest, whose number was very considerable, were soon obliged to conform. In order also to soften the name of monarch, and to avoid exasperating the citizens, he appointed his brother Eucidas king with him; which is the first instance of the administration of the Spartan government by two kings of the same house at one time.

Cleomenes, believing that Aratus and the Achæans were persuaded he would not presume to quit Sparta, amidst the dissatisfaction occasioned by the innovations which he had introduced into the government, thought nothing could be more honourable and advantageous to him, than to let his enemies see how much he was esteemed by his troops and beloved by his citizens, and what confidence he entertained, that the new changes had not alienated the minds of the people from him. He first advanced into the territories of Megalopolis; where his troops committed great devastations, and gained a very considerable booty. To these ravages he added insults, causing public games or shows to be exhibited for the space of a whole day, in the sight of the enemy; not that he had any real satisfaction in such a conduct, but only intended to convince them, by this contemptuous bravado, how assured he was of being victorious over them.

Though it was very customary, in those times, to see troops of comedians and dancers in the train of other armies, his camp was perfectly free from all such dissolute attendants. The youths of his army passed the greatest part of their time in exercising themselves, and the old men were industrious to form and instruct them. Their very relaxations from those employments were devoted to instructive and familiar conversations, seasoned with fine and delicate raileries, which were always modest, and never rendered offensive by injurious reflections. In a word, they were entirely conformable to the laws by which the wise legislator of Sparta had been careful to regulate conversations.

Cleomenes himself appeared like the master who thus formed the citizens, not so much by his discourse as by his example, affording, in the simple and frugal life which he led, and which had nothing in it superior to that of the meanest of his subjects, an affecting model of wisdom and abstinence, which facilitated beyond expression his accomplishment of the great things which he performed in Greece. For those whose affairs carried them to the courts of other kings, did not admire their riches and magnificence so much as they detested their imperious pride, and the haughtiness with which they treated those who approached them. On the contrary, no such offensive manners were ever experienced in the court of Cleomenes. He appeared in a very plain habit, without guards, and almost without officers: the audiences he gave were as long as the people who applied to him could desire: he gave all manner of persons a very agreeable reception, without treating any body with an air of austerity. This affable and engaging behaviour gained him the universal love and veneration of his people, in which the true grandeur and merit of a king undoubtedly consists.

His table was extremely simple and frugal, and truly Læonic. No music was ever introduced there, nor did any one desire it, as his conversation well supplied its place; and it is certain that those who are capable of discoursing well, may pass their time very agreeably without hearing songs. Cleomenes never failed to enliven those repasts, either by proposing curious and important questions, or relating some useful and agreeable piece of history; seasoning the whole with a delicate vein of wit and gaiety. He thought it neither an argument of a prince's merit nor glory to attach men to his interest by the attractions of riches and splendid tables; whereas the ability of gaining their hearts by the amiable power of discourse, and the charms of an intercourse in which frankness and sincerity always prevailed, was considered by him as a truly royal quality.

This affable and engaging disposition of Cleomenes secured him the affection of all the troops, and Ant. J. C. 228.

inspired them with such an ardour for his service, as seemed to have rendered them invincible. He took several places from the Achæans, ravaged the territories of their allies, and advanced almost as far as Phœæ, with intention either to give them battle, or discredit Aratus as a pusillanimous leader, who had fled from his enemy, and abandoned all their champaign country to be plundered. The Achæans having taken the field with all their troops, and encamped in the territories of Dyme, Cleomenes followed them thither, and harassed them perpetually with so much intrepidity, as at last compelled them to come to a battle, wherein he obtained a complete victory; for he put their army to flight, killed abundance of men, and took a great number of prisoners.

The Achæans were extremely dejected at these severe losses, and began to be apprehensive of the greatest calamities from Sparta, especially if she should happen to be supported by the Ætolians, according to the rumour which then prevailed. Aratus, who had usually been elected general every other year, refused that commission when he was chosen again, and Timoxenes was substituted in his stead. The Achæans severely censured the conduct of Aratus on this occasion, and with great justice, as he, who was considered by them as their pilot, had now abandoned the helm of his vessel amidst a threatening tempest, wherein it would have been proper and glorious for him to have seized it into his own hands, even by force, if it had not been offered to him, in imitation of several great examples related in history, and thus to have been solely solicitous to save the state at the expense of his own life. If he had even despaired of retrieving the affairs of the Achæans, he ought rather to have submitted to Cleomenes, who was a Grecian by birth, and king of Sparta, than to call in the assistance of foreigners, and make them masters of Peloponnesus, as he will soon appear to have done: jealousy, however, extinguishes all prudent reflections, and is a malady not to be cured by reason alone.

The Achæans being reduced to A. M. 3777. the last extremities, especially after Ant J. C. 227. the loss of this battle, sent ambassadors to Cleomenes to negotiate a peace. The king seemed at first determined to impose very rigid terms upon them; but afterwards despatched an embassy on his part, and only demanded to be appointed general of the Achæan league, promising on that condition to accommodate all differences between them, and restore the prisoners and places he had taken from them. The Achæans, who were very inclinable to accept of peace on those terms, desired Cleomenes to be present at Lerna, where they were to hold a general assembly, in order to conclude the treaty. The king set out accordingly for that place, but an unexpected accident which happened to him prevented the interview; and Aratus endeavoured to improve it in such a manner as to hinder the negotiation from being renewed. He imagined, that as he had possessed the chief authority in the Achæan league for the space of thirty-three years, it would be very disgraceful to him if a young man were suffered, as it were, to graft himself upon him and divest him of all his glory and power, by supplanting him in a command which he had acquired, augmented, and retained for so many years. These considerations induced him to use all his efforts to dissuade the Achæans from accepting the conditions proposed to them by Cleomenes: but as he had the mortification to find that the Achæans would not coincide with him in opinion, because they dreaded the bravery and uncommon success of Cleomenes, and likewise thought that the intentions of the Lacedæmonians to restore Peloponnesus to its ancient state were very just and reasonable, he had recourse to an expedient which would not have become any Grecian, and was extremely dishonourable in a man of his rank and character. This was to call in the assistance of Antigonus king of Macedonia, and by inevitable consequence make him master of Greece.

He had not forgotten that Antigonus had great cause to be dissatisfied with him: but he was sensible that princes may be properly said to have neither friends nor enemies, and that they form their sentiments of things by the standard of their own interest. He, however, would not openly enter into a negotiation of this nature, nor propose it as for himself; because he knew that, if it should happen to prove unsuccessful, he must inevitably incur all the odium; and besides, it would be making a plain declaration to the Achæans, that if he had not absolutely despaired of retrieving their affairs, he would not have advised them to have recourse to their professed enemy. He, therefore, concealed his real views, like an artful and experienced politician, and proceeded by indirect and secret methods. As the city of Megalopolis was nearest in situation to Sparta, it lay most exposed to the incursions of the enemy and the inhabitants began to be tired of the war, as the Achæans were so far from being in a condition to support them, that they were unable to defend themselves. Nicophanes and Cercides, two citizens of Megalopolis, whom Aratus had brought over to his scheme, made a proposal in the council of that city for demanding permission of the Achæans, to implore the assistance of Antigonus. This motion was immediately assented to, and the Achæans granted them the permission they desired. These two citizens were then deputed to be the messengers to make that proposal to the king, and Aratus had been careful to furnish them with sufficient instructions beforehand. When they received audience of Antigonus they lightly touched upon the particulars which related to their city, and then strongly insisted, in conformity to their instructions, on the imminent danger to which the king himself would be exposed, should the alliance which was then talked of between the Ætolians and Cleomenes take effect. They then represented to him, that if the united forces of these two states should have those advantages over the Achæans which they expected to obtain, the towering ambition of Cleomenes would never be satisfied with the mere conquest of Peloponnesus, as it was evident that he aspired at the empire of all Greece, which it would be impossible for him to seize, without entirely destroying the authority of the Macedonians. To these remonstrances they added, that if the Ætolians should not happen to join Cleomenes, the Achæans would be capable of supporting themselves with their own forces, and would have no cause to trouble the king with their importunities for his assistance; but if, on the other hand, fortune should prove adverse to them, and permit the confederacy between those two states to take effect, they must then entreat him not to be an unconcerned spectator of the ruin of Peloponnesus, which might even be attended with fatal consequences to himself. They also took care to insinuate to the king, that Aratus would enter into all his measures, and give him in due time sufficient security for his own fidelity and good intentions.

Antigonus highly approved all these representations, and seized with pleasure the opportunity that was now offered him, of engaging in the affairs of Greece. This had always been the policy of the successors of Alexander, who, by declaring themselves kings, had converted the frame of their respective governments into a monarchy. They were sensible that they were deeply interested in opposing all such states as had any inclination to retain their liberty and the form of popular government; and wherever they found themselves in no condition to crush this inclination entirely, they attempted to weaken it at least, and to render the people incapable of forming any considerable enterprises, by sowing the seeds of division between republics and free states, and engaging them in wars against each other, in order to render themselves necessary to them, and prevent their shaking off the Macedonian yoke by uniting their forces. Polybius, speaking of one of these princes, declares, in express terms, that he paid large pensions to several tyrants in Greece, who were professed enemies to liberty.³

It cannot, therefore, be thought surprising, that Antigonus should so readily comply with the solicitations and demands of the Megalopolitans. He wrote them an obliging letter, wherein he promised to assist them, provided the Achæans would consent to that proceeding. The inhabitants of Megalopolis were transported at the happy result of their negotiation, and immediately despatched the same deputies to the general assembly of the Achæans, in order to inform the people of the good intentions of Antigonus, and to press them to send for them immediately, and to put their interests into his hands.

Aratus did not fail to congratulate himself in private on the masterly stroke by which he had succeeded in his intrigue, and to find Antigonus not possessed with any impressions to his prejudice, as he had reason to apprehend. He wished, indeed, to have had no occasion for his assistance; and though necessity obliged him to have recourse to that prince, he was unwilling to have those measures imputed to him, but wished them to seem to have been concerted by the Achæans, without any interference on his part.

When the deputies from Megalopolis were introduced into the assembly, they read the letter of Antigonus, and related all the particulars of the obliging reception he had given them; with the affection and esteem he had expressed for the Achæans, and the advantageous offers he made them. They concluded with desiring, in the name of their city, that the Achæans would invite Antigonus to be present as soon as possible in their assembly; and every one seemed to approve of that motion. Aratus then rose up, and after he had represented the good will of the king in the strongest light, and commended the sentiments that prevailed in the assembly, he intimated to them, that there was no necessity for precipitating measures; that it should be a point of honour with the republic to endeavour to maintain and terminate her wars by her own forces; and that if any calamitous accident should render her incapable of doing so, it would then be time enough to have recourse to her friends. This advice was generally approved; and it was concluded that the Achæans should employ only their own forces in supporting the present war.

A. M. 3779.
Ant. J. C. 225. Antigonus was called into their assistance, and they came to a resolution to deliver up the citadel of Corinth to him, without which he would never have engaged in that expedition; for he wanted a place of strength, and there was none which suited him so effectually as that, as well on account of its advantageous situation between two seas, as its fortifications, which rendered it almost impregnable. Aratus sent his son to Antigonus among the other hostages. That prince advanced by long marches, with an army of 20,000 foot and 1400 horse. Aratus set out by sea, with the principal officers of the league, to meet Antigonus at the city of Pegæ, unknown to the enemy; and when that prince was informed of his arrival in person, he advanced to him, and rendered him all the honours due to a general of distinguished rank and merit.

Cleomenes, instead of attempting to defend the passage of the isthmus, thought it more advisable to throw up trenches and raise strong walls to fortify the passes of the Onian mountains,³ and to harass the enemy by frequent attacks, rather than hazard a battle against such well-disciplined and warlike troops. This conduct of the king of Sparta reduced Antigonus to great extremities; for he had not provided himself with any considerable quantity of provisions, and found it not very practicable to force the passes defended by Cleomenes: the only expedient, therefore, to which Antigonus could have recourse in this perplexity, was to advance to the promontory of Herææ, and from thence to transport his army by sea to Sicyon, which would require a considerable space of time, as well as great preparations, which could not easily be made.

that the people of Argos had revolted against Cleomenes, and were then besieging the citadel. Aratus having received 1500 men from Antigonus, set out by sea and arrived at Epidaurus.

Cleomenes, receiving intelligence of these proceedings about nine or ten in the evening, immediately despatched Megistones with 2000 men, to succour his party at Argos as soon as possible; after which he industriously watched the motions of Antigonus; and to animate the Corinthians, assured them that the disorders which had lately happened at Argos, were no more than a slight commotion excited by a few mutinous persons, which would be easily suppressed. In this, however, he was deceived; for Megistones having been slain in a skirmish, as soon as he entered Argos, the Lacedæmonian garrison was reduced to the last extremity, and had sent several couriers to demand immediate assistance from the Spartan army. Cleomenes being then apprehensive that the enemies, if they should happen to make themselves masters of Argos, would shut up all the passes against him; by which means they would be in a condition to ravage all Laconia with impunity, and even to form the siege of Sparta, which would then be without defence; he, therefore, thought it advisable to decamp, and marched with all his army from Corinth.

Antigonus, immediately after this retreat of the Lacedæmonians, entered Corinth, and placed in it a strong garrison. Cleomenes, in the mean time, arrived at Argos, before the revolted had any suspicion of his approach, and at first succeeded so far, as to scale several parts of the town, where he forced some of the enemies' troops to save themselves by flight; but Aratus having entered the city on one side, and king Antigonus appearing with all his troops on the other, Cleomenes retired to Mantinea.

While he was on his march, he received at Tegeæ, in the evening, some news by messengers from Lacedæmon, which affected him as much as all his former misfortunes. They acquainted him with the death of his consort Agiatis, from whom he had never been able to absent himself a whole campaign, even when his expeditions were most successful; and such was his tenderness and esteem for her, that it had always been customary for him to make frequent returns to Sparta, to enjoy the pleasure of her company. The next morning he renewed his march by break of day, and arrived early at Sparta, where after he had devoted some moments in pouring out his sorrows to his mother and children in his own house, he resumed the management of public affairs.

Much about the same time, Ptolemy, who had promised to assist him in the war, sent to him to demand his mother and children as hostages. It was a long time before Cleomenes could venture to acquaint his parent with the king of Egypt's demand; and though he frequently went to visit her, with an intention to explain himself to her, he never had resolution enough to enter upon the subject. His mother observing his embarrassment, began to entertain some suspicion of the cause; for mothers have generally a great share of penetration, with reference to their children. She inquired of those who were most intimate with him, whether her son did not desire something from her, which he could not prevail upon himself to communicate to her? And when Cleomenes had at last the resolution to open the affair to her, "How, my son," said she with a smile, "is this the secret you wanted courage to disclose to me? Why, in the name of heaven, did you not immediately cause me to be put on board some vessel, and sent without a moment's delay, to any part of the world, where my person may be useful to Sparta, before old age consumes and destroys it in languor and inaction?"

When the preparations for her voyage were completed, Cratesiclea (for so the mother of Cleomenes was called) took her son apart, a few moments before she entered the vessel, and led him alone into the temple of Neptune. There she held him a great while clasped in her arms; and after she had tenderly kissed him, with her face bathed in tears, she recommended the liberty and honour of his country to his care. When she saw him weep in the excess of his anguish at that melancholy parting; "King of Lacedæmon," said she, "let us dry our tears, that no person, when you quit the temple, may see us weep, or do any thing unworthy of Sparta. For this is in our power; events are in the hands of God." When she had expressed herself to this effect she composed her countenance, led her infant grandson to the ship, and commanded the pilot to sail that moment from the port.

As soon as she arrived in Egypt, she was informed that Ptolemy, having received an embassy from Antigonus, was satisfied with the proposals made by that prince; and she had likewise intelligence that her son Cleomenes was solicited by the Achæans to conclude a treaty between them and Sparta, but that he durst not put an end to the war without the consent of Ptolemy, because he was apprehensive for his mother, who was then in the power of that king. When she was apprised of these circumstances, she sent express orders to her son, to transact, without the least fear or hesitation, whatever he imagined would prove beneficial and glorious to Sparta, and not to suffer himself to be disconcerted by his apprehensions of the treatment an old woman and a child might sustain from Ptolemy. Such were the sentiments which even the women of Sparta thought it their glory to cherish.

Antigonus,¹ in the mean time,

A. M. 3781. having made himself master of Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenus, and several other cities; Cleomenes, who was then reduced to the necessity of defending Laconia, permitted all the Helots who were capable of paying five mine (about ten pounds sterling) to purchase their freedom. From this contribution he raised 500 talents (about 125,000*l.* sterling,) and armed 2000 of these Helots after the Macedonian manner, in order to oppose them to the Leucaspides of Antigonus; he then formed an enterprise, which certainly no one could have expected from him. The city of Megalopolis was very considerable at that time, and even not inferior to Sparta in power and extent. Cleomenes concerted measures for surprising this city, and to take it without any opposition; and as Antigonus had sent most of his troops into winter-quarters in Macedonia, while he himself continued at Egium, to assist in the assembly of the Achæans, the king of Sparta justly supposed that the garrison of the city could not be very strong at that time, nor much upon their guard, as not being apprehensive of any insult from an enemy so weak as himself; and, consequently, that if he proceeded with expedition in his design, Antigonus, who was then at the distance of three days' march from the place, would be incapable of affording it any assistance. The event succeeded according to the plan he had projected; for he arrived at the city by night, scaled the walls, and made himself master of the place without any opposition. Most of the inhabitants retired to Messene, with their wives and children, before their enemies had any thoughts of pursuing them; and Antigonus was not informed of this accident, till it was too late to retrieve it.

Cleomenes, out of a generosity of mind which has few examples in history, sent a herald to Messene to acquaint the people of Megalopolis, that he would restore them their city, provided they would renounce the Achæan league, and enter into a friendship and confederacy with Sparta; but advantageous as this offer seemed, they could not prevail on themselves to accept it, but rather chose to be deprived of their estates, as well as of the monuments of their ancestors and the temples of their gods; in a word, to see themselves divested of all that was most dear and valuable to them; than to violate the faith they had sworn to their allies. The famous Philopœmen, whom we shall frequently have occasion to mention in the sequel of this history, and who was then at Messene, contributed not a little to this generous resolution. Who could ever expect to discover so much greatness of soul, and such noble sentiments, in the very dregs of Greece; for by that name the times of which we now treat may justly be described, when we compare them with the glorious ages of Greece united and triumphant, when even the lustre of its victories was surpassed by the splendour of its virtues.

This refusal of the Megalopolitans highly enraged Cleomenes, who, till the moment he received their answer, had not only spared the city, but had even been careful to prevent the soldiers from committing the least disorder; but his anger was then inflamed to such a degree, that he abandoned the place to pillage, and sent all the statues and pictures to Sparta. He also demolished the greatest part of the walls, with the strongest quarters in the place, and then marched his troops back to Sparta. The desolation of the city extremely afflicted the Achæans, who considered their inability to assist such faithful allies, as a crime for which they ought to reproach themselves.

This people was soon sensible, that by imploring the aid of Antigonus, they had subjected themselves to an imperious master, who made their liberties the price of his aid. He compelled them to pass a decree, which prohibited them from writing to any king, or sending an embassy, without his permission; and he obliged them to furnish provisions and pay for the garrison he had put into the citadel of Corinth, which, in reality, was making them pay for their own chains, for this citadel was the very place which kept them in subjection. They abandoned themselves to slavery in so abject a manner, as even to offer sacrifices and libations, and exhibit public games, in honour of Antigonus. Even Aratus himself was treated with equal disrespect. Antigonus set up in Argos all the statues of those tyrants which Aratus had thrown down, and destroyed all those which had been erected in honour of the persons who surprised the citadel of Corinth, except one, which was that of Aratus himself; and all the entreaties of this general could not prevail upon the king to desist from such a proceeding. The sight of these transactions gave him the utmost anxiety; but he was no longer master, and suffered a just punishment for subjecting himself and his country to a foreign yoke. After Antigonus had taken the city of Mantinea, and most inhumanly murdered a great number of the citizens, and sold the rest into captivity, he abandoned the place to the Argives, in order to its being re-peopled by them, and even charged Aratus with that commission, who had the meanness to call this new inhabited city by the name of him who had shown himself its most cruel enemy: a sad, and, at the same time a salutary example, which shows that when once a person has consented to stoop to a state of servitude, he sees himself daily compelled to descend lower, without knowing where or how to stop.

Aratus, by having himself contributed to load his republic with shackles, was guilty of an unpardonable crime, the enormity of which no great quality, nor any shining action, can ever extenuate. He acted thus merely through jealousy of his rival Cleomenes, whose glory, and the superiority that young prince had obtained over him by the success of his arms, were insupportable to him. What, says Plutarch, did Cleomenes demand of the Achæans, as the sole preliminary to the peace he offered them, but merely their election of him as their general? And even that was with a view to the welfare of their cities, and to secure to them the enjoyment of their liberties, as a testimony of his gratitude for so signal an honour, and so glorious a title. If, therefore, continues Plutarch, it had been absolutely necessary for them to have chosen either Cleomenes or Antigonus, or, in other words, a Greek or a Barbarian, for the Macedonians were considered as such; in a word, if they were obliged to have a master, would not the meanest citizen of Sparta have been preferable to the greatest of the Macedonians; at least, in the opinion of those who had any regard to the honour and reputation of Greece? Jealousy, however, extinguished all those sentiments in the mind of Aratus; so difficult is it to behold superior merit with an eye of satisfaction and tranquillity.

Aratus, therefore, that he might not seem to submit to Cleomenes, nor consent that a king of Sparta descended from Hercules, and a king who had lately re-established the ancient discipline of that city, should add to his other titles that of captain-general of the Achæans, called in a stranger, to whom he had formerly professed himself a mortal enemy; in consequence of which he filled Peloponnesus with those very Macedonians whom he had made it his glory to expel from thence in his youth. He even threw himself at their feet; and all Achæa, by his example, fell prostrate before them, as an indication of their promptitude to accomplish the commands of their imperious master. In a word, from a man accustomed to liberty, he became an abject and servile flatterer; he had the baseness to offer sacrifices to Antigonus, to appear himself at the head of a procession crowned with chaplets of flowers, joining at the same time in hymns to the honour of that prince, and rendering by these low adulations that homage to a mortal man, which none but the Divinity can claim; to a man who then carried death in his bosom, and was ready to sink into putrefaction: for he at that time was reduced to the last extremity by a slow consumption. Aratus was, however, a man of great merit in other respects, and had shown himself to be an extraordinary person, and well worthy of Greece. In him, says Plutarch, we see a deplorable instance of human frailty; which amidst the lustre of so many rare and excellent qualities, cannot form the model of virtue exempt from all blame.

We have already observed, that Antigonus had sent his troops into winter-quarters in Macedonia. Cleomenes, at the return of spring, formed an enterprise, which, in the opinion of the vulgar, was the result of temerity and folly; but, according to Polybius, a competent judge in affairs of that nature, it was concerted with all imaginable prudence and sagacity. As he was sensible that the Macedonians were dispersed in their quarters, and that Antigonus passed the winter season with his friends at Argos, without any other guard than an inconsiderable number of foreign troops; he made an irruption into the territories of Argos in order to lay them waste. He conceived at the same time, that either Antigonus would be so much affected with the apprehensions of ignominy as to hazard a battle, when he would certainly be defeated; or that, on the other hand, if he should decline fighting, he would lose all his reputation with the Achæans, while the Spartans, on the contrary, would be rendered more daring and intrepid. The event succeeded according to his expectations; for as the whole country was ruined by the devastations of his troops, the people of Argos, in their rage and impatience, assembled in a tumultuous manner at the palace gate, and with a murmuring tone pressed the king either to give their enemies battle, or resign the command of his troops to those who were less timorous than himself. But Antigonus, who had so much of the prudence and presence of mind essential to a great general, as to be sensible that the dishonourable part of one in his station did not consist in hearing himself reproached, but in exposing himself rashly and without reason, and in quitting certainties for chance, refused to take the field, and persisted in his resolution not to fight. Cleomenes therefore led up his troops to the walls of Argos, and when he had laid the open country waste, marched his army back to Sparta.

This expedition redounded very much to his honour, and obliged even his enemies to confess that he was an excellent general, and a person of the highest merit and capacity in the conduct of the most arduous affairs. In a word, they could never sufficiently admire his manner of opposing the forces of a single city to the whole power of the Macedonians, united with that of all Peloponnesus, notwithstanding the immense supplies which had been furnished by the king; and especially when they considered that he had not only preserved Laconia free from all insults, but had even penetrated into the territories of his enemies, where he ravaged the country, and made himself master of several great cities. This they were persuaded could not be the effect of any ordinary abilities in the art of war, nor of any common magnanimity. A misfortune, however, unhappily prevented him from reinstating Sparta in her ancient power, as will be evident in the sequel.

SECTION V.—THE CELEBRATED BATTLE OF SELASIA, WHEREIN ANTIGONUS DEFEATS CLEOMENES, WHO RETIRES INTO EGYPT. ANTIGONUS MAKES HIMSELF MASTER OF SPARTA, AND TREATS THAT CITY WITH GREAT HUMANITY. THE DEATH OF THAT PRINCE, WHO IS SUCCEDED BY PHILIP THE SON OF DEMETRIUS. THE DEATH OF PTOLEMY EVERGETES, TO WHOSE THRONE PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR SUCCEEDS. A GREAT EARTHQUAKE AT RHODES. THE NOBLE GENEROSITY OF THOSE PRINCES AND CITIES WHO CONTRIBUTED TO THE REPARATION OF THE LOSSES WHICH THE RHODIANS HAD SUSTAINED BY THAT CALAMITY. THE FATE OF THE FAMOUS COLOSSUS.

THE Macedonians and Achæans having quitted their quarters on the approach of summer, Antigonus put himself at the head of them, and advanced into Laconia. His army was composed of 28,000 foot and 1200 horse; but that of Cleomenes did not amount to more than 20,000 men. As the latter of these two princes expected an irruption from the enemy, he had fortified all the passes, by posting detachments of his troops in them, and by throwing up intrenchments, and cutting down trees, after which he formed his camp at Selasia. He imagined, and with good reason, that the enemies would endeavour to force a passage into the country through this avenue, in which he was not deceived. This defile was formed by two mountains, one of which had the name of Eva, and the other that of Olympus. The river Oeneus ran between them, on the banks of which was the road to Sparta. Cleomenes, having thrown up a strong intrenchment at the foot of these mountains, posted his brother Euclidas on the eminence of Eva, at the head of the allies, and planted himself on Olympus with the Lacedæmonians, and a party of the foreign troops, placing, at the same time, along each bank of the river, a detachment of the cavalry and foreign auxiliaries.

Antigonus, when he arrived there, saw all the passes fortified, and was sensible by the manner in which Cleomenes had posted his troops, that he had neglected no precaution either for defending himself or attacking his enemies, and that he had formed his camp into such an advantageous disposition, as rendered all approaches to it extremely difficult. All this abated his ardour for a battle, and caused him to encamp at a small distance, where he had an opportunity of covering his troops with a rivulet. He continued there for several days, in order to view the situation of the different posts and sound the disposition of the nations who composed the enemy's army. Sometimes he seemed to be forming designs, which kept the enemy in suspense how to act. They however were always upon their guard, and their situation secured them from insults in any quarter. At last, both sides resolved upon a decisive battle.

It is not easy to comprehend why Cleomenes, who was posted so advantageously, and whose troops were inferior to those of the enemy by one-third while they were secure of a free communication in their rear with Sparta, from whence they might be supplied with provisions, should resolve, without the least apparent necessity, to hazard a battle, the event of which was to decide the fate of Lacedæmon.

Polybius indeed seems to intimate the cause of this proceeding, when he observes, that Ptolemy caused Cleomenes to be acquainted, that he no longer would supply him with money, and exhorted him at the same time to come to an accommodation with Antigonus. As Cleomenes therefore was incapable of defraying the expense of this war, and was not only in arrear with his foreign troops to the amount of a very considerable sum, but found it extremely difficult to maintain his Spartan forces, we may consequently suppose that this situation of his affairs was his inducement to venture a battle.

When the signals were given on each side, Antigonus detached a body of troops, consisting of Macedonian and Illyrian battalions, alternately disposed, against those of the enemy posted on mount Eva. His second line consisted of Acarnanians and Cretans, and in the rear of these, 2000 Achæans were drawn up as a body of reserve. He drew up his cavalry along the bank of the river, in order to oppose those of the enemy, and caused them to be supported by 1000 of the Achæan foot, and the same number of Megalopolitans. He then placed himself at the head of the Macedonians and the light armed foreign troops, and advanced to mount Olympus to attack Cleomenes. The foreigners were disposed into the first line, and marched immediately before the Macedonian phalanx, which was divided into two bodies, the one in the rear of the other, because the ground would not admit their forming a larger front.

The action began at mount Eva, when the light-armed troops, who had been posted with an intention to cover and support the cavalry of Cleomenes, observing that the rear of the Achæan cohorts was uncovered, immediately wheeled about and attacked them. Those who endeavoured to gain the summit of the mountain, found themselves vigorously pressed by the enemy, and in great danger, being threatened in front by Euclidas, who was on the heights, at the same time that they were charged in their rear by the foreign troops, who assaulted them with the utmost impetuosity. Philopomen and his citizens were posted among the cavalry of Antigonus, who were supported by the Illyrians, and had orders not to move from that post till a particular signal should be given. Philopomen observing that it would not be difficult to fall upon this light infantry of Euclidas, and rout them entirely, and that this was the critical moment for the charge, immediately communicated his opinion to such of the king's officers as commanded the cavalry. They, however, would not so much as hear him, merely because he had never commanded, and was then very young; and even treated what he said as absurd. Philopomen was not diverted from his purpose by this rebuff, but at the head of his own citizens, whom he prevailed upon to follow him, he attacked and repulsed that body of infantry with great slaughter.

The Macedonians and Illyrians being disengaged by this operation from what before had retarded their motions, boldly marched up the hill to their enemies. Euclidas was then to engage with a phalanx, whose whole force consisted in the strict union of its parts, the closeness of its ranks, the steady and equal force of its numerous and pointed spears, and the uniform impetuosity of that heavy body, which by its weight overthrew and bore down all before it.

In order to prevent this inconvenience, an able officer would have marched down the mountain, with such of his troops as were lightest armed and most active, to have met the phalanx. He would have attacked them as soon as they began to ascend, and would then have harassed them on every side. The inequalities of the mountain, with the difficulty of ascending it entirely uncovered, would have enabled him to have opened a passage through this body of men, and to have interrupted their march, by putting their ranks into confusion, and breaking their order of battle; he would also have fallen back by degrees, in order to regain the summit of the mountain as the enemy advanced upon him, and after he had deprived them of the only advantage they could expect from the quality of their arms, and the disposition of their troops, he might have improved the advantage of his post in such a manner as to have easily put them to flight.

Euclidas, instead of acting in this manner, continued on the top of the mountain, flattering himself that victory would infallibly attend his arms. He imagined, in all probability, that the higher he permitted the enemy to advance, the easier it would be for him to precipitate their troops down the steep declivity; but, as he had not reserved for his own forces a sufficient extent of ground for any retreat that might happen to be necessary for avoiding the formidable charge of the phalanx, which advanced upon him in good order, his troops were crowded together in such a manner, as obliged him to fight on the summit of the mountain, where they could not long sustain the weight of the Illyrian arms, and the order of battle into which that infantry formed themselves on the eminence; and as his men could neither retreat nor change their ground, they were soon defeated by their enemies.

During this action, the cavalry of each army had also engaged. That of the Achæans behaved themselves with great bravery, and Philopomen in particular; because they were sensible that the liberties of their republic would be decided by this battle. Philopomen, in the heat of the action, had his horse killed under him, and while he fought on foot, he had both his thighs pierced through with a javelin; the wound, however, was not mortal, nor attended with any ill consequences.

The two kings began the engagement on mount Olympus, with their light-armed troops and foreign soldiers, of whom each of them had about 5000. As the action took place in the sight of each sovereign and his army, the troops vied with each other in signaling themselves, as well in parties as when the battle became general. Man to man, and rank to rank, all fought with the utmost vigour and obstinacy. Cleomenes, when he saw his brother defeated, and his cavalry beginning to give ground in the plain, was apprehensive that the enemy would pour upon him from all quarters: and therefore thought it advisable to level all the entrenchments around his camp, and cause his whole army to march out in front. The trumpets having sounded a signal for the light-armed troops to retreat from the space between the two camps, each phalanx advanced with loud shouts, shifting their lances at the same time, and began the charge. The action was very hot. One while the Macedonians fell back before the valour of the Spartans; and these, in their turn, were unable to sustain the weight of the Macedonian phalanx; till at last the troops of Antigonus advancing with their lances lowered and closed, charged the Lacedæmonians with all the impetuosity of a phalanx that had doubled its ranks, and drove them from their entrenchments. The defeat then became general; the Lacedæmonians fell in great numbers, and those who survived fled from the field of battle in the greatest disorder. Cleomenes, with only a few horse, retreated to Sparta. Plutarch assures us, that most of the foreign troops perished in this battle, and that no more than 200 Lacedæmonians escaped out of 6000.

It may justly be said, that Antigonus owed his success in some measure, to the prudence and bravery of the young Philopomen. His boldness and resolution in attacking the light infantry of the enemy with his own troop alone, contributed to the overthrow of the wing commanded by Euclidas, and that drew on the general defeat. This action, undertaken by a private captain of horse not only without orders, but in opposition to the superior officers, and even contrary to the command of the general, seems to be a transgression of military discipline; but it ought to be remembered, that the welfare of an army is a circumstance superior to all other considerations. Had the general been present, he himself would have given directions for that movement, and the delay even of a single moment might occasion the impossibility of its success. It is evident that Antigonus judged of the action in this manner; for when the battle was over, he assumed an air of seeming displeasure, and demanded of Alexander, who commanded his cavalry, what his reason could be for beginning the attack before the signal, contrary to the orders he had issued? Alexander then replying, that it was not himself, but a young officer of Megalopolis who had transgressed his commands in that manner. "That young man," said Antigonus, "in seizing the opportunity, behaved like a general, but you the general like a young man."

Sparta on this disaster, showed that ancient steady

ness and intrepidity, which seemed to have something of a savage air, and had distinguished her citizens on all occasions. No wife was seen to mourn for the loss of her husband. The old men celebrated the death of their children; and the children congratulated their fathers who had fallen in battle. Every one deplored the fate which had prevented them from sacrificing their lives to the liberty of their country. They opened their hospitable doors to those who returned covered with wounds from the army; they attended them with peculiar care, and eagerly supplied them with all the accommodations they needed. No trouble or confusion was seen through the whole city, and every individual lamented more the public calamity, than any particular loss of their own.

Cleomenes, upon his arrival at Sparta, advised his citizens to receive Antigonus; assuring them, at the same time, that whatever might be his own condition, he would always promote the welfare of his country, with the utmost pleasure, whenever it should happen to be in his power. He then retired into his own house, but would neither drink, though very thirsty, nor sit down, though extremely fatigued; but, armed as he was, he leaned against a column, with his head reclined on his arm; and after he had deliberated with himself for some time on the different measures which he might adopt, he suddenly quitted the house, and went with his friends to the port of Gythium, where he embarked in a vessel he had prepared for that purpose, and sailed for Egypt.

A Spartan, having made a lively representation to him of the melancholy consequences that might attend his purposed voyage to Egypt, and the indignity a king of Sparta would sustain by crouching in a servile manner to a foreign prince, took that opportunity to exhort him in the strongest manner, to prevent those just reproaches by a voluntary and glorious death, and to justify himself, by that action, to those who had sacrificed their lives in the fields of Selasia for the liberty of Sparta. "You are deceived," cried Cleomenes, "if you imagine there is any bravery in confronting death, merely through the apprehension of false shame, or the desire of empty applause; say rather, that such an action is mean and dishonourable. The death we may be induced to court, instead of being the retreat from an action, ought to be an action itself, since nothing can be more dishonourable than either to live or die, merely for one's self. For my part, I shall endeavour to be useful to my country, to my latest breath; and whenever this hope happens to fail us, it will be easy for us to have recourse to death, if such should be then our inclination."

Cleomenes had scarce set sail, before Antigonus arrived at Sparta, and made himself master of the city. He seemed to treat the inhabitants more like a friend than a conqueror; and declared to them, that he had not engaged in a war against the Spartans, but against Cleomenes, whose flight had satisfied and disarmed his resentment. He added, that it would be glorious to his memory, to have it said by posterity, that Sparta had been preserved by the prince who alone had the good fortune to take it. What he called preserving that city, was the abolishing all that the zeal of Cleomenes had accomplished, for the re-establishment of the ancient laws of Lycurgus, though that conduct was the real cause of its ruin. Sparta lost all that was valuable to her, by the overthrow and involuntary retreat of Cleomenes. One fatal battle obscured that happy dawn of power and glory, and for ever deprived him of the hopes of reinstating his city in her ancient splendour and original authority, which were incapable of subsisting after the abolition of those ancient laws and customs on which they had been found.

Corruption then resumed her former course, and daily gathered strength, till Sparta sunk to her last declension, in a very short space of time. It may therefore be justly said, that the bold views and enterprises of Cleomenes were the last struggles of its expiring liberty.

Antigonus left Sparta three days after he had entered it; and his departure was occasioned by the intelligence he had received, that a war had broken out in Macedonia, where the barbarians committed dreadful ravages. If this news had arrived three days sooner, Cleomenes might have been saved. Antigonus was already afflicted with a severe indisposition which at last ended in a deep consumption and a continual defluxion of humours, that carried him off two or three years after. He, however, would not suffer himself to be dejected by his ill state of health, and had even spirit enough to engage in new battles in his own kingdom. It is said, that after he had been victorious over the Illyrians, he was so transported with joy, that he frequently repeated these expressions, "O the glorious happy day!" and that he uttered this exclamation with so much exertion, that he burst a vein, and lost a large quantity of blood; this symptom was succeeded by a violent fever, which ended his days. Some time before his death, he settled the succession to his dominions in favour of Philip, the son of Demetrius, who was then fourteen years of age; or it may be rather said, that he returned him the sceptre, which had only been deposited in his hand.

Cleomenes, in the mean time, arrived at Alexandria, where he met with a very cold reception from the king, when he was first introduced into his presence. But after he had given that monarch proofs of his admirable sense, and shown in his common conversation the generous freedom, openness, and simplicity of the Spartan manners, tempered with a graceful politeness, in which there was nothing mean, and even a noble pride that became his birth and dignity, Ptolemy was then sensible of his merit, and esteemed him infinitely above all those courtiers who were only solicitous to please him by abject flatteries. He was even struck with confusion and remorse for having neglected so great a man, and for having abandoned him to Antigonus, who had raised his own reputation, and enlarged his power

C. 222. of Egypt then endeavoured to comfort and relieve Cleomenes, by treating him with every mark of honour, and giving him repeated assurances that he would send him into Greece with a fleet and a supply of money, and would re-establish him on the throne. He also assigned him a yearly pension of twenty-four talents (about 5000*l.* sterling), with which he supported himself and his friends, with the utmost frugality, reserving all the remainder of that allowance for the relief of those who retired into Egypt from Greece. Ptolemy, however, died before he could

This prince had reigned twenty-five years, and was the last of that race in whom any true virtue and moderation was conspicuous; for the generality of his successors were monsters of debauchery and wickedness. The prince whose character we are now describing, had made it his principal care to extend his dominions to the south, from the time of his concluding the peace with Syria. Accordingly he had extended it the whole length of the Red Sea, as well along the Arabian, as the Ethiopian coasts, and even to the straits which form a communication with the southern ocean. He was succeeded on the throne of Egypt by his son Ptolemy, surnamed Philopator.

up, were reduced to a very ruinous condition; and the famous Cdossus, which was esteemed one of the wonders of the world was thrown down and entirely destroyed. It is natural to think, that this earthquake spared neither private houses, nor public structures, nor even the temples of the gods. The loss sustained by it amounted to immense sums; and the Rhodians, reduced to the utmost distress, sent deputations to all the neighbouring princes, to implore relief. An emulation worthy of praise, and not to be paralleled in history, prevailed in favour of that deplorable city; and Hiero and Gelon in Sicily, and Ptolemy in Egypt, signalized themselves in a peculiar manner on that occasion. The two former of these princes contributed above one hundred talents, and erected two statues in the public square; one of which represented the people of Rhodes, and the other that of Syracuse; the former was crowned by the latter, to testify, as Polybius observes, that the Syracusans thought the opportunity of relieving the Rhodians a favour and obligation conferred upon themselves. Ptolemy, besides his other expenses, which amounted to a very considerable sum, supplied that people with 300 talents, a million bushels of corn, and materials sufficient for building ten galleys of five benches of oars, and as many more of three benches, besides an infinite quantity of timber for other buildings; all which donations were accompanied by 3000 talents for erecting the Colossus anew. Antigonus, Seleucus, Prusias, Mithridates, and all the princes as well as cities, signalized their liberality on this occasion. Even private persons were desirous of sharing in this glorious act of humanity; and historians have recorded that a lady whose name was Chryseis,¹ and who truly merited that appellation, furnished from her own substance 100,000 bushels of corn. Let the princes of these times, says Polybius, who imagine they have done gloriously in giving 4 or 5000 crowns, only consider how inferior their generosity is to that we have now described. Rhodes, in consequence of these liberalities, was re-established in a few years, in a more opulent and splendid state than she had ever experienced before, if we only except the Colossus.

This Colossus was a brazen statue of prodigious size, as I have already observed. Some authors have affirmed, that the money arising from the contributions already mentioned amounted to five times as much as the loss which the Rhodians had sustained. This people,² instead of employing the sums they had received in replacing that statue according to the intention of the donors, pretended that the oracle of Delphi had forbidden it, and given them a command to preserve that money for other purposes, by which they enriched themselves. The Colossus lay neglected on the ground for the space of 875 years: at the expiration of which (that is to say, in the 653d year of our Lord) Moawyas,³ the sixth caliph or emperor of the Saracens, made himself master of Rhodes, and sold this statue to a Jewish merchant, who loaded 900 camels with the metal; which computed by eight quintals for each load, after a deduction of the diminution which the statue had sustained by rust and very probably by theft, amounted to more than 806,000*l.* or 7200 quintals.

CHAPTER I.

SECTION I.—PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR REIGNS IN EGYPT. THE SHORT REIGN OF SELEUCUS CERAUNUS. HE IS SUCCEEDED BY HIS BROTHER ANTIGONUS, SURNAMED THE GREAT. ACHÆUS'S FIDELITY TO HIM. HERMIAS, HIS CHIEF MINISTER, FIRST REMOVES EPIGENES, THE ABLEST OF ALL HIS GENERALS, AND AFTERWARDS PUTS HIM TO DEATH. ANTIOCHUS SUBDUES THE REBELS IN THE EAST. HE RIDS HIMSELF OF HERMIAS. HE ATTEMPTS TO RECOVER CÆLE-SYRIA FROM PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR, AND POSSESSES HIMSELF OF THE STRONGEST CITIES IN IT. AFTER A SHORT TRUCE, A WAR BREAKS OUT AGAIN IN SYRIA. BATTLE OF RAPHAIA, IN WHICH ANTIOCHUS IS ENTIRELY DEFEATED. THE ANGER AND REVENGE OF PHILOPATOR AGAINST THE JEWS FOR REFUSING TO LET HIM ENTER THE SANCTUARY. ANTIOCHUS CONCLUDES A PEACE WITH PTOLEMY. HE TURNS HIS ARMS AGAINST ACHÆUS, WHO HAD REBELLED. HE AT LAST SEIZES HIM TREACHEROUSLY, AND PUTS HIM TO DEATH.

I OBSERVED in the preceding book,¹ that Ptolemy Philopator had succeeded Ptolemy Euergetes, his father, in Egypt. On the other side, Seleucus Callinicus was dead in Parthia. He had left two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus; and the first, who was the elder, succeeded to his father's throne, and assumed the surname of Ceraunus, or the Thunderer, a title very little suited to his character; for he was a very weak prince both in body and mind, and never did any actions that corresponded with the idea suggested by that name. His reign was short, and his authority but ill established, either in the army or the provinces. What prevented his losing it entirely was, that Achæus, his cousin, son to Andronachus, his mother's brother, a man of courage and abilities, assumed the management of his affairs, which his father's ill conduct had reduced to a very low ebb. As for Andronachus, he was taken by Ptolemy in a war with Callinicus, and kept prisoner in Alexandria, during all his reign and part of the following.

As there was no money to pay A. M. 3781. the forces, and the king was despised by the soldiers for his weakness, Nicanor and Apaturius, two of the chief officers, formed a conspiracy against him during his absence in Phrygia, and poisoned him. However, Achæus revenged that horrid action, by putting to death the two ringleaders, and all who had engaged in their plot. He acted afterwards with so much prudence and resolution with regard to the army, that he kept the soldiers in their obedience; and prevented Attalus from taking advantage of this accident, which, but for his excellent conduct, would have lost the Syrian empire all it still possessed on that side.

Seleucus dying without children, the army offered the crown to Achæus, and several of the provinces did the same. However he had the generosity to refuse it at that time, though he afterwards thought himself obliged to act in a different manner. In the present conjuncture, he had not only refused the crown, but preserved it carefully for the lawful heir, Antiochus, brother of the deceased king, who was but in his fifteenth year. Seleucus, at his setting out for Asia Minor, had sent him into Babylon¹, to be educated, where he was when his brother died. He was now brought from thence to Antioch, where he ascended the throne, and enjoyed it thirty-six years. For his illustrious actions he has been surnamed the Great. Achæus, to secure the succession in his favour, sent a detachment of the army to him in Syria, with Epigènes, one of the late king's most experienced generals. The rest of the forces he kept for the service of the state, in that part of the country where he himself was.

As soon as Antiochus was possessed of the crown, he sent Molo Ant. J. C. 222. and Alexander, two brothers, into the East, the former as governor of Media, and the latter of Persia. Achæus was appointed to preside over the provinces of Asia Minor. Epigènes had the command of the troops which were kept about the king's person; and Hermias the Carian was declared his prime minister, as he had been under his brother. Achæus soon recovered all the territories which Attalus had taken from the empire of Syria, and forced him to confine himself within his kingdom of Pergamus. Alexander and Molo, despising the king's youth, were no sooner fixed in their governments, than they refused to acknowledge him; and each declared himself sovereign in the province over which he had been appointed lieutenant. Hermias, by his ill treatment of them, had very much contributed to their revolt.

This minister was of a cruel disposition. The most inconsiderable faults were by him considered as crimes, and punished with the utmost rigour. He was a man of very little genius, but haughtily, full of himself, tenacious of his own opinion, and would have thought it a dishonour to have either asked or followed another man's advice. He could not bear that any person should share with him in credit and authority. Merit of every kind was suspected by, or rather was odious to him. But the chief object of his hatred was Epigènes, who had the reputation of being one of the ablest generals of his time, and in whom the troops reposed an entire confidence. It was this reputation which gave the prime minister umbrage; and it was not in his power to conceal the ill will he bore him.

² Polyb. l. v. p. 386.

News being brought of Molo's revolt, Antiochus assembled his council, in order to consider what was to be done in the present posture of affairs; and whether it would be advisable for him to march in person against that rebel, or turn towards Coele-syria, to check the enterprises of Ptolemy.

A. M. 3783
Ant. J. C. 221

Epigènes was the first who spoke, and declared that they had no time to lose: that it was absolutely necessary the king should go in person into the East, in order to take advantage of the most favourable conjunctures and opportunities for acting against the rebels; that when he should be on the spot, either Molo would not dare to attempt any thing in sight of his prince, and of an army; or in case he should persist in his design, the people, struck with the presence of their sovereign, in the return of their zeal and affection for him, would not fail to deliver him up; but that the most important point of all was, not to give him time to fortify himself. Hermias could not forbear interrupting him; and cried, in an angry and self-sufficient tone of voice, that to advise the king to march in person against Molo, with so inconsiderable a body of force, would be to deliver him up to the rebels. The real motive of his speaking in this manner was, his being afraid of sharing in the dangers of that expedition. Ptolemy was to him a much less formidable enemy. There was little to be feared from invading a prince entirely devoted to trivial pleasures. The advice of Hermias prevailed; the command of part of the troops was given to Xenon and Theodotus, with orders to carry on the war against Molo; and the king himself marched with the rest of the army towards Coele-syria.

Being come to Seleucia near Zeugma, he there found Laodice, daughter of Mithridates king of Pontus, who was brought thither to espouse him. He made some stay there to solemnize his nuptials, the joy of which was soon interrupted by the news brought from the East, viz. that his generals, unable to make head against Molo and Alexander, who had united their forces, had been forced to retire, and leave them masters of the field of battle. Antiochus then saw the error he had committed, in not following Epigènes's advice; and thereupon was for laying aside the enterprise against Coele-syria, in order to march with all his troops to suppress that revolt. But Hermias persisted as obstinately as ever in his first opinion. He fancied he spoke wonders, in declaring, in an emphatic, sententious manner, "That it became kings to march in person against kings, and to send their lieutenants against rebels." Antiochus was so weak as to acquiesce in Hermias's opinion.

It is scarce possible to conceive how useless experience of every kind is to an indolent prince, who lives without reflection. This artful, insinuating and deceitful minister, who knew how to adapt himself to all the desires and inclinations of his master, inventive and industrious in finding out new methods to please and amuse, had had the cunning to make himself necessary, by easing his prince of the weight of the public business; so that Antiochus imagined he could not do without him. And though he perceived several things in his conduct and councils which gave him disgust, he would not give himself the trouble to examine strictly into them; nor had resolution enough to resume the authority he had in a manner abandoned to him. So that acquiescing again in his opinion on this occasion, (not from conviction but weakness and indolence), he contented himself with sending a general and a body of troops into the East; and himself resumed the expedition of Coele-syria.

The generals he sent on that occasion was Xenatas the Achean, in whose commission it was ordered that the two former generals should resign to him the command of their forces, and serve under him. He had never commanded in chief before, and his only merit was, his being the prime minister's friend and creature. Raised to an employment to which his vanity and presumption could never have emboldened him to aspire, he behaved with haughtiness.

to the other officers, and with boldness and temerity to the enemy. The success was such as might be expected from so ill a choice. In passing the Tigris he fell into an ambuscade, into which the enemy drew him by stratagem, and himself and all his army were cut to pieces. This victory opened to the rebels the province of Babylonia and all Mesopotamia, of which they, by this means, possessed themselves without any opposition.

Antiochus, in the mean time, had advanced into Coele-syria, as far as the valley lying between the two ridges of the mountains Libanus and Antilibanus. He found the passes of these mountains so strongly fortified, and so well defended by Theodotus the Ætolian, to whom Ptolemy had confided the government of this province, that he was obliged to march back, finding it not possible for him to advance farther. There is no doubt but the news of the defeat of his troops in the East hastened also his retreat. He assembled his council, and again debated on the rebellion. Epigenes, after saying, in a modest tone, that it would have been most advisable to have marched at first against them, to prevent their having time to fortify themselves as they had done, added, that the same reason ought to make them more expeditious now, and devote their whole care and study to a war, which, if neglected, might terminate in the ruin of the empire. Hermias, who thought himself affronted by this discourse, began to exclaim against Epigenes in the most opprobrious terms on this occasion. He conjured the king not to lay aside the enterprise of Coele-syria, affirming that he could not abandon it, without evincing a levity and inconstancy entirely unbecoming a prince of his wisdom and knowledge. The whole council hung down their heads through shame; and Antiochus himself was much dissatisfied. It was unanimously resolved to march with the utmost speed against the rebels: and Hermias, finding that all resistance would be in vain, grew immediately quite another man. He came over with great zeal to the general opinion, and seemed more ardent than any body for hastening its execution. Accordingly the troops set out towards Apamea, where the rendezvous was fixed.

They had scarce set out, when a sedition arose in the army on account of the soldiers' arrears. This unlucky accident threw the king into the utmost consternation and anxiety; and indeed the danger was imminent. Hermias, seeing the king in such perplexity, comforted him, and promised to pay immediately the whole arrears due to the army: but at the same time earnestly besought Antiochus not to take Epigenes with him in this expedition, because, after the noise their quarrels had made, it would no longer be possible for them to act in concert in the operations of the war, as the good of the service might require. His view in this was, to begin by lessening Antiochus's esteem and affection for Epigenes by absence, well knowing that princes soon forget the virtues and services of a man removed from their sight.

This proposal perplexed the king very much, who was perfectly sensible how necessary the presence of a general of Epigenes's experience and ability was in so important an expedition. But, as Hermias had industriously contrived to besiege, and in a manner gain possession of him by all manner of methods, such as suggesting to him pretended plans of economy, watching his every action, and bribing his affection by obsequiousness and adulation, that unhappy prince was no longer his own master. The king therefore consented, though with the utmost reluctance, to what he required; and Epigenes was accordingly ordered to retire to Apamea. This event surprised and terrified all the courtiers, who were apprehensive of the same fate: but the soldiers having received all their arrears, were very easy; and thought themselves highly obliged to the prime minister, by whose means they had been paid. Having in this manner made himself master of the nobles by fear, and of the army by their pay, he marched with the king.

As Epigenes's disgrace extended only to his removal, it was far from satiating his vengeance; and as it did not calm his uneasiness with regard to the future, he was apprehensive that he might obtain leave to return; to prevent which he employed effectual means. Alexis, governor of the citadel of Apamea, was entirely at his devotion; and, indeed, how few would be otherwise with regard to an all-powerful minister, the sole dispenser of his master's favours! Hermias orders this man to despatch Epigenes, and prescribes him the manner. In consequence of this, Alexis bribes one of Epigenes's domestics; and, by gifts and promises, engages him to slide a letter he gave him among his master's papers. This letter seemed to have been written and subscribed by Molo, one of the chiefs of the rebels, who thanked Epigenes for having formed a conspiracy against the king, and communicated to him the methods by which he might safely put it in execution. Some days after Alexis went to him, and asked whether he had not received a letter from Molo? Epigenes, surprised at this question, expressed his astonishment, and at the same time the highest indignation. The other replied, that he was ordered to inspect his papers. Accordingly, a search being made, the forged letter was found; and Epigenes, without being called to a trial, or otherwise examined, was put to death. The king, at the bare sight of the letter, imagined that the charge had been fully proved against him. However, the courtiers thought otherwise; but fear kept them all tongue-tied and dumb. How unhappy, and how much to be pitied, are princes!

Although the season was now very far advanced, Antiochus passed the Euphrates, assembled all his forces; and that he might be nearer at hand to open the campaign very early the next spring, he in the mean time sent them into winter-quarters in the neighbourhood.

Upon the return of the spring he marched them towards the Tigris, A. M. 3784. passed that river, forced Molo to Ant. J. C. 220. come to an engagement, and gained so complete a victory over him, that the rebel seeing all lost, in despair laid violent hands on himself. His brother Alexander was at that time in Persia, where Neolas, another of their brothers, who escaped out of this battle, brought him the mournful news. Finding their affairs desperate, they first killed their mother, afterwards their wives and children, and at last despatched themselves, to prevent their falling into the hands of the conqueror. Such was the end of this rebellion, which proved the ruin of all who engaged in it: a just reward for all those who dare to take up arms against their sovereign.

After this victory, the remains of the vanquished army submitted to the king, who only reprimanded them in very severe terms, and afterwards pardoned them. He then sent them into Media, under the command of those to whose care he had committed the government of that province; and returning from thence to Seleucia on the Tigris, he spent some time there in giving the orders necessary for re-establishing his authority in the provinces which had revolted, and for settling all things on their former foundation.

This being done by persons whom he appointed for that purpose, he marched against the Atopians, who inhabited the country situated to the west of Media, and which is now called Georgia. Their king, Artabazanes by name, was a decrepit old man, who was so greatly terrified at Antiochus's approach at the head of a victorious army, that he sent and made his submission, and concluded a peace on such conditions as Antiochus thought proper to prescribe.

News came at this time, that the queen was delivered of a son, A. M. 3785. which proved a subject of joy to Ant. J. C. 219. the court as well as the army. Her-ἡ Πηνελόπειος δὲ καὶ προστεταλμένης οὐκ ἐνόησε, καὶ θάλασσαν, καὶ θάλασσαν, καὶ τὴν ἑρμίου κακὴν οὐκ ἐνόησε. Circumventus et praeoccupatus aconomitis, et caecotidis, et obsequiis, Hermia malignitate, sui non erat dominus. This is a literal translation, minas, from that moment, revolved in his mind how he might despatch Antiochus; in hopes that, after his death, he should certainly be appointed guardian of the young prince; and that, in his name, he might reign, with unlimited power. His pride and insolence had made him odious to all men. The people groaned under a government, which the avarice and cruelty of the prime minister had rendered insupportable. Their complaints did not reach the throne, the avenues to which were all closed against them. No one dared to inform the king of the oppression under which his people groaned. It was well known that he dreaded inspecting the truth; and that he abandoned to Hermias's cruelty all who dared to speak against him. Till now he had been an utter stranger to the injustice and violence which Hermias exercised under his name. At last, however, he began to open his eyes; but was himself afraid of his minister, on whom he had made himself dependent, and who had assumed an absolute authority over him, by taking advantage of the indolence of this prince's disposition, who, at first, was well pleased with transferring the burden of public affairs from himself to Hermias.

Apollonides, his physician, in whom the king reposed great confidence, and who, by his employment, had free access to him, took a proper time to represent the general discontent of his subjects, and the danger to which himself was exposed, by the ill conduct of his prime minister. He therefore warned Antiochus to take care of himself, lest the same fate should attend him as his brother had experienced in Phrygia; who fell a victim to the ambition of those on whom he most relied; that it was plain Hermias was hatching some ill design; and that to prevent it not a moment was to be lost. These were real services, which an officer who is attached to the person of his king, and who has a sincere affection for him, may and ought to perform. Such is the use he ought to make of the free access which his sovereign vouchsafes, and the confidence with which he honours him.

Antiochus was surrounded by courtiers whom he had loaded with his favours, of whom not one had the courage to hazard his fortune by telling him the truth. It has been very justly said, that one of the greatest blessings which God can bestow on kings, is to deliver them from the tongues of flatterers, and the silence of good men.

The king, as has been already observed, had begun to entertain some suspicions of his chief minister, but had not revealed his thoughts to any person, not knowing whom to trust. He was extremely well pleased that his physician had given him this advice; and concerted measures with him to rid himself of a minister so universally detested, and so dangerous. Accordingly he removed to some small distance from the army, upon pretence of being indisposed, and carried Hermias with him to bear him company; here taking him to walk in a solitary place, where none of his creatures could come to his assistance, he caused him to be assassinated. His death caused a universal joy throughout the whole empire. This haughty and cruel man had governed, on all occasions, with great cruelty and violence; and whoever dared to oppose either his opinions or designs, were sure to fall a victim to his resentment. Accordingly, he was universally hated; and this hatred displayed itself more strongly in Apamea than in any other place: for the instant the news was brought of his death, all the citizens rose with the utmost fury, and stoned his wife and children.

Antiochus, having so happily re-established his affairs in the East, and raised to the government of the several provinces persons of merit, in whom he could repose the greatest confidence, marched back his army into Syria, and put it into winter-quarters. He spent the remainder of the year in Antioch, in holding frequent councils with his ministers, on the operations of the ensuing campaign.

This prince had two other very dangerous enterprises still to put in execution, for re-establishing entirely the safety and glory of the empire of Syria one was against Ptolemy, to recover Cœle-syria; and the other against Achæus, who had lately usurped the sovereignty of Asia Minor.

Ptolemy Evergetes having seized upon all Cœle-syria, in the beginning of Seleucus Callinicus's reign, as was before related, the king of Egypt was still possessed of a great part of that province, and Antiochus was not a little incommoded by such a neighbour.

With respect to Achæus, we have already seen in what manner he refused the crown which was offered him after the death of Seleucus Ceraunus; and had placed it on the head of Antiochus the lawful monarch, who, to reward his fidelity and services had appointed him governor of all the provinces of Asia Minor. By his valour and good conduct he had recovered them all from Attalus, king of Pergamus, who had seized upon those countries, and fortified himself strongly in them. Such a series of success drew upon him the envy of the nobles. A report was spread at the court of Antiochus that he intended to usurp the crown; and with that view held a secret correspondence with Ptolemy. Whether these suspicions were well grounded or not, he thought it advisable to prevent the evil designs of his enemies; and, therefore, taking the crown which he had refused before, he caused himself to be declared king.

He soon became one of the most powerful monarchs of Asia, and every state solicited very earnestly his alliance. This was evident in a war which then broke out between the Rhodians and the Byzantines, on occasion of a tribute which the latter had imposed on all the ships that passed through the straits; a tribute which was very grievous to the Rhodians, because of the great trade they carried on in the Black Sea. Achæus, at the earnest solicitations of the inhabitants of Byzantium, had promised to assist them; and this report threw the Rhodians into the utmost consternation, as well as Prusias king of Bithynia, whom they had engaged on their side. In the extreme perplexity they were under, they thought of an expedient to disengage Achæus from the Byzantines, and to bring him over to their interest. Andromachus, his father, brother to Laodice, whom Seleucus had married, was at that time prisoner in Alexandria. The Rhodians sent a deputation to Ptolemy, requesting that he might be set at liberty. The king, who was very glad to oblige Achæus, as it was in his power to furnish him with considerable succours against Antiochus, with whom he was engaged in war, readily granted the Rhodians their request, and put Andromachus into their hands. This was a very agreeable present to Achæus, and made the Byzantines lose all hopes. They thereupon consented to reinstate things upon their former footing, and to take off the new tribute which had occasioned the war. Thus a peace was concluded between the two states, and Achæus had all the honour of it.

It was against that prince and Ptolemy that Antiochus was resolved to turn his arms.¹ These were A. M. 3785. Ant. J. C. 219. the two dangerous wars he had to sustain; and the subject of the deliberations of his council was, which of them he should undertake first. After weighing all things maturely, it was resolved to march first against Ptolemy, before they attacked Achæus, whom they then only menaced in the strongest terms; and accordingly all the forces were ordered to assemble in Apamea, in order to be employed against Cœle-syria.

In a council that was held before the army set out Apollonides, the king's physician, represented to him, that it would be a great oversight should they march into Cœle-syria, and leave behind them Seleucia in the hands of the enemy, and so near the capital of the empire. His opinion brought over the whole council, by the evident strength of the reasons which supported it: for this city stands on the same river as Antioch, and it is but five leagues below, near the mouth of it. When Ptolemy Evergetes undertook the invasion already mentioned, to avenge the death of his sister Berenice, he seized that city, and put a strong Egyptian garrison into it, which kept possession of that important place full twenty-seven years. Among many inconveniences to which it subjected the inhabitants of Antioch, one was, its cutting off entirely their communication with the sea, and ruining all their trade; for Seleucia being situated near the mouth of the Orontes, was the harbour of Antioch, which suffered grievously by that means. All these reasons being clearly and strongly urged by Apollonides, determined the king and council to follow his plan, and to open the campaign with the siege of Seleucia. Accordingly the whole army marched thither, invested it, took it by storm, and drove the Egyptians out of it.

This being done, Antiochus marched with diligence into Coele-syria, where Theodotus the Etolian, governor of that province under Ptolemy, promised to put him in possession of the whole country. We have seen how vigorously he had repulsed him the year before; nevertheless, the court of Egypt had not been satisfied with his services on that occasion. Those who governed the king, had expected greater things from his valour; and were persuaded, that it was in his power to have done something more. Accordingly he was sent for to Alexandria, to give an account of his conduct; and was threatened with no less than losing his head. It is true that, after his reasons had been heard, he was acquitted, and sent back to his government. However, he could not forgive the insult which had been offered to him by the unjust accusation, and was so exasperated at the affront, that he resolved to revenge it.

The luxury and effeminacy of the whole court, to which he had been an eye-witness, heightened still more his indignation and resentment. He could not bear the idea of being dependent on the caprice of so base and contemptible a set of people. And, indeed, it would be impossible for fancy to conceive more abominable excesses than those in which Philopator plunged himself during his whole reign; and the court imitated but too exactly the example he set them. It was thought that he had poisoned his father, whence he was, by an antiphrasis, ironically surnamed Philopator.¹ He publicly caused Berenice his mother, and Magas his only brother, to be put to death. After he had got rid of all those who could either give him good counsel or excite his jealousy, he abandoned himself to the most infamous pleasures; and was solely intent on gratifying his luxury, brutality, and the most shameful passions. His prime minister was Sosibius, a man every way qualified for the service of such a master as Philopator; and one whose sole view was to support himself in power by any means whatsoever. The reader will naturally imagine, that, in such a court, the power of women had no bounds.

Theodotus could not bear to be dependent on such people, and therefore resolved to find a sovereign more worthy of his services. Accordingly, he was no sooner returned to his government, than he seized upon the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais, declared for king Antiochus, and immediately despatched the courier above mentioned to invite him thither.

Nicolaus, one of Ptolemy's generals, though he was of the same country with Theodotus, would not however desert Ptolemy, but preserved his fidelity to that prince. The instant therefore that Theodotus had taken Ptolemais, he besieged him in it, possessed himself of the passes of mount Libanus to stop Antiochus, who was advancing to the aid of Theodotus, and defended them to the last extremity. However, he was at length forced to abandon them, by which means Antiochus took possession of Tyre and Ptolemais, whose gates were opened to him by Theodotus.

In these two cities were the magazines which Ptolemy had laid up for the use of his army, with a fleet of forty sail. He gave the command of these ships to Diognetus, his admiral, who was ordered to sail to Pelusium, whither the king intended to march by land, with the view of invading Egypt on that side:

however, being informed that this was the season in which the inhabitants used to lay the country under water, by opening the dikes of the Nile, and consequently, that it would be impossible for him to advance into Egypt at that time, he abandoned that project, and employed the whole force of his arms to reduce the rest of Coele-syria. He seized upon some fortresses, and others submitted to him; and at last he possessed himself of Damascus,^{2 3} the capital of that province, after having deceived Dion the governor of it by a stratagem.

² There is no city at this day, perhaps, which can claim an antiquity equal to that of Damascus, or which, after having survived so many revolutions, and been subjected to so many political vicissitudes, still remains a great, populous, and wealthy city. Its antiquity extends to high forty centuries at least, being as ancient as the days of the renowned Abraham, who was at once the friend of God, the father of the faithful, the remote ancestor of the Messiah, and the progenitor of the Hebrews, Edomites, and Bedouin Arabs. The beauty of its situation, the fertility and extent of its plains, the purity and salubrity of its streams, the famed Pharpar and Abana, together with the lofty and snow-clad peaks of the hoary Antilibanus, which bound the plain to the west, have ever contributed to render it a place of desirable habitation, even under the iron yoke of a government the most destructive of happiness and improvement of any that have cursed the human race. The best description of this city and environs, as well as of the Palatium of Damascus, is to be found in the Travels of Lewis Burckhardt, who has exhausted the subject in the second volume of his travels.

Damascus lies between two principal streams, which actually correspond to the Abana and Pharpar—namely, the Barrady, and the river of Hasbeia—both coming from the Antilibanus, the former from the north-west, the latter from the south-west; but which of these is the Abana is impossible to determine. The south-west stream rises at the foot of the range that separates it from the source of the Jordan, and the Barrady from that which shuts up the valley of Heliopolis, or Balbec, on the east, separating it from the plain of Damascus. These twin streams are increased by many others in their passage to the city. Instead of two streams—the Abana and Pharpar—Ptolemy has only one noted in his Table of Syria, as the river of Damascus, the Chrysorrheas, or Golden river, and probably the same with the Barrady, or north-west river. After passing through Damascus, the Barrady follows a north-east course, and falls into a salt lake, called Bahr-el-Margi, or Lake of the Meadows, as also the other. So well is the city supplied with water, that almost every house has a fountain—many of them constructed of marble, and containing fish. The streams are turned off through every street to water the gardens and orchards.

Damascus itself, exclusive of its extensive suburbs, is not above three miles in circuit, surrounded by a double wall, with round towers at intervals, in a very decayed state—apparently built on the site of the ancient Sarcenic fortifications. Formerly, there was a ditch, at present almost completely filled up with rubbish, and the mean ill-built walls afford but small protection to the city. The castle is in the south-west angle of the city; is a good building, of a square form—each side being 200 yards long, and flanked by twelve square towers, placed at the angles, and at intervals in the sides. The height of its walls exceeds eighty feet; they are admirably well built—most probably by the Sarcenic Khalifs, and are in excellent preservation.

The city has nine gates, and is divided into twenty-three districts, each under its own magistrate. One of these, called Bab-al-Sharke, or the Gate of the East, is also called the Gate of St. Paul; not because he entered the city there, but because a Christian church, in honour of the apostle, was erected there; and because the street called Straight, in the Acts of the Apostles, and where Judas dwelt, in whose house the astonished and newly created apostle lodged, and where Ananias was directed to find him, commences here.

The houses of Damascus are principally built of mud and wooden rafters, and sometimes of small sun-dried bricks—and very rarely the lower parts are of stone; so that when a violent rain falls, the city looks like a quagmire. But though their external appearance is mean, yet internally, the houses are large and commodious; and contain, among the higher classes, a great display of wealth and magnificence—the furniture in many rising in value from 5,000*l.* to 25,000*l.* sterling—consisting of large divans and sofas of the richest silk, embroidered with pearl; Persian carpets, mirrors, &c. In the interior there is generally a large square court, beautified with orange and lemon trees; marble fountains, and divans floored with marble, richly gilded, and furnished with cushions and carpets.

The principal mosque was once a large Christian church dedicated to St. John the Baptist, built in the early ages of

The last action of this campaign was the siege of Dora, a maritime city, in the neighbourhood of mount Carmel. This place, which was strongly situated, had been so well fortified by Nicolaus, that it was impossible for Antiochus to take it. He therefore was forced to agree to a four month's truce, proposed to him in the name of Ptolemy; and this served as an honourable pretence for marching back his army to Seleucia on the Orontes, where he put it into winter-quarters. Antiochus appointed Theodotus the Ætolian governor of all the places he had conquered in this country.

During the interval of this truce a treaty was negotiated between the two crowns,¹ in which, however, the only view of both parties was to gain time. Ptolemy had occasion for it, in order to make the necessary preparations for carrying on the war; and Antiochus for reducing Achaens. The latter was not satisfied with Asia Minor, of which he was already master; but had no less in view than to dethrone Antiochus, and to dispossess him of all his dominions. To check his ambitious views, it was necessary for Antiochus not to be employed on the frontiers, or engage in remote conquests.

In this treaty, the main point was to know to whom Coele-syria, Phœnicia, Samaria, and Judæa, had been given, in the partition of Alexander the Great's empire, between Ptolemy, Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, after the death of Antigonus, in the battle of Ipsus. Ptolemy laid claim to them by virtue of their having been assigned by this treaty to Ptolemy Soter, his great-grandfather. On the other side, Antiochus pretended that they had been given to Seleucus Nicator; and therefore that they were his right, he being heir and successor of that king in the empire of Syria. Another difficulty embarrassed the commissioners, Ptolemy would have Achaens included in the treaty, which Antiochus opposed absolutely, alleging that it was a shameful and infamous thing, for a king like Ptolemy to espouse the party of rebels, and countenance revolt.

During these contests, in which A. M. 3786, neither side would yield to the Ant. J. C. 218. other, the time of the truce elapsed; and nothing being concluded, it became necessary to have recourse again to arms. Nicolaus the Ætolian had given so many proofs of valour and fidelity in the last campaign, that Ptolemy gave him the command in chief of his army, and charged him with every thing relating to the service of the king, in those provinces which were the occasion of the war. Perigenes, the admiral, put to sea with the fleet, in order to act against the enemy on that side. Nicolaus appointed Gaza for the rendezvous of all his forces, whither all the necessary provisions had been sent from Egypt. From thence he marched to mount Libanus, where he seized all the passes between that chain of mountains and the sea, by which Antiochus was necessarily obliged to pass: firmly resolved to wait for him there, and to stop his march, by the superiority which the advantageous posts he occupied gave him.

In the mean time Antiochus was not inactive, but made every preparation both by sea and land for a vigorous invasion. He gave the command of his fleet to Diognetus, his admiral, and put himself at the head of his land forces. The fleets on both sides kept along the coast, and followed the army; so that the naval as well as the land forces met at the passes which Nicolaus had seized. Whilst Antiochus attacked Nicolaus by land, the fleets also came to an engagement; so that the battle began both by sea and land at the same time. At sea neither party had the superiority; but on land Antiochus had the advantage, and forced Nicolaus to retire to Sidon, after losing 4000 of his soldiers, who were either killed or taken prisoners. Perigenes followed him thither with the Egyptian fleet, and Antiochus pursued them to that city both by sea and land, with the design of besieging them in it. He found, however, that this conquest would be attended with too many difficulties, because of the great number of troops in the city, where they had a great number of provisions, and other necessities; and he was not willing to besiege it in form. He therefore sent his fleet to Tyre, and marched into Galilee. After having made himself master of it by the taking of several cities, he passed the river Jordan, entered Gilead, and possessed himself of all that part of the country, which a large division. There are also silk bazaars, and a large display of rich articles of commerce. In the city are several manufactures of soap, glass, lamps, satins, cottons, large round tents, a manufacture of cutlery; and on the river are many water-mills and tan-yards.

Damascus was long celebrated for its steel manufactures, Tamerlane, on his conquest of Syria, conveyed all these into Persia. Since that time they have been little memorable; and yet we are told, that, in the 17th century, above 20,000 artificers were solely employed in making sword blades, worth fifteen French crowns a piece; and that the water of the Barrady was excellent for tempering hard metal. These sabres were, formerly, of the highest reputation in Europe and the East. They seem to have been constructed by a method now lost, of alternate layers of iron and steel, two or three lines thick. They never broke, though bent in the most violent manner, and yet retained the utmost power of edge; so that common iron, or even steel, would divide under their force.

The population of Damascus has been estimated, by the late Mr. Brown, at upwards of 200,000 souls, in the year 1797, and was then on the increase. While Turkish misgovernment has diminished the agricultural population, it has increased that of the towns. In the territory of Aleppo, where a century since were above 300 villages, there now remain no more than ten or twelve.

In the middle of the city is a mosque, which has a minaret covered with green tiles. Several remains of Grecian architecture are still to be found in the city. Numerous charitable establishments exist there, especially an hospital for pilgrims, built by sultan Soliman, who took Rhodes. It is a vast quadrangle, lined with a colonnade, and entirely roofed, in small domes, covered with lead, and has numerous chambers for receiving pilgrims of all religions, who are maintained for three days there at the sultan's expense. It has also a large chamber for poor students, and a stable for the pilgrims' horses. The mosque belonging to it is grand. The entrance is supported by four large columns of red granite. It is covered with a cupola, and has two minarets. A handsome garden lies adjacent. The kitchen on the side of the hospital opposite the mosque is suited to the grandeur of the establishment.

Damascus has numerous bazaars, larger than those of Aleppo. Some of them are covered and well built. The largest bazaar is that of Sinnenin, built by Sinan Pasha, consisting of eighteen arches, with shops on each side. The shops are well furnished with every commodity for sale. Each trade, or art, has its peculiar quarter: the boot and slipper makers, as well as those engaged in saddlery, occupy

Damascus is graced twice a year with the grand procession of the pilgrims going to, and returning from Mecca, under the protection of the Pasha. Mr. Brown witnessed the return in 1797; while at Damascus, and seems to have been delighted with the spectacle. The street was lined for several miles (for such is its length) with innumerable spectators, anxious to view the magnificent display. The expense of this caravan, from Damascus to the city of the prophet, cost the Sultan, annually, 300,000 sterling, and the Pasha 60,000 sterling. Of the number of Christians of various sects at Damascus, no estimate can be given. There are three convents of Catholics. The Damascenes were formerly much averse to maritime commerce, and it is only of late that they adventured to send goods by sea to Constantinople. Damascus lies 300 British miles south-south-west of Aleppo, in direct distance, and nearly the same distance from Antakia. (Antioch,) 100 miles east of Tyre, 40 miles south-east of Balbec, and is in 33° 37' north latitude, and 36° 27' east longitude, of Greenwich.]

was formerly the inheritance of the tribes of Reuben and Gad and half the tribe of Manasseh.

The season was now too far advanced to prolong the campaign, for which reason he returned back by the river Jordan, left the government of Samaria to Hippolochus and Kereas, who had deserted Ptolemy's service, and came over to him; and he gave them 5000 men to keep it in subjection. He marched the rest of the forces back to Ptolemais, where he put them into winter-quarters.

The campaign was again opened

A. M. 3787. in spring,¹ Ptolemy caused 70,000 foot, 5000 horse, and seventy-three elephants, to advance towards Pelusium. He placed himself at the head of these forces, and marched them through the deserts which divide Egypt from Palestine, and encamped at Raphia, between Rhinocorura and Gaza, at the latter of which cities the two armies met. That of Antiochus was something more numerous than the other. His forces consisted of 72,000 foot, 6000 horse, and 102 elephants. He first encamped within ten furlongs,² and soon after within five, of the enemy. All the time they lay so near one another there were perpetual skirmishes between the parties who went to fetch fresh water or to forage, as well as between individuals who wished to distinguish themselves.

Theodotus the Etolian, who had served many years under the Egyptians, entered their camp, favoured by the darkness of the night, accompanied only by two persons. He was taken for an Egyptian; so that he advanced as far as Ptolemy's tent, with a design to kill him, and by that bold action to put an end to the war; but the king happening not to be in his tent, he killed his first physician, having mistaken him for Ptolemy. He also wounded two other persons; and during the alarm and noise which this attempt occasioned, he escaped to his camp.

At last the two kings, resolving to decide their quarrel, drew up their armies in battle-array. They rode from one body to another, at the head of their lines, to animate their troops. Arsinoe, the sister and wife of Ptolemy, was not content with exhorting the soldiers to behave manfully before the battle, but did not leave her husband even during the heat of the engagement. The issue of it was, that Antiochus, at the head of his right wing, defeated the enemy's left. But whilst hurried on by an inconsiderate ardour, he engaged too warmly in the pursuit; Ptolemy, who had been as successful in the other wing, charged Antiochus's centre in flank, which was then uncovered; and broke it before it was possible for that prince to come to its relief. An old officer, who saw which way the dust flew, concluded that the centre was defeated, and accordingly made Antiochus observe it. But though he faced about that instant, he came too late to amend his fault; and found the rest of his army broken and put to flight. He himself was now obliged to provide for his retreat, and retired to Raphia, and afterwards to Gaza, with the loss of 10,000 men killed, and 4,000 taken prisoners. Finding it would now be impossible for him to maintain himself in that country against Ptolemy, he abandoned all his conquests, and retreated to Antioch with the remains of his army. This battle of Raphia was fought at the same time with that in which Hannibal defeated Flaminius the consul on the banks of the lake Thrasymenus in Etruria.

After Antiochus's retreat, all Coele-syria and Palestine submitted with great cheerfulness to Ptolemy. Having been long subject to the Egyptians, they were more attached to them than to Antiochus. The conqueror's court was soon crowded with ambassadors from all the cities (and from Judea among the rest) to make their submission, and to offer him presents; and all met with a gracious reception.

Ptolemy was desirous of making a progress through the conquered provinces,³ and among other cities, he visited Jerusalem. He saw the temple there,⁴ and even offered sacrifices to the God of Israel; making at the same time oblations, and bestowing considerable gifts. However, not being satisfied with viewing it from the outward court, beyond which no Gentile was allowed to go, he was desirous to enter the sanctuary, and even as far as the Holy of Holies; to which no one was allowed access but the high-priest; and that but once every year, on the great day of expiation. The report of this being soon spread, occasioned a great tumult. The high-priest informed him of the holiness of the place; and the express law of God, by which he was forbidden to enter it. The priests and Levites drew together in a body to oppose his rash design, which the people also conjured him to lay aside. And now all places echoed with lamentations, occasioned by the idea of the profanation to which their temple would be exposed; and in all places the people were lifting up their hands to implore Heaven not to suffer it. However, all this opposition, instead of prevailing with the king, only inflamed his curiosity the more. He forced his way as far as the second court; but as he was preparing to enter the temple itself, God struck him with a sudden terror, which threw him into such prodigious disorder, that he was carried off half dead. After this he left the city, highly exasperated against the Jewish nation, on account of the accident which had befallen him, and loudly threatened it with his vengeance. He accordingly kept his word; and the following year raised a cruel persecution, especially against the Jews of Alexandria, whom he endeavoured to reduce by force to worship false deities.

The instant that Antiochus, after the battle of Raphia,⁵ arrived in Antioch, he sent an embassy to Ptolemy, to sue for peace. The circumstance which prompted him to this was, his suspecting the fidelity of his people; for he could not but perceive that his credit and authority were very much lessened since his last defeat. Besides, it was high time for him to turn his arms towards Achaëa, and check the progress he made, which increased daily. To obviate the danger which threatened him on that side, he concluded that it would be most expedient for him to make a peace upon any terms with Ptolemy, to avoid being opposed by two such powerful enemies, who, invading him on both sides, would certainly overpower him at last. He therefore invested his ambassadors with full power to give up to Ptolemy all those provinces which were the subject of their contest, i. e. Coele-syria and Palestine. Coele-syria included that part of Syria which lies between the mountains Libanus and Antilibanus; and Palestine all the country which anciently was the inheritance of the children of Israel; and the coast of these two provinces was what the Greeks called Phœnicia. Antiochus consented to resign up all this country to the king of Egypt, to purchase a peace at this juncture; choosing rather to give up this part of his dominions, than hazard the losing them all. A truce was therefore agreed upon for twelve months; and before the expiration of that time, a peace was concluded on these terms. Ptolemy, who might have taken advantage of this victory, and have conquered all Syria, was desirous of putting an end to the war, that he might have an opportunity of devoting himself entirely to his pleasures. His subjects, knowing his want of spirit and effeminacy, could not conceive how it had been possible for him to have been so successful; and at the same time they were displeased at his having concluded a peace, by which he had tied up his hands. The discontent they conceived on this account was the chief source of the subsequent disorders in Egypt, which at last rose to an open rebellion: so that Ptolemy, by endeavouring to avoid a foreign war, drew one upon himself in the centre of his own dominions.

books of Scripture, any more than the fourth. They are prior, with regard to the order of time, to the two first. Dr. Prideaux, speaking of the third book, says, that the ground-work of the story is true, though the author has changed some circumstances of it by intermixing fabulous incidents.

Antiochus,¹ after having concluded a peace with Ptolemy, devoted his whole attention to the war against Achæus, and made all the preparations necessary for taking the field. At last he passed mount Taurus, and entered Asia Minor with an intention to subdue it. Here he concluded a treaty with Attalus king of Pergamus, by virtue of which they united their forces against their common enemy. They attacked him with so much vigour, that he abandoned the open country to them, and shut himself up in Sardis, to which Antiochus laying siege, Achæus held it out above a year. He often made sallies, and a great many battles were fought under the walls of the city. At last, by a stratagem of Ligoras, one of Antiochus's commanders, Sardis was taken; Achæus retired into the citadel, where he defended himself till he was delivered up by two traitorous Cretans. This fact is worthy of notice, and confirms the truth of the proverb, which said that the Cretans were liars and knaves.²

Ptolemy Philopator had made a treaty with Achæus,³ and was very sorry for his being so closely blocked up in the castle of Sardis; and therefore commanded Sosibius to relieve him at any rate whatsoever. There was then in Ptolemy's court a very cunning Cretan, Bolis by name, who had lived a considerable time at Sardis. Sosibius consulted this man, and asked whether he could not think of some method for Achæus's escape. The Cretan desired time to consider of it; and returning to Sosibius, offered to undertake it, and explained to him the manner in which he intended to proceed. He told him that he had an intimate friend, who was also his near relation, Cambylus by name, a captain in the Cretan troops in Antiochus's service; that he commanded at that time in a fort behind the castle of Sardis, and that he would prevail with him to let Achæus escape that way. His project being approved, he was sent with the utmost speed to Sardis to put it in execution, and ten talents⁴ were given him to defray his expenses, and a much more considerable sum promised him in case he succeeded. After his arrival, he communicates the affair to Cambylus, when those two miscreants agree (for their greater advantage) to go and reveal their design to Antiochus. They offered that prince, as they themselves had determined, to play their parts so well, that instead of procuring Achæus's escape, they would bring him to him, upon condition of receiving a considerable reward, to be divided between them, as well as the ten talents which Bolis had already received.

Antiochus was overjoyed at this proposal, and promised them a reward that sufficed to engage them to do him that important service.

Upon this Bolis, by Cambylus's assistance, easily got admission into the castle, where the credentials he produced from Sosibius, and some other of Achæus's friends, gained him the entire confidence of that ill-fated prince. Accordingly he trusted himself to those two wretches, who, the instant he was out of the castle, seized and delivered him to Antiochus. This king caused him to be immediately beheaded, and thereby put an end to that war of Asia; for the moment those who still sustained the siege heard of Achæus's death, they surrendered; and a little after, all the other places in the provinces of Asia did the same.

Rebels very seldom come to a good end; and though the perfidy of these traitors strikes us with horror, and raises our indignation, we are not inclined to pity the unhappy fate of Achæus, who had made himself deserving of it by his infidelity to his sovereign.

It was about this time that the discontent of the Egyptians against Philopator began to break out.⁵

According to Polybius, it occasioned a civil war; but neither himself nor any other author gives us the particulars of it.

We also read in Livy,⁶ that the Romans some time after sent deputies to Ptolemy and Cleopatra (doubtless the same queen who before was called Arsinoë) to renew their ancient friendship and alliance with Egypt. These, carried as a present to the king, a robe and purple tunic, with an ivory chair;⁷ and to the queen an embroidered robe and a purple scarf. Such kind of presents show the happy simplicity which in those ages prevailed among the Romans.

Philopator⁸ had at the same time by Arsinoë,⁹ his wife and sister, a son called Ptolemy Epiphanes, who succeeded him at five years of age.

Philopator,¹⁰ from the time of the signal victory which he had obtained over Antiochus at Raphia, had abandoned himself to pleasures and excesses of every kind. Agathoclea his concubine, Agathocles, the brother of that woman, and their mother, governed him entirely. He spent all his time in gaming, drinking, and the most infamous irregularities. His nights were passed in debauches, and his days in feasts and dissolute revels. Forgetting entirely the duties and character of a king, instead of applying himself to the affairs of state, he valued himself upon presiding in concerts, and his skill in playing upon instruments. The women disposed of every thing.¹¹ They conferred all employments and governments; and no one had less authority in the kingdom than the prince himself. Sosibius, an old artful minister, who had been in office during three reigns, was at the helm, and his great experience had made him very capable of the administration; not indeed entirely in the manner he desired, but as the favourites would permit him to act; and he was so wicked as to pay blind obedience to the most unjust commands of a corrupt prince and his unworthy minions.

Arsinoë,¹² the king's sister and wife, had no power or authority at court; the favourites and the prime minister did not show her the least respect. She, on her side, was not patient enough to suffer every thing without murmuring; and they at last grew weary of her continual complaints. The king, and those who governed him, commanded Sosibius to rid them of her. He obeyed, and employed for that purpose one Philammon, who, without doubt, did not want experience in such cruel and barbarous assassinations.

This last action, added to so many more of the most flagrant nature, displeased the people so much, that Sosibius was obliged, before the king's death, to quit his employment. He was succeeded by Tlepolemus, a young man of quality, who had signalized himself in the army by his valour and conduct. He had all the voices in a grand council held for the purpose of choosing a prime minister. Sosibius resigned to him the king's seal, which was the badge of his office. Tlepolemus formed the several functions of it, and governed all the affairs of the kingdom, during the king's life. But though this was not long, he discovered but too plainly that he had not all the qualifications necessary for duly supporting so great an employment. He had neither the experience, ability, nor application of his predecessor. As he had the administration of all the finances, and disposed of all honours and dignities of the state, and all payments passed through his hands, every body, as is usual, was assiduous in making their court to him. He was extremely liberal; but then his bounty was bestowed without choice or discernment, and almost solely on those who shared in his parties of pleasure. The extravagant flatteries of those who were for ever crowding about his person, made him fancy his talents superior to those of all other men. He assumed haughty airs, abandoned himself to luxury and profusion, and at last grew insupportable to every one.

The wars of the East have made me suspend the relation of the affairs that happened in Greece during their continuance: we now return to them.

ECTION II.—THE ÆTOLIANS DECLARE AGAINST THE ACHÆANS. BATTLE OF CAPHYÆ LOST BY ARATUS. THE ACHÆANS HAVE RECOURSE TO PHILIP, WHO UNDERTAKES THEIR DEFENCE. TROUBLES BREAK OUT IN LACEDÆMONIA. THE UNHAPPY DEATH OF CLEOMENES IN EGYPT. TWO KINGS ARE ELECTED IN LACEDÆMONIA. THAT REPUBLIC JOINS WITH THE ÆTOLIANS.

THE Ætolians,¹ particularly in the time we are now speaking of, were becoming a very powerful people in Greece. Originally their territories extended from the river Achælaus, to the strait of the gulf of Corinth, and to the country of the Locrians, surnamed Ozolæ. But, in process of time, they had possessed themselves of several cities in Acarnania, Thessaly, and other neighbouring countries. They led much the same life upon land as pirates do at sea, that is, they were perpetually engaged in plunder and rapine. Wholly bent on lucre, they did not consider any gain as infamous or unlawful: and were entire strangers to the laws of peace or war. They were very much inured to toils, and intrepid in battle. They signaled themselves particularly in the war against the Gauls, who made an irruption into Greece; and showed themselves zealous defenders of the public liberty against the Macedonians. The increase of their power had made them haughty and insolent. That haughtiness appeared in the answer they gave the Romans, when they sent ambassadors to order them not to infest Acarnania. They expressed, if we may believe Trogus Pompeius, or Justin his epitomizer,² the highest contempt for Rome, which they said was in its origin a shameful spectacle of thieves and robbers, founded and built by a fratricide, and formerly by an assemblage of women ravished from the arms of their parents. They added, that the Ætolians had always distinguished themselves in Greece, as much by their valour as their virtue and decency; that neither Philip nor Alexander had been formidable to them; and at a time when the latter made the whole earth tremble, they had not been afraid to reject his edicts and injunctions. That therefore the Romans would do well to beware of provoking the Ætolians against them; a people whose arms had extirpated the Gauls, and despised the Macedonians. The reader may, from this speech, form a judgment of the Ætolians, of whom much might be said in the sequel.

From the time that Cleomenes of Sparta had lost his kingdom,³ and Antigonus, by his victory at Sclasia, had in some measure restored the peace of Greece, the inhabitants of Peloponnesus, who were tired by the first wars, and imagined that affairs would always continue on the same foot, had laid their arms aside, and totally neglected military discipline. The Ætolians meditated taking advantage of this indolence. Peace was insupportable to them, as it obliged them to subsist at their own expense, accustomed as they were to support themselves wholly by rapine. Antigonus had kept them in awe, and prevented them from infesting their neighbours; but, after his death, despising Philip because of his youth, they marched into Peloponnesus sword in hand, and laid waste the territories of the Messenians. Aratus, exasperated at this perfidy and insolence, and seeing that Timoxenes, at that time captain-general of the Achæans, endeavoured to gain time, because his year was near expiring; as he was nominated to succeed him the following year, he took upon himself the command five days before the due time, in order to march the sooner to the aid of the Messenians. Accordingly, having assembled the Achæans, whose vigour and strength had suffered by repose and inactivity, he was defeated near Caphym, in a great battle fought there.

Aratus was charged with being the cause of this defeat, and not without some foundation. He endeavoured to prove that the loss of the battle imputed to him was not his fault. He declared, that, however this might be, if he had been wanting in any of the duties of an able commander, he asked pardon; and entreated that his actions might be examined with less rigour than indulgence. His humility on this occasion changed the minds of the whole assembly, whose fury now turned against his accusers; and nothing was afterwards undertaken but by his advice. However, the remembrance of his defeat had exceedingly damped his courage; so that he behaved as a wise citizen rather than as an able warrior, and though the Ætolians often gave him opportunities to distress them, he took no advantage of them, but suffered that people to lay waste the whole country almost with impunity.

The Achæans were therefore forced to apply to Macedonia again, and to call in king Philip to their assistance, in hopes that the affection he bore Aratus, and the confidence he had in him, would incline that monarch to favour them. And indeed Antigonus, at his last moments, had, above all things, entreated Philip to keep well with Aratus, and to follow his counsel, in treating with the Achæans. Some time before, he had sent him into Peloponnesus, to form himself under his eye and by his counsels. Aratus gave him the best reception in his power; treated him with the distinction due to his rank; and endeavoured to instil into him such principles and sentiments, as might enable him to govern with wisdom the great kingdom to which he was heir. Accordingly that young prince returned into Macedonia with the highest sentiments of esteem for Aratus, and the most favourable disposition with regard to the welfare of Greece.

But the courtiers, whose interest it was to remove a person of Aratus's known probity, in order to have the sole ascendancy over their young prince, made that monarch suspect his conduct; and prevailed so far, as to make him declare openly against Aratus. Nevertheless, finding soon after that he had been imposed upon, he punished the informers with great severity; the sole means to banish for ever from princes that calumny, which impunity, and sometimes money, raise up and arm against persons of the most consummate virtue. Philip afterwards reposed the same confidence in Aratus as he had formerly done, and resolved to be guided by his counsels only; which was manifest on several occasions, and particularly in the affair of Lacedæmonia. That unhappy city was perpetually torn by sedition,⁴ in one of which one of the Ephori and a great many other citizens were killed, because they had declared for king Philip. When that prince arrived from Macedonia, he gave audience to the ambassadors of Sparta at Tægea, whither he had sent for them. In the council he held there, several were of opinion, that he should treat that city as Alexander had treated Thebes. But the king rejected that proposal with horror, and contented himself with punishing the principal authors of the insurrection. Such an instance of moderation and wisdom in a king who was but seventeen years of age, was greatly admired; and every one was persuaded, that it was owing to the good counsels of Aratus. However; he did not always make the same use of them.

Being arrived at Corinth,⁵ complaints were made to him by many cities against the Ætolians; and accordingly war was unanimously declared against them. This was called the war of the allies, which began much about the same time that Hannibal was meditating the siege of Saguntum. This decree was sent to all the cities, and ratified in the general assembly of the Achæans. The Ætolians, on the other side, prepared for war, and selected Scopas their general, the principal contriver of the broils they had raised and the havoc they had made. Philip now marched back his forces into Macedonia; and whilst they were in winter-quarters, was very diligent in making the necessary military preparations. He endeavoured to strengthen himself by the aid of his allies, few of whom answered his views; colouring their delays with false and specious pretences. He also sent to king Ptolemy, to entreat him not to aid the Ætolians either with men or money.

Cleomenes was at that time in Egypt; but as a horrid licentiousness prevailed in that court, and the king regarded nothing but pleasures and excesses of every kind, Cleomenes led a very melancholy life there. Nevertheless Ptolemy, in the beginning of his reign, had made use of Cleomenes; for, as he was afraid of his brother Magas, who, on his mother's account, had great authority and power over the soldiery, he contracted a stricter amity with Cleomenes, and admitted him into his most secret councils, in which means for getting rid of his brother were devised. Cleomenes was the only person who opposed the scheme; declaring that a king cannot have any ministers more zealous for his service, or more obliged to aid him in sustaining the weighty burden of government, than his brothers. This advice prevailed for that time; but Ptolemy's fears and suspicions soon returning, he imagined there would be no way to get rid of them, but by taking away the life of him that occasioned them. After this he thought himself secure; fondly concluding, that he had no enemies to fear, either at home or abroad: because Antigonus and Selenus, at their death, had left no other successors but Philip and Antiochus, both of whom he despised on account of their tender age. In this security he devoted himself to all sorts of pleasures, which were never interrupted by cares or business of any kind. Neither his courtiers, nor those who had employments in the state, dared to approach him; and he would scarce deign to bestow the least attention on what passed in the neighbouring kingdoms. That, however, was what employed the attention of his predecessors, even more than the affairs of their own dominions. Being possessed of Cœle-syria and Cyprus, they awed the kings of Syria both by sea and land. As the most considerable cities, the ports and harbours which lie along the coast from Pamphylia to the Hellespont, and the places in the neighbourhood of Lysimachia, were subject to them; from thence they had an eye on the princes of Asia, and even on the islands. How would it have been possible for any one to move in Thrace and Macedonia, whilst they had the command of Eue, or Maronea, and of cities that lay at a still greater distance? With so extensive a dominion, and so many strong places, which served them as barriers, their own kingdom was secure. They therefore had always great reason to keep a watchful eye over what was transacting without doors. Ptolemy, on the contrary, disdained to give himself that trouble; wine and women being his only pleasure and employment.

With such dispositions, the reader will easily suppose that he could have no great esteem for Cleomenes. The instant the latter had news of Antigonus's death, that the Achæans were engaged in a great war with the Ætolians, that the Lacedæmonians were united with the latter against the Achæans and Macedonians, and that all things seemed to recall him to his native country, he solicited earnestly to leave Alexandria. He therefore implored the king to favour him with troops and warlike stores sufficient for his return. Finding he could not obtain his request he desired that he at least might be suffered to depart with his family, and be allowed to embrace the favourable opportunity for repossessing himself of his kingdom. But Ptolemy was too much engaged by his pleasures to lend an ear to Cleomenes's entreaties.

Sosibius, who at that time had great authority in the kingdom, assembled his friends; and in this council a resolution was formed, not to furnish Cleomenes either with a fleet or provisions. They believed such an expense would be useless; for, from the death of Antigonus, all foreign affairs had seemed to them of no importance. Besides, this council were apprehensive, that as Antigonus was dead, and as there was none to oppose Cleomenes, that prince, after having made an expeditious conquest of Greece, would become a very formidable enemy to Egypt; what increased their fears was, his having thoroughly studied the state of the kingdom, his knowing its strong and weak side, his holding the king in the utmost contempt, and seeing a great many parts of the kingdom separated and at a great distance, which an enemy might have a thousand opportunities of invading. For these reasons, it was not thought proper to grant Cleomenes the fleet and other succours which he desired. On the other side, to give so bold and enterprising a prince leave to depart, after having refused him in so contemptuous a manner, would be making an enemy of him, who would certainly one time or other, remember the affront which had been put upon him. Sosibius was therefore of opinion, that it was not even safe to allow him his liberty in Alexandria. A word which Cleomenes had let drop, came then into his mind. In a council, where Magas was the subject of the debate, the prime minister had signified his fears lest this prince should raise an insurrection by means of the foreign soldiers, "I answer for them," says Cleomenes, speaking of those of Peloponnesus: "and you may depend, that upon the first signal I give, they will take up arms in your favour." This made Sosibius hesitate no longer: on a fictitious accusation, which he corroborated by a letter he himself had forged in that unhappy prince's name, he prevailed with the king to seize his person, and to imprison him in a secure place, where he might maintain him always in the manner he had hitherto done, with the liberty of seeing his friends but not of going abroad.

This treatment threw Cleomenes into the deepest affliction and melancholy. As he did not perceive any end of his calamities, he formed a resolution, in concert with those friends who used to visit him, which despair only could suggest; and this was, to repel the injustice of Ptolemy by force of arms; to stir up his subjects against him; to die a death worthy of Sparta; and not to wait, as stalled victims, till it was thought proper to sacrifice them.

His friends having found means to get him out of the prison, they all ran in a body, with drawn swords, into all the streets, exhorting and calling upon the populace to recover their liberty; but not a man joined them. They killed the governor of the city, and some other noblemen who came to oppose them; and afterwards ran to the citadel with the intention to force the gates, and set all the prisoners at liberty; but they found them shut and strongly barricaded. Cleomenes, now lost to all hopes, ran up and down the city, during which not a soul either followed or opposed him; but all fled through fear. When they therefore saw that it would be impossible for them to succeed in their enterprise, they terminated it in a tragical and bloody manner, by running upon each other's swords, to avoid the infamy of punishment. Thus died Cleomenes, after having reigned sixteen years over Sparta. The king caused his body to be hanged on a cross, and ordered his mother, children, and all the women who attended them, to be put to death. When that unhappy princess was brought to the place of execution, the only favour she asked was, that she might die before her children. But they began with them; a torment more grievous to a mother than death itself; after which, she presented her neck to the executioner, saying only these words:

1 Plut. in Cleom. p. 820—823.

2 Polyb. l. v. p. 350—355

'Ah! my dear children, to what a place did you come!'

The design of Agis and Cleomenes to reform Sparta, and revive its ancient discipline, was certainly very laudable in itself: and both had reason to think, that in a state wholly infected and corrupted as that of Sparta then was, to pretend to reform abuses one after another, and remedy disorders by degrees, was only cutting off the heads of a hydra; and therefore that it would be absolutely necessary to strike at the root of the evil. However, I cannot say whether Plato's maxim should not be adopted here, viz. that nothing should be attempted in a free state, but what the citizens may be prevailed on to admit by gentle means; and that violence should never be employed.¹ Are there not some desperate diseases in which medicines would only accelerate death? And have not some disorders gained so great an ascendancy in a state,² that to attempt a reformation at such a time would only discover the impotency of the magistrates and laws? But, a circumstance which admits of no excuse in Cleomenes, is, his having against all the laws of reason and justice, murdered the Ephori, in order to gain success to his enterprise; a conduct absolutely tyrannical, unworthy of a Spartan, and more unworthy of a king; and which at the same time seemed to give a sanction to those tyrants, who afterwards inflicted such evils on Lacedæmonia. And, indeed, Cleomenes himself has been called a tyrant by some historians, and with him they have begun the series of the tyrants of Sparta.³

During the three years that Cleomenes had left Sparta,⁴ the citizens had not thought of nominating kings, from the hopes they entertained that he would return again; and had always preserved the highest esteem and veneration for him. But, as soon as news was brought of his death, they proceeded to the election of kings. They first nominated Agesipolis, a child, descended from one of the royal families, and appointed his uncle Cleomenes his governor. Afterwards they chose Lycurgus, none of whose ancestors had reigned, but who had bribed the Ephori, by giving each of them a talent,⁵ which was putting the crown to sale at a very low price. They soon had reason to repent their choice, which was in direct opposition to all laws, and till then had never an example. The factious party, which openly opposed Philip, and committed the most enormous violences in the city, had presided in this election; and immediately after, they caused Sparta to declare in favour of the Ætolians.

SECTION III.—VARIOUS EXPEDITIONS OF PHILIP AGAINST THE ENEMIES OF THE ACHÆANS. APELLES, HIS PRIME MINISTER, ABUSES HIS CONFIDENCE IN AN EXTRAORDINARY MANNER. PHILIP MAKES AN INROAD INTO ÆTOLIA. THERMÆ TAKEN WITHOUT OPPOSITION. EXCESSES OF PHILIP'S SOLDIERS IN THAT CITY. PRUDENT RETREAT OF THAT PRINCE. TUMULTS IN THE CAMP. PUNISHMENT OF THOSE WHO HAD OCCASIONED THEM. INROAD OF PHILIP INTO LACONIA. THE CONSPIRATORS FORM NEW CABALS. PUNISHMENT INFLICTED ON THEM. A PEACE IS PROPOSED BETWEEN PHILIP AND THE ACHÆANS ON ONE SIDE, AND THE ÆTOLIANS ON THE OTHER, WHICH AT LAST IS CONCLUDED.

WE have already related,⁶ that A. M. 3785. Philip king of Macedon, being called in by the Achæans to their aid, had come to Corinth, where their general assembly was held, and that there war had been unanimously declared against the Ætolians. The king returned afterwards to Macedonia, to make the necessary preparations for carrying on the war.

Philip brought over Scerdilides to the alliance with the Achæans. He was, as has been observed, a petty king of Illyria. The Ætolians, whose ally he was, had broken their engagements with him by refusing to give him a certain share of the spoils they had gained at the taking of Cynethium, according to the articles agreed upon between them. Philip embraced with joy this opportunity of revenging himself for their perfidy.

Demetrius of Pharos joined also with Philip.⁷ We have already seen that the Romans, in whose favour he had declared at first, had bestowed on him several of the cities they had conquered in Illyria. As the chief revenue of those petty princes had consisted hitherto in the plunder they got from their neighbours; when the Romans were removed, he could not forbear pillaging the cities and territories subject to them. Besides, Demetrius, as well as Scerdilides, had sailed, on the same design, beyond the city of Issus; which was a direct infraction of the chief article of the treaty concluded with queen Teuta. For these reasons the Romans declared war against Demetrius. Æmilius the consul attacked him with great vigour, dispossessed him of his strongest fortresses, and besieged him in Pharos, from whence he escaped with the utmost difficulty. The city surrendered to the Romans. Demetrius,⁸ being dispossessed of all his dominions, fled to Philip, who received him with open arms. This offended the Romans very much, who thereupon sent ambassadors to him, demanding Demetrius to be delivered up. However, Philip, who meditated at that time the design which broke out soon after, paid no regard to their demand, and Demetrius spent the remainder of his days with that monarch. He was a valiant and bold man, but at the same time rash and inconsiderate in his enterprises; and his courage was entirely void of prudence and judgment.

The Achæans, being on the point of engaging in a considerable war, sent to their allies. The Acarnanians joined them very cheerfully, though they incurred great danger, as they lay nearest the Ætolians, and consequently were most exposed to the inroads of that people. Polybius praises their fidelity exceedingly.

The people of Epirus did not show so much good will, and seemed desirous of continuing neutral: nevertheless, they engaged in the war a little after.

Deputies were also sent to king Ptolemy, to desire him not to assist the Ætolians either with troops or money.

The Messenians, for whose sake that war had been first begun, no way answered the hopes which had been naturally entertained, of their employing their whole force to carry it on.

The Lacedæmonians had declared at first for the Achæans; but the contrary faction caused the decree to be reversed, and they joined the Ætolians. It was on this occasion, as I have said before, that Agesipolis and Lycurgus were elected kings of Sparta.

Aratus the younger, son of the great Aratus, was at that time supreme magistrate of the Achæans, as was Scopas of the Ætolians.

Philip marched from Macedonia with 15,000 foot and 800 horse.⁹ Having crossed Thessaly, he arrived in Epirus. Had he marched directly against the Ætolians, he would have come upon them unawares and have defeated them: but, at the request of the Epirotes, he laid siege to Ambracia, which employed him forty days, and gave the enemy time to make preparations, and wait his coming up. They did more. Scopas, at the head of a body of Ætolians, advanced into Macedonia, made dreadful havoc, and returned in a very short time laden with spoils: this action did him prodigious honour, and greatly animated his forces. However, this did not hinder Philip from entering Ætolia, and seizing on a great number of important fortresses. He would have entirely conquered it, had not the news he received, that the Dardanians! intended to make an inroad into his kingdom, obliged him to return thither. At his departure he promised the ambassadors of the Achæans to return soon to their assistance. His sudden arrival disconcerted the Dardanians, and put a stop to their enterprise. He then returned to Thessaly, with an intention to pass the rest of the summer in Larissa.

In the mean time, Dorimachus, whom the Ætolians had just before nominated their general, entered Epirus, laid waste all the open country, and did not spare even the temple of Dodona.

Philip, though it was now the depth of winter, had left Larissa, and arrived at Corinth, without any one's having had the least notice of his march. He there ordered the elder Aratus to attend him, and by a letter to his son, who commanded the forces this year, gave him orders whither to march them. Caphyæ was to be the rendezvous. Euripidas, who knew nothing of Philip's arrival, was then marching a detachment of above 2000 natives of Elis, to lay waste the territory of Sicyon. They fell into the hands of Philip, and all except 100 were either killed or taken prisoners.

The king, having joined Aratus the younger with his forces at the rendezvous appointed, marched towards Psophis, in order to besiege it. This was a very daring attempt; for the city was thought almost impregnable, as well from its natural situation, as from the fortifications which had been added to it. As it was the depth of winter, the inhabitants were under no apprehension that any one would, or even could, attack them: Philip, however, did it with success; for, first the city, and afterwards the citadel, surrendered, after making some resistance. As they were very far from expecting to be besieged, the want of ammunition and provisions very much facilitated the taking of that city. Philip gave it very generously to the Achæans, to whom it was a most important post, assuring them that there was nothing he desired more than to oblige them; and to give them the strongest proofs of his zeal and affection for their interest. A prince who always acts in this manner is truly great, and does honour to the royal dignity.

From thence, after possessing himself of some other cities, which he also gave to his allies, he marched to Elis, in order to lay it waste. This territory was very rich and populous, and the inhabitants of the country were in a flourishing condition. Formerly the territory had been deemed sacred, on account of the Olympic games solemnized there every four years; and all the nations of Greece had agreed not to molest it, or carry their arms into it. But the Elisians had themselves been the occasion of their losing that privilege, because, like other states, they had engaged in the wars of Greece. Here Philip got a very considerable booty, with which he enriched his troops, after which he retired to Olympia.

Among the several courtiers of king Philip, Appelles held the chief rank, and had a considerable influence on the mind of his sovereign, whose governor he had been: but, as too frequently happens on these occasions, he very much abused his power, which he employed wholly in oppressing individuals and states. He had taken it into his head to reduce the Achæans to the same condition as that in which Thessaly was at that time; that is, to subject them absolutely to the commands of the ministers of Macedonia, by leaving them only the name and a vain shadow of liberty; and to accustom them to the yoke, he caused them to suffer every kind of injurious treatment. Aratus complained of this to Philip, who was highly exasperated on that account; and accordingly assured him, he would give such orders, that nothing of that kind should happen for the future. Accordingly, he enjoined Appelles never to lay any commands on the Achæans, but in concert with their general. This was behaving with an indolent tenderness towards a minister who had so shamefully abused his master's confidence, and had therefore deserved to be entirely disgraced. The Achæans, overjoyed at the favour which Philip showed them, and at the orders he had given for their peace and security, were continually bestowing the highest encomiums on that prince, and extolling his excellent qualities. And, indeed, he possessed those which can endear a king to his people; such as a lively genius, a happy memory, easy elocution, and an unaffected grace in all his actions; a beautiful aspect, heightened by a noble and majestic air, which struck the beholders with awe and respect; a sweetness of temper, affability, and a desire to please; and to finish the picture, a valour, an intrepidity, and an experience in war, which far exceeded his years; so that one can hardly conceive the strange alteration that afterwards appeared in his morals and behaviour.

Philip having possessed himself of Aliphera, which was a post of great strength, the greatest part of the people of that country, astonished at the rapidity of his conquests, and weary of the Ætolian tyranny, submitted to his arms. Thus he soon made himself master of all Triphylia.

At this time, Chilo, the Lacedæmonian, pretending that he had a better right to the crown than Lycurgus, on whose head they had placed it, resolved to dispossess him of it, and to set it on his own. Having engaged in his party about 200 citizens, he entered the city in a forcible manner, killed the Ephori, who were at table together, and marched directly towards Lycurgus's house, intending to kill him: but hearing the tumult, he had made his escape. Chilo then went into the great square of the city, exhorted the citizens to recover their liberty; making them, at the same time, the greatest promises. Seeing, however, that he could make no impression on them, and that he had failed in his attempt, he sentenced himself to banishment, and retired to Achaia. It is surprising to see Sparta, formerly so jealous of its liberty, and mistress of all Greece till the battle of Leuctra, now filled with tumults and insurrections, and ignominiously subjected to a kind of tyrants, whose very name formerly she could not endure. Such were the effects of their having violated Lycurgus's laws; and especially of their introducing gold and silver into Sparta, which drew after them, by insensible degrees, the lust of power, avarice, pride, luxury, effeminacy, immorality, and all those vices which are generally inseparable from riches.

Philip, being arrived at Argos, spent the rest of the winter there. Appelles had not yet laid aside the design he meditated of enslaving the Achæans. But Aratus, for whom the king had a very particular regard, and in whom he reposed the highest confidence, was an invincible obstacle to his project. He therefore resolved, if possible, to get rid of him; and for this purpose he sent privately for all those who were his secret enemies, and used his utmost endeavours to gain them the prince's favour. After this, in all his conversations with him, he hinted that so long as Aratus should enjoy any authority in the republic of the Achæans, he (Philip) would have no power; and would be as much subject to their laws and usages as the meanest of their citizens: whereas, were he to raise to the chief administration of affairs some person who might be entirely dependent on him, he then might act as sovereign, and govern others, instead of being himself governed. The new friends enforced these reflections, and refined on the arguments of Appelles. This idea of despotic power pleased the young king; and indeed it is the strongest temptation that can be laid in the way of princes. Accordingly he went for that purpose to Ægium, where the assembly of the states was held for the election of a new general; and prevailed so far by his promises and menaces, that he got Philoxenus, whose election Aratus had supported and gained, excluded; and obliged them to make choice of Eperatus, who was his direct enemy. Implicitly devoted to the will of his prime minister, he did not perceive that he degraded himself in the most ignominious manner; nothing being more disgusting to free assemblies, such as those of Greece, than the least attempt to violate the freedom of elections.

A person was thus chosen entirely unworthy of the post, as is commonly the case in all forced elections. Eperatus, having neither merit nor experience, was universally despised. As Aratus intermeddled no longer in public affairs, nothing was well done, and all things were hastening to their ruin. Philip, on whom the blame fell, became sensible that very pernicious counsels had been given him. Upon this, he again had recourse to Aratus, and reinstated him entirely in his friendship and confidence: and perceiving that after this step his affairs flourished visibly, and that his reputation and power increased daily, he would not make use of any counsel but that of Aratus, as of the only man to whom he owed all his grandeur and glory. Who would not imagine, after such evident and repeated proofs on one side of Aratus's innocence, and on the other of Apelles's black malice, that Philip would have been undeceived for ever; and have been fully sensible which of the two had the most sincere zeal for his service? The sequel, however, will show, that jealousy never dies but with the object that excited it: and that princes seldom overcome prejudices that are grateful to their authority.

A new proof of this soon appeared. As the inhabitants of Elis refused the advantageous conditions which Philip offered them by one Amphidamus, Apelles hinted to him, that so unreasonable a refusal was owing to the ill services which Aratus did him clandestinely, though outwardly he pretended to have his interest very much at heart: that he alone had kept Amphidamus from enforcing, as he ought to have done; and as he had engaged to do, to the inhabitants of Elis, the offers which the king made them: and on this foundation he invented a long story, and named several witnesses of its truth. The king, however, was so just as to insist upon his prime minister's repeating these accusations in presence of the man whom he charged with them: and this Apelles did not scruple to do, and that with such an air of assurance, or rather impudence, as might have disconcerted the most virtuous man. He even added, that the king would lay this affair before the council of the Achæans, and leave to them the decision of it. This was what he wanted; firmly persuaded, that by the influence he had there, he should not fail to get him condemned. Aratus, in making his defence, began by beseeching the king, not lightly to give credit to the several things laid to his charge; that it was a justice which a king, more than any other man, owed to a person accused, to command a strict inquiry to be made into the several articles of the accusation, and till then to suspend his judgment. In consequence of this, he required, that Apelles should be obliged to produce his witnesses; him, especially, from whom he pretended to have heard the several particulars laid to his charge; and that they should omit none of the methods used and prescribed in establishing a fact before it was laid before the public council. The king thought Aratus's demand very just and reasonable, and promised it should be complied with. However, the time passed on, and Apelles did not prepare to give in his proofs; how, indeed, would it have been possible for him to do that? An unforeseen accident brought Amphidamus, by a kind of chance, to the city of Dyme, whither Philip was come to settle some affairs. Aratus snatched the opportunity; and begged the king himself to take cognizance of this matter. He complied with Aratus's request, and found that there was not the least ground for the charge. Accordingly Aratus was pronounced innocent, but no punishment was inflicted on the calumniator.

This impunity emboldened him the more; so that he continued his secret intrigues, in order to remove those who gave him the least umbrage. Besides Apelles, there were four other persons who divided the chief offices of the crown among them, and at the same time enjoyed the king's confidence. Antigonus had appointed them by his will, and assigned each of them his employment. His principal view in this choice was, to prevent those cabals and intrigues which are almost unavoidable during the minority of an infant prince. Two of these noblemen, Leontius and Megaleas, were entirely devoted to Apelles, but as to the other two, Taurion and Alexander, he had not the same ascendancy over them. Taurion presided over the affairs of Peloponnesus, and Alexander had the command of the guards. Now the prime minister wanted to give their employments to noblemen on whom he could entirely rely, and who would be as much devoted to his views as he could wish them. However, he endeavoured to undermine their credit by other methods than those he had employed against Aratus; for, says Polybius, courtiers have the art of moulding themselves into all shapes, and employ sometimes praise and sometimes slander to gain their ends. Whenever Taurion was mentioned, Apelles would applaud his merit, his courage, his experience; and speak of him as a man worthy of the king's more intimate confidence: he did this in the view of detaining him at court, and procuring the government of Peloponnesus (a place of great importance, and which required the presence of the person invested with it) for one of his creatures. Whenever Alexander was the subject of the discourse, he lost no opportunity of representing him in the most odious colours to the king, and even endeavoured to render his fidelity suspected, in order to remove him from court, that his post might be given to some person who would be dependent entirely on him. Polybius will show hereafter, what was the result of all these secret machinations. He only hints in this place, that Apelles was at last taken in his own snare, and met with the treatment he was preparing for others. But we shall first see him commit the blackest and most abominable injustice towards Aratus, and even direct his criminal designs against the king himself.

I before observed,¹ that Philip having discovered that he had been more than once imposed upon, had restored Aratus to his favour and confidence. Supported by his credit and counsels, he went to the assembly of the Achæans, which had been appointed on his account to meet at Sicyon. On the report he made of the state of his exchequer, and of the urgent need in which he stood of money to maintain his forces, a resolution was passed to furnish him with fifty talents;² the instant his troops should set out upon their march; with three months' pay for his soldiers, and 10,000 measures of wheat: and that afterwards, as long as he should carry on the war in person in Peloponnesus, they should furnish him with seventeen talents a month.

When the troops returned from their winter-quarters, and were assembled, the king debated in council on the operations of the ensuing campaign. It was resolved to act by sea, because they thereby should infallibly divide the enemy's forces, from the uncertainty they must be under, with regard to the side on which they should be attacked. Philip was to make war on the inhabitants of Ætolia, Lacedæmonia, and Elis.

Whilst the king, who was now returned to Corinth, was training his Macedonians in the several exercises of the sea-service, Apelles, who found his influence lessened, and was exasperated to see the counsels of Aratus followed, and not his own, took secret measures to defeat all the king's designs. His view was to make himself necessary to his sovereign; and to force him, by the ill posture of his affairs, to throw himself into the arms of a minister, who was best acquainted with, and then actually in the administration of them. How villanous was this! Apelles prevailed with Leontius and Megaleas, his two confidants, to behave with negligence in the employments with which they should be intrusted. As for himself, he went to Chalcis, upon pretence of having some affairs to transact; and there, as his orders were punctually obeyed by every one, he stopped the convoys of money which were sent to the king; and thereby reduced him to such necessity, that he was forced to pawn his plate to subsist himself and his household.

Philip having put to sea, arrived the second day at Patræ; and from thence having landed at Cephælenia,¹ he laid siege to Paleis, a city which, from its situation, would be of great advantage to him, as a place of arms; and as enabling him to infest the territories of his enemies. He caused his military engines to be advanced, and mines to be run. One of the ways of making breaches was, to dig out the earth under the very foundation of the walls. When they were got to it, they propped and supported the walls with great wooden beams, to which the miners afterwards set fire, and then retired; when presently great part of the wall would fall down. As the Macedonians had worked with incredible ardour, they very soon made a breach more than thirty fathoms wide. Leontius was commanded to mount this breach with his troops. Had he exerted himself ever so little, the city would certainly have been taken; but he attacked the enemy very faintly, so that he was repulsed, lost a great number of his men, and Philip was obliged to raise the siege.

The moment he began it, the enemy had sent Lycurgus with some troops into Messenia, and Dorinachus with half of the army into Thessaly, to oblige Philip, by this double diversion, to lay aside his enterprise. Deputies had arrived soon after from the Acarnanians and Messenians. Philip, having raised the siege, assembled his council, to debate on which side he should turn his arms. The Messenians represented, that in one day the forces might march from Cephælenia into their country, and at once overpower Lycurgus, who did not expect to be so suddenly attacked. Leontius enforced this advice very strongly. His secret reason was, that as it would be impossible for Philip to return, as the winds would be directly contrary at that time, he therefore would be forced to stay there, by which means the campaign would be spent and nothing done. The Acarnanians on the contrary, urged him to march directly into Ætolia, which was then unprovided with troops: declaring that the whole country might be laid waste without the least resistance; and that Dorinachus would be prevented from making an irruption into Macedonia. Aratus did not fail to declare in favour of the latter opinion; and the king, who from the time of the cowardly attack at Paleis, had begun to suspect Leontius, acquiesced in the advice of Aratus.

Having provided for the urgent necessities of the Messenians, he went from Cephælenia, arrived the second day at Leucadia, from thence entered the gulf of Ambracia, and came a little before day-break to Limnæa. Immediately he commanded the soldiers to take some refreshment, to rid themselves of the greatest part of their baggage, and be ready for marching. In the afternoon, Philip, having left the baggage under a strong guard, set out from Limnæa; and after a march of about sixty furlongs, he halted, to give his army some time for refreshment and rest. He then marched all night, and arrived at day-break at the river Achelous, intending to fall suddenly and unexpectedly upon Thermæ. Leontius advised the king to halt for some time, giving for his reason, that as the soldiers had been fatigued with the length of their march, it would be proper for them to take breath; but, in reality, to give the Ætolians time to prepare for their defence. Aratus, on the contrary, knowing that opportunity is swift-winged, and that Leontius's advice was manifestly traitorous, conjured Philip to seize the favourable moment, and set out on his march that instant.

The king, who was already offended at Leontius, and began to suspect him, sets out immediately, crosses the Achelous, and marches directly to Thermæ, through a very rugged and almost impervious road cut between very steep rocks. This was the capital city of the country, in which the Ætolians every year held their fairs and solemn assemblies, as well for the worship of the gods, as for the election of magistrates. As this city was thought impregnable, because of the advantage of its situation, and that no enemy had ever dared to approach it; the Ætolians used to leave their richest effects and all their wealth there, imagining they were very safe. But how great was their surprise, when, at the close of the day, they saw Philip enter it with his army!

After having taken immense spoils in the night, the Macedonians pitched their camp. The next morning it was resolved that the most valuable effects should be carried away; and having piled up the rest of the booty at the head of the camp, they set fire to it. They did the same with regard to the arms which hung on the galleries of the temple; the best were laid by for service, and the remainder, amounting to upwards of 15,000, were burned to ashes. Hitherto every thing which had been transacted was just, and agreeable to the laws of war.

But the Macedonians did not stop here. Transported with fury at the remembrance of the wild havoc which the Ætolians had made in Dium and Dodona, they set fire to the galleries of the temple, tore down all the offerings which hung on them, among which were some of exceeding beauty and prodigious value. Not satisfied with burning the roofs, they razed the temple. The statues, of which there were at least 2000, were thrown down. A great number of them were broken to pieces; and those only spared which were known, by their form or inscriptions, to represent gods. They wrote the following verse on the walls:

Remember Dium : Dium sends you this.

The horror with which the sacrifices committed by the Ætolians at Dium had inspired Philip and his allies, without doubt convinced them that they might revenge it by the commission of the like crimes; and that they were then making just reprisals. However, says Polybius, the reader will allow me to think otherwise. To support his opinion, he cites three great examples, taken from the very family of the prince whose conduct he here censures. Antigonus, after having defeated Cleomenes, king of the Lacedæmonians, and possessed himself of Sparta, so far from extending his rage to the temples and sacred things, did not even make those he had conquered feel the effects of it; on the contrary, he restored to them the form of government which they had received from their ancestors, and treated them with the highest testimonies of kindness and friendship. Philip, to whom the royal family owed all its splendour and who defeated the Athenians at Chæronea, made them sensible of his power and victory by no other marks than his beneficence; restoring their prisoners without ransom; himself taking care of the dead, ordering Antipater to convey their bodies to Athens, and giving clothes to such of the prisoners as were most in want of them. And lastly, Alexander the Great, in the height of his fury against Thebes, which he razed to the ground, so far from being forgetful of the veneration due to the gods, took care not to suffer his soldiers (even through imprudence) to do the least injury to the temples and other sacred places: and, what is still more worthy our admiration, in his war with the Persians, who had plundered and burned most of the temples in Greece, Alexander spared and revered all places dedicated to the worship of the gods.

It were to be wished, continues Polybius, that Philip, mindful of the examples his ancestors set him, had strove to show that he had succeeded rather to their moderation and magnanimity, than to their empire and power. The laws of war, indeed, frequently oblige a conqueror to demolish towns and citadels; to fill up harbours, to capture men and ships, to carry off the fruits of the earth, and things of a like nature, in order to lessen the strength of the enemy and increase his own: but to destroy what neither can do him any prejudice, nor will contribute to the defeat of the enemy; to burn temples, to break statues, and similar ornaments of a city, in pieces; certainly nothing but the wildest and most extravagant fury can be capable of such violence. It is not merely to ruin and destroy those who have done us injury, that we ought to declare war, in case we desire to be thought just and equitable; but only to oblige such people to acknowledge and make amends for their faults. The true end of war is not to involve in the same ruin the innocent and the guilty, but rather to save both. These are the sentiments of a soldier and a heathen.

Though Philip, on this occasion, showed no great regard for religion, he acted like an excellent captain. His view in putting to sea, was to go and surprise the city of Thermæ, taking advantage of the absence of part of the Ætolian forces. To conceal his design, he took so large a compass, as left the enemy in doubt with regard to the place he intended to attack; and prevented their seizing some passes of the mountains and defiles in which he might have been stopped short. Some rivers were to be passed: it was necessary for him to make the utmost haste, and turn short upon Ætolia by a swift countermarch. This Philip does without listening to the advice of traitors. To lighten his army, he leaves his baggage. He goes through the defiles without meeting the least obstacle, and enters Thermæ, as if he had dropped from the skies; so well had he concealed and hastened his march, of which the enemy do not seem to have had the least suspicion.

His retreat was full as extraordinary. To secure it he had seized upon several important posts; expecting that at his coming down, his rear guard particularly would be attacked. It was accordingly charged at two different times; however, the prudent precautions he had taken entirely baffled all the efforts of the enemy.

An enterprise so well concerted, so secretly carried on, and executed with so much wisdom and despatch, surpasses the abilities of so young a prince as Philip; and seems to characterize a veteran warrior, long exercised in all the arts and stratagems of war. We can scarce doubt (and Polybius seems to insinuate it evidently enough) that Aratus, as he had been the first contriver of so noble a project, was also the soul, as it were, and chief agent in it afterwards. I have already observed, that his talents lay more in conducting a warlike stratagem, in forming extraordinary enterprises, and giving success to them by his bold counsels, than in executing them himself. How happy is it for a young prince to possess a general of this character; prudent, able, versed by long experience, and habituated to all the parts of the art of war; to be able to appreciate the worth of these qualities; to be perfectly sensible of their high value; to be docile to his advice, though frequently contrary to his own taste and opinion; and to let himself be guided by such wise counsels! After the happy success of an action, the person whose advice directed it vanishes, and all the glory of it reflected upon the monarch. Plutarch,¹ who enforces what I have now said, thinks it equally glorious to Philip for suffering himself to be guided by such good counsels, and to Aratus for having ability to suggest them.

When Philip, who had marched back the same way he came, was arrived at Limnan, finding himself in repose and security, he offered sacrifices to the gods, by way of thanksgiving for the success they had given to his arms; and made a splendid banquet for his officers, who were as strongly affected as himself with the glory he had acquired. Leontius and Megaleas were the only persons who heartily repined at the good fortune of their sovereign. Every one soon perceived that they did not share with the rest of the company in the joy which so successful an expedition must naturally create. During the whole entertainment, they vented their animosity against Aratus in the most insulting and most shocking raileries. But words were not all; for at their rising from the banquet, heated with the fumes of wine and fired with anger, they threw stones at him all the way till he was got into his tent. The whole army was in an uproar; and the noise reaching the king, he caused an exact inquiry to be made into the affair; laid a fine of twenty talents² on Megaleas, and threw him into prison. Leontius, hearing of what had happened, ran with a crowd of soldiers to the king's tent, persuaded that the young prince would be frightened at seeing so great a body of men, and for that reason be prompted to change his resolution. Being come into the king's presence, "Who has been so bold," says he, "as to lay hands on Megaleas and throw him into prison?" "I," answered the king, in a lofty tone. This terrified Leontius; so that after venting a deep sigh, he left the king's tent in a rage. Some days after he gave security for the fine laid on Megaleas, who was then set at liberty.

During Philip's expedition against Ætolia, Lycurgus, the Spartan king, had engaged in an enterprise against the Messenians, but it proved abortive. Dorimachus, who had led a considerable body of Ætolians into Thessaly, with an intention to lay waste the country, and to oblige Philip to raise the siege of Paleis, in order to go and succour his allies, found troops there ready prepared to give him a warm reception. He did not venture to attack them. The news of Philip's inroad into Ætolia, forced him to hasten thither to defend his own country. But though he made the utmost expedition, he arrived too late; the Macedonians having already quitted it.

Philip marched his army with almost incredible diligence. Having left Leucadia with his fleet, and being arrived at Corinth, he laid up his ships in the harbour of Lechæum, landed his troops, began his march, and, passing through Argos, arrived on the twelfth day at Tegea, which he had fixed for the rendezvous of his allies. The Spartans having heard from public report what had passed at Thermæ, were truly alarmed when they saw that young victor in their territories, where he was not expected so suddenly. Some actions took place between the two armies, in which Philip had always the advantage; but I shall omit the particulars, to avoid prolixity. Philip displayed, on all occasions, a bravery and prudence far above his years; and this expedition did him no less honour than that of Ætolia. After laying waste the whole country, and taking abundance of spoils, he returned by the way of Argos to Corinth.

Here he found ambassadors from Rhodes and Chios, who came to offer him their mediation, and to incline both parties to peace. The king dissembling his real intentions, told them that he had always wished, and did still wish, to be at peace with the Ætolians; and therefore charged them, at their going away, to dispose them to it. He afterwards landed at Lechæum, in order to go from thence to Phocis, where he intended to engage in some more important enterprise.

The factions formed by Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolemy, who also was one of Philip's principal officers, having employed all the clandestine methods possible to remove and destroy all those who either opposed or were suspected by them; and seeing with grief, that those secret practices had not been as successful as they had flattered themselves, resolved to make themselves formidable even to their sovereign, by employing the authority they had over their forces, to draw off their affections from him, and to attach them to their own interest. The greatest part of the army had staid in Corinth; and they imagined, that the absence of the king gave them a favourable opportunity for executing their designs. They represented to the light-armed troops, and to the guards, that for the sake of the public welfare they exposed themselves to the greatest trials and dangers of war; that nevertheless justice had not been done them, nor the ancient law relating to the distribution of plunder been observed with regard to them. The young men fired by these seditious discourses, divide themselves into bands, plunder the houses of the principal courtiers, and carry their fury to that excess, as to force the gates of the king's palace, and break to pieces the tiles which covered it. Immediately a great tumult broke out in the city, of which Philip having notice, he left Lechæum in great haste. He then assembles the Macedonians in the theatre where, in a speech intermixed with gentleness and erity, he makes them sensible of their fault. In the trouble and confusion which reigned at that time, some declared that it would be necessary to seize and punish the promoters of this insurrection; and others, that it would be more prudent to appease them by gentle methods, and forget all that was past.

The king was still young; so that his authority was not entirely confirmed in the minds of the people and soldiery. Those who were against him enjoyed the highest posts in the kingdom; had governed it during his minority; had filled all employments with their creatures; had acquired a kind of unlimited power over all orders of the state; had the command of the forces, and during a long time had employed the most insinuating arts to gain their affection, and had divided the whole administration among themselves. In so delicate a conjuncture, he did not think it advisable to come to an open rupture, lest he should inflame the minds of the people, by employing chastisements at an unreasonable time. For this reason he stifled his resentment, pretending to be very well satisfied; and having exhorted his forces to union and peace, he went back to Lechæum. But after this insurrection, it was not easy for him to execute in Phocis the schemes he had projected.

Leontius having now lost all hopes, after so many fruitless attempts, had recourse to Apelles. He sent courier upon courier to give him notice of the danger he was in, and to urge his presence immediately. That minister, during his stay in Chalcis, had disposed of all things in the most despotic manner, and by that means was universally odious. According to him, the king, being still young, had no manner of power, but obeyed implicitly the dictates of his (Apelles's) will. He arrogated to himself the management of all affairs, as having full power to act in every thing as he should think fit. The magistrates of Macedonia and Thessaly, and the officers who enjoyed any employment, made their reports to him alone. In all the cities of Greece, scarce the least mention was made of the king: for whether any resolutions were to be taken, affairs to be regulated, judgments passed, honours to be bestowed, or favours to be granted, Apelles engrossed and transacted all things.

Philip had long before been apprized of this conduct of Apelles, which gave him very great uneasiness. Aratus was frequently urgent with him to exert himself on this occasion, and endeavoured to make him throw off his irresolution and servitude: but the king concealed his thoughts, and did not discover his resolutions to any body. Apelles, not knowing how the king was disposed towards him, but persuaded, on the contrary, that the instant he appeared before his sovereign he would not fail of taking his opinion in all things, hastened from Chalcis to the support of Leontius.

When he arrived in Corinth, Leontius, Ptolemy, and Megaleas, who commanded the flower of the troops, engaged all the young men to go and meet him. Apelles, thus received with pomp and splendour, and attended by a large body of officers and soldiers, advances directly to the king's palace, which he was going to enter as usual. However, the officer who attended at the gate (having been instructed before) stopped him short, and told him that his majesty was busy. Astonished at so uncommon a reception, which he nowise expected, he deliberated for some time how he ought to behave, and at last withdrew in the utmost confusion. Nothing is so transient and frail as a borrowed power, not supported by foundations or strength of its own. The shining train he had caused to follow him vanished in an instant; and he arrived at his own house followed only by his domestics: a lively image, says Polybius, of what happens in the courts of kings; and of the fate which the most powerful courtiers ought to dread. A few days suffice to show their most exalted state and fall. Like counters, which one moment are of the highest, and the next of the most inconsiderable value, at the will of him who reckons with them: as princes please to extend or withdraw their favours, to-day they enjoy the greatest credit, and the next are reduced to the extremities of misery and universal disgrace. Megaleas, sensible of the storm he himself might expect, now the prime minister was disgraced, thought of nothing but how he might best secure himself by flight, and accordingly withdrew to Thebes, leaving Leontius bound for twenty talents, which he had engaged to see his accomplice pay.

The king, whether he was unwilling to drive Apelles to despair; or whether he did not think his power sufficiently established to exert it in an extraordinary manner; or from some remains of esteem and gratitude for his guardian and governor; still continued occasionally to converse with him, and left him some other honours of that kind; but he excluded him from the council, and from the number of those he used to invite to supper with him. On his arrival at Sicyon, the magistrates offered him a house; but he preferred that of Aratus, whom he never quitted, and spent whole days in his company. As for Apelles, he ordered him to retire to Corinth.

Having removed Leontius from his command of the guards, which were ordered to march elsewhere, upon pretence of their being employed upon some urgent occasion, he caused him to be thrown into prison; the pretended reason of which was, to oblige him to pay the twenty talents for which he had engaged for Megaleas; but in reality to secure his person and to sound the disposition of the troops. Leontius sent word of this to the infantry over which he had commanded, who that moment sent a petition to the king, importing, that if Leontius were charged with some new crime for which he deserved to be imprisoned, they insisted that nothing might be decreed against him but in their presence; that if he refused them that favour, they should look upon this refusal as a contempt, and a signal insult, (such was the liberty the Macedonians had the privilege of using with their king); but that in case Leontius was imprisoned only for the twenty talents, they offered to pay that sum among them. This testimony of their affection did but inflame the king's anger, and hasten the death of Leontius.

During this interval, there arrived from Ætolia, ambassadors from Rhodes and Chios, after having prevailed with the Ætolians to consent to a thirty days' truce. They assured the king, that the Ætolians were inclined to a peace. Philip accepted of the truce, and wrote to the allies, desiring them to send their plenipotentiaries to Patre, to negotiate a peace with the Ætolians. He himself set out immediately for that place from Lechæum, and arrived after two days' sail.

He then received letters, directed by Megaleas from Phocis to the Ætolians, in which that traitor exhorted the Ætolians not to entertain the least fear, but to continue the war; that Philip was in the utmost distress for want of ammunition and provisions; to which he added expressions highly injurious to the king. Philip, upon reading these letters, judging Apelles the chief author of them, seized both him and his son; at the same time he sent to Thebes, with orders for Megaleas to be proceeded against there; however, he did not stay for his trial, but laid violent hands on himself. A little after Apelles and his son were also put to death.

I do not know whether history can furnish us with a more remarkable example of the ascendancy which a favourite may gain over the mind of a young sovereign, in order to satiate with impunity his avarice and ambition. Apelles had been Philip's guardian and as such intrusted with the care of his education. He had been at the head of the council of regency established by the late king. This double title of guardian and governor had, on one side, inspired the young prince (as might naturally be expected) with sentiments of regard, esteem, respect, and confidence for Apelles; and, on the other, had made Apelles assume an air of authority and command over his pupil, which he never laid aside. Philip did not want genius, judgment, or penetration. When he was arrived to more mature years, he perceived into what hands he had fallen, but at the same time shut his eyes to all his master's faults. He had discovered, more than once, the mean jealousy which Apelles entertained of conspicuous merit of every kind; and his declared hatred of all such of the king's subjects as were most capable of serving him. Proofs of his extortion and oppression were daily renewed, and the repeated complaints against them rendered the government odious and insupportable. However, all this made no impression, or but a very slight one, on the mind of the young king, over which the prime minister had gained such an influence, that he even stood in fear of him. The reader has seen how extremely difficult it was for the king to break this charm.

In the mean time,¹ the Ætolians wished earnestly that the peace might be concluded; and were quite weary of a war, in which all their expectations had been frustrated. They had flattered themselves, that they had to do with a young unexperienced king, and accordingly believed that they might amuse him as a child; but Philip, on the contrary, had proved to them, that in wisdom and resolution he was a man, and that they had behaved like children in all their enterprises. But having heard of the insurrection of the troops, and the conspiracy of Apelles and Leontius, they postponed the day on which they were to meet at Patræ, in hopes that some sedition would break out at court, to perplex and embroil the king's affairs. Philip, who wished for nothing more ardently than to break off the conferences upon the peace, joyfully seized the opportunity with which the enemies themselves furnished him; and engaged the allies, who were come to the rendezvous, to continue the war. He then set sail on his return to Corinth. He gave the Macedonians leave to go by the way of Thessaly, to take up their winter quarters in their own country; then coasting Attica along the Euripus, he went from Cenchræa to Demetrias,² where he found Ptolemy, the only conspirator that survived; and caused sentence of death to be passed upon him in an assembly of Macedonians.

All these incidents happened at the time that Hannibal was encamped on the banks of the river Po in Italy; and Antiochus, after having subdued the greatest part of Coele-syria, had sent his troops into winter quarters. It was then also that Lycurgus, king of Lacedæmonia, fled to Ætolia, in order to secure himself from the anger of the Ephori, who, on a false report that this king designed to embroil the state, had assembled in the night, and invested his house, in order to seize his person. But Lycurgus, having some notion of this, fled with his whole family. However, he was recalled a little after, as soon as it was known that the suspicions raised against him were all groundless. It being now winter, Philip returned to Macedonia.

Eperatus was by this time universally despised by the Achæans; nobody obeyed his orders; and the country being open and defenceless, dreadful havoc was made in it. The cities being abandoned, and receiving no succours, were reduced to the last extremity, and consequently could scarce furnish their quota. The auxiliary troops, the payment of whose arrears was put off from day to day, served as they were paid, and great numbers of them deserted. All this was owing to the incapacity of the general; and the reader has seen in what manner he was elected. Happily for the Achæans, the time of his command was almost expired. He quitted it in the beginning of the spring; and the elder Aratus was appointed to succeed him.

Philip,³ in his journey to Macedonia, had taken Byzanzora, the greatest city in Peonia, and the most advantageously situated for making incursions from Dardania into Macedonia; so that having possessed himself of it, he had very little to fear from the Dardanians.

After taking that city, he marched again towards

Greece. He judged it would be proper to lay siege to Thebes of A. M. 3787 Phthiotis, from whence the Æto- Ant. J. C. 217 lians used to make continual incursions, and at the same time commit great waste in the territories of Demetrias, Pharsalus, and even Larissa. The attack was carried on with great bravery, and the defence was equally vigorous; but at last, the besieged, fearing they should be taken by storm, surrendered the city. By this conquest Philip secured Magnesia and Thessaly, and carried off a great booty from the Ætolians.

Here ambassadors came again to him from Chios, Rhodes, and Byzantium, and also from Ptolemy, to propose the concluding of a peace. Philip made the same answer as before, that it was what he very much desired; and that they had only to inquire of the Ætolians, whether they also were inclined to it. Philip, in reality, was not very desirous of peace, but he did not care to declare himself.

He afterwards set out with his favourites, for the Nemean games at Argos. Whilst he was viewing one of the combats, a courier arrived from Macedonia, with advice that the Romans had lost a great battle in Tuscany, near the lake Thrasymenus, and that Hannibal was master of the open country. The king showed this letter to none but Demetrias of Pharos, giving him strict charge not to speak of it. The latter took this opportunity to represent to him, that he ought to disengage himself as soon as possible from the Ætolian war, in order to invade Illyria, and afterwards cross into Italy. He added, that Greece, already subjected in all respects, would obey him no less afterwards; that the Achæans had joined voluntarily, and with the utmost cheerfulness, in his cause; that the Ætolians, quite depressed and discouraged by their ill success in the present war, would not fail to follow their example; that if he was desirous of making himself master of the world, a noble ambition, which suited no prince better than himself, he must begin by conquering Italy; that after the defeat of the Romans, the news of which he had then received, the time was come for executing so noble a project, and that he ought not to delay a moment. Such counsel could not but charm a king in the flower of his youth, successful in his exploits, bold, enterprising, and who besides was sprung from a family which had always flattered itself with the hopes of universal empire.

Nevertheless, as he was master of his temper, and governed his thoughts in such a manner as to discover only such of them as suited his interest, (a very rare and valuable quality in so young a prince), he did not express too great an inclination for peace, though he now earnestly desired it. He therefore only caused the allied states to be told to send their plenipotentiaries to Naupactum, in order to negotiate a peace: and at the earnest desire of the Ætolians, he soon arrived in the neighbourhood of that city, at the head of his troops. All parties were so weary of the war, that there was no occasion for long conferences. The first article which the king caused to be proposed to the Ætolians, by the ambassadors of the confederate powers, was, that every one should continue in possession of his conquests: and to this they assented. The rest of the articles were soon agreed upon; so that the treaty was ratified, and all retired to their respective countries. This peace concluded by Philip and the Achæans with the Ætolians; the battle lost by the Romans near the lake Thrasymenus; and the defeat of Antiochus near Raphia; all these events happened in the third year the 140th Olympiad.

In the first separate conference held in the presence of the king A. M. and the ambassadors of the confederate powers, Agelas of Naupactum, who was one of them, enforced his opinions arguments that deserve a place here, and which bius has thought worthy of being related at length in his history. He said that it were to be wis that the Greeks would never make war upon one other; that it would be a great blessing from gods, if, breathing only the same sentiments, th should all in a manner join hand in hand, and unite their whole force, to secure them from the insults of the Barbarians. But if this was not possible, that at least, in the present juncture, they ought to unite together, and watch over the preservation of all Greece: that, to be sensible of the necessity of such a union, they need but turn their eyes to the formidable armies of the two powerful states actually engaged in war: that it was evident to every one, who was ever so little versed in the maxims of policy, that the conquerors, whether Carthaginians or Romans, would not confine themselves to the empire of Italy and Sicily; but would doubtless extend their projects much farther: that all the Greeks in general, and especially Philip, ought to keep a strict eye on the dangers with which they were threatened: that this prince would have nothing to fear, if, instead of attempting to ruin the Greeks, and to give the enemy an easier opportunity of defeating them, as he had hitherto done, he would labour as much for their welfare as his own, and exert himself as vigorously in the defence of all Greece, as if it was his own kingdom: that by this means he would acquire the love and affection of the Greeks, who on their part would be inviolably attached to him in all his enterprises; and, by their fidelity to him, disconcert all the projects which foreigners might form against his kingdom: that if, instead of barely acting upon the defensive, he were desirous of taking the field, and executing some great enterprise; he need but turn his arms towards the west, and keep an eye on the events of the war in Italy: that, provided he would only put himself into a condition for seizing successfully the first opportunity that should present itself, every thing seemed to smoothe the way for universal empire: that, in case he had any difference with the Greeks, he should leave the decision of it to another season: that he ought especially to be careful to preserve to himself the liberty of making war or peace with them, whenever he might think proper: that in case he should suffer the storm which was gathering in the west to burst upon Greece, it was very much to be feared, that it would then be no longer in their power to take up arms, to treat of peace, nor to determine their affairs in a manner agreeable to themselves, or as they might judge most expedient.

Nothing can be more judicious than this speech, which is a clear prediction of what was to happen afterwards to Greece, of which the Romans will soon render themselves absolute masters. This is the first time that the affairs of Italy and Africa influence those of Greece, and direct their motions. After this, neither Philip nor the other powers of Greece regulated their conduct, when they were to make peace or war, by the state of their respective countries, but directed all their views and attention towards Italy. The Asiatics, and the inhabitants of the islands, did the same soon after. All those who, from that time, had reasons to be dissatisfied with the conduct of Philip or Attalus, no longer addressed Antiochus or Ptolemy for protection: they no longer turned their eyes to the south or east, but fixed them upon the west. Sometimes ambassadors were sent to the Carthaginians, and other times to the Romans. Some also came to Philip, at different intervals, from the Romans, who, knowing the enterprising genius of that prince, were afraid he should come and add to the confusion and perplexity of their affairs: which is what the sequel of this history will now show us.

SECTION IV.—PHILIP CONCLUDES A TREATY WITH HANNIBAL. THE ROMANS GAIN A CONSIDERABLE VICTORY OVER HIM AT APOLLONIA. HE CHANGES HIS CONDUCT. HIS BREACH OF FAITH AND IRREGULARITIES. HE CAUSES ARATUS TO BE POISONED. THE AETOLIANS CONCLUDE AN ALLIANCE WITH THE ROMANS. ATTALUS, KING OF PERGAMUS, AND THE LACEDÆMONIANS, ACCEDE TO IT. MACHANIDAS USURPS A TYRANNICAL POWER AT SPARTA. VARIOUS EXPEDITIONS OF PHILIP AND SCAURPIUS THE ROMAN PRÆTOR, IN ONE OF WHICH PHILOPOMEN SIGNALIZES HIMSELF.

THE war between the Carthaginians and the Romans,¹ who were the two greatest powers at that time, drew the attention of all the kings and nations of the earth. Philip, king of Macedon, imagined that he was particularly interested, as his dominions were separated from Italy only by the Adriatic sea, now called the Gulf of Venice. When he heard, by the rumours which were spread, that Hannibal had marched over the Alps, he was indeed very well pleased to see the Romans and Carthaginians at war; but, as the event was doubtful, he did not yet perceive clearly which of those powers it would be his interest to join. But after Hannibal had gained three victories successively, all his doubts were removed, and he hesitated no longer. He sent ambassadors to that general, but unhappily they fell into the hands of the Romans. They were carried to Valerius Levinus the prætor, who was then encamped near Luceria. The principal of the ambassadors, Xenophanes by name, without being in the least disconcerted, answered with a resolute tone of voice, that he had been despatched by Philip to conclude an alliance and friendship with the Romans; and that he had orders to execute with the consuls, as well as with the senate and people of Rome. Levinus, overjoyed to find, at a time when the defection of their ancient allies had become so general, so powerful a monarch desirous of making an alliance with the Romans, treated the ambassadors with all possible respect, and gave them an escort for their safety. Being arrived at Campania they escaped, and fled to Hannibal's camp, where they concluded a treaty, the purport of which was as follows: "That king Philip should cross into Italy with a fleet of 200 sail, and lay waste the sea-coast; and should assist the Carthaginians with his forces both by sea and land: that the latter, at the conclusion of the war, should possess all Italy and Rome; and that Hannibal should have all the spoils: that after the conquest of Italy, they should cross into Greece, and there make war against any power the king should nominate; and that both the cities of the continent, and the islands lying towards Macedonia, should be enjoyed by Philip, and annexed to his dominions." Hannibal, on the other side, sent ambassadors to Philip for his ratification of this treaty; and they set out with those of Macedonia. I observed elsewhere, that in this treaty, the whole of which is preserved by Polybius,² express mention is made of a great number of deities of the two nations, as present at this treaty, and witnesses to the oaths with which the ceremony was attended. Polybius omits a great number of particulars, which, according to Livy, were stipulated by this treaty.

The ambassadors, who set out together, were unhappily discovered and intercepted by the Romans. Xenophanes's lie would not do him the same service as before. The Carthaginians were known by their air, their dress, and still more by their language. Upon them were found letters from Hannibal to Philip, and a copy of the treaty. The ambassadors were carried to Rome. In the condition in which the affairs of the Romans (attacked so vigorously by Hannibal) then were, the discovery of a new enemy, so powerful as Philip, must necessarily alarm them prodigiously. But it is on such occasions that the Roman grandeur was chiefly conspicuous. For, without expressing the least perplexity or discouragement, they took all the measures necessary for carrying on this new war. Philip, informed of what had befallen his ambassadors, sent a second embassy to Hannibal, which was more successful than the former, and brought back the treaty. But these disappointments prevented their forming any enterprise that year, and still kept matters in suspense.

Philip was now wholly employed on his great design of carrying the war into Italy.³ Demetrius of Pharos being with him, was continually urging him to that enterprise; not so much out of zeal for the interest of that prince, as out of hatred to the Romans, who had dispossessed him of his territories, which he thought it would be impossible for him to recover by any other means. It was by his counsel that he had concluded a peace with most of his enemies, in order that he might devote his whole care and attention to this war, the thoughts of which haunted him day and night; so that even in his dreams he spoke of nothing but of war and battles with the Romans; and frequently would start from his sleep, in the highest agitation of mind, and covered with sweat. This prince, who was still young, was naturally lively and ardent in all his enterprises. The success of his arms, the hopes Demetrius gave him, and the remembrance of the great actions of his predecessors, kindled an ardour in him, which increased daily.

During the winter season,¹ he thought of fitting out a fleet; not with the view of venturing a battle with the Romans, for this he was not in a condition to do; but to transport his forces into Italy with the greater expedition, and by that means surprise the enemy when they should least expect it. Accordingly he made the Illyrians build 100 or 120 vessels for him; and after having exercised his Macedonians for some time in naval discipline, he put to sea. He first seized upon the city of Oricum, situated on the western coast of Epirus. Valerius, commander of the fleet that lay before Brundisium, having advice of it, weighed anchor immediately with all the ships in readiness for sailing; retook, the next day, Oricum, in which Philip had left but a slender garrison, and sent a large reinforcement to the aid of Apollonia, to which Philip had laid siege. Nevius, an able and experienced officer, who commanded this reinforcement, having landed his troops at the mouth of the river Aous, upon which Apollonia stands, marched through a by-way; and entered the city in the night, unperceived by the enemy. The Macedonians, imagining they were very secure, because the sea lay between them and the enemy, had neglected all the precautions which the rules of war prescribe, and the exactness of military discipline requires. Nevius, being informed of this, marched silently out of the city in the night, and arrived in the camp, where he found all the soldiers asleep. And now the cries of those who were first attacked awakening the rest, they all endeavoured to save themselves by flight. The king himself, who was but half awake and almost naked, found it very difficult for him to escape to his ships. The soldiers crowded after him, and 3000 of them were either killed or taken prisoners. Valerius, who stayed at Oricum, the instant he heard this news, had sent his fleet towards the mouth of the river, to shut up Philip. This prince finding it impossible for him to advance forward, after setting fire to his ships, returned by land to Macedonia; carrying with him the sorrowful remains of his troops, who seemed more like prisoners disarmed and plundered, than the body of an army.

For some time, Philip,² who till then had been admired for many of those qualities which formed the great prince, had begun to change his conduct and character; and this change was ascribed to the evil counsels of those about him, who, to please him, were perpetually lavishing their encomiums on him, fomenting all his passions, and suggesting to him, that the grandeur of a king consisted in reigning with unlimited power, and in making his subjects pay a blind implicit obedience to his will. Instead of the gentleness, moderation, and wisdom, he till then had displayed, he treated cities and states not only with pride and haughtiness, but with cruelty and injustice; and having no longer, as formerly, his fame in view, he abandoned himself entirely to riot and excesses of every kind; the too common effects of flattery, whose subtle poison generally corrupts the best princes, and sooner or later destroys the great hopes which had been entertained of them.

One would have imagined that the defeat before Apollonia, in covering him with shame, would have abated his pride, and softened his temper. But this only soured it; and one would have concluded, that this prince was resolved to revenge on his subjects and allies the affront he had received from his enemies.

Being arrived in Peloponnesus, a little after his defeat, he used every effort to overreach and surprise the Messenians. But his artifices being discovered he pulled off the mask, and laid waste the whole country. Aratus, who was a man of the greatest honour and probity, was exceedingly shocked at so flagrant an injustice, and made loud complaints against it. He had before begun to retire insensibly from court; but now he thought it high time to break entirely with a prince, who no longer valued his people, and kept no terms even with himself: for he was not ignorant of his connection with his daughter-in-law (a subject of the greatest grief to him) which, however, he had not once hinted to his son; from the consideration, that it would not be of service to him to inform him of his ignominy, as it was not in his power to revenge it.

As it was impossible but that this rupture must make some noise, Philip, whom the greatest crimes now cost nothing, resolved to rid himself of a troublesome censor, whose very absence reproached him with all his irregularities. Aratus's great reputation, and the respect paid to his virtue, would not suffer Philip to employ open force and violence; and therefore he charged Taurion, one of his confidants, to despatch him secretly during his absence. His horrid command was obeyed; for Taurion having insinuated himself into Aratus's familiarity and friendship, invited him several times to dinner, and at one of these entertainments poisoned him; not with a violent and immediate poison, but with one of those which lights up a slow fire in the body, consumes it by insensible degrees, and is the more dangerous, as it gives less notice.

Aratus knew very well the cause of his illness; but as complaints would not be of any service to him, he bore it patiently, without once murmuring, as a common and natural disease. One day only, happening to spit blood before a friend who was in the room with him, and seeing that his friend was surprised, he said, "Behold, my dear Cephalon, the fruits of royal friendship." He died in this manner at Ægium, being then captain-general for the seventeenth time.

The Achæans desired to have him buried in the place where he died, and were preparing such a magnificent mausoleum to his memory as might be suited to the glory of his life, and worthy of his great services. But the Sicyonians obtained that honour for their city, where Aratus was born; and changing their mourning to festivity, crowned with chaplets of flowers, and clothed in white robes, they went and fetched the corpse from Ægium, and carried it in pomp to Sicyon, dancing before it, and singing hymns and odes in honour of the deceased. They made choice of the highest part of the city, where they buried him as the founder and preserver of it, which place was afterwards called Aratium. In Plutarch's time, that is, about 300 years after, two solemn sacrifices were offered him annually: the first on the day that he freed the city from the yoke of tyranny, which sacrifice was called Soteria; and the other on his birth-day. During the sacrifice, choirs of music sung odes to the lyre; and the chief chorister, at the head of the young men and children, walked in procession round the altar. The senate, crowned with chaplets of flowers, and a great part of the inhabitants, followed this procession.

It must be owned that Aratus was one of the greatest men of his time, and may be considered, in some measure, as the founder of the Achaean republic: it was he at least who brought it to the form and splendour it preserved so long afterwards, and by which it became one of the most powerful states of Greece. However, he committed a considerable error, in calling in to the assistance of that Commonwealth the kings of Macedonia, who made themselves masters and tyrants of it; and this, as we have before observed, was an effect of his jealousy of Cleomenes, king of Sparta.

But he was fully punished for it, by the manner in which Philip treated him. Aratus his son met with a still more deplorable fate: for that prince being become completely wicked, says Plutarch, and who affected to add outrage to cruelty, got rid of him, not by mortal poisons, but by those which destroy reason, and craze the brain; and by that means made him commit such abominable actions, as would have reflected eternal infamy on him, had they been done voluntarily, and when he was in his senses: inasmuch that, though he was at that time very young, and in the bloom of life, his death was considered, not as a misfortune with regard to himself, but as the remedy and period of his miseries.

About this time Philip engaged in an expedition against the Illyrians, which was attended with success.¹ He had long desired to possess himself of Lissus; but believed it would be impossible for him ever to take the castle, which was so happily situated and so strongly fortified that it was thought impregnable. Finding that force would not prevail, he had recourse to stratagem. The city was separated from the castle by a little valley; in that he observed a spot covered with trees, and very fit to conceal an ambuscade. Here, during the night, he posted the flower of his troops. The next day he assaulted another part of the city. The inhabitants, who were very numerous, defended themselves with great bravery; and, for some time, the success was equal on both sides. At last they made a furious sally and charged the besiegers with great vigour. The garrison of the castle, seeing Philip retire, imagined that his defeat was certain; and being desirous of sharing in the plunder, most of them came out, and joined the inhabitants. In the mean time, the soldiers who lay in ambuscade attacked the castle, and carried it without great resistance. And now, the signal agreed upon being made, the fugitives faced about and pursued the inhabitants as far as the city, which surrendered a few days after.

M. Valerius Levinus,² as prætor, had been allotted Greece and Macedonia for his province. He was very sensible that, in order to lessen the forces of Philip, it would be absolutely necessary to detach some of his allies (of whom the Ætolians were the most powerful) from his interest. He therefore began by sounding, in private conferences, the disposition of the chief men among the people; and after having brought them over to his views, he went to the general assembly. There, after expatiating on the flourishing state of the Romans, and proving it by their taking of Syracuse in Sicily and Capua in Italy, he extolled the great generosity with which the Romans behaved towards their allies, and their constant fidelity. He added, that the Ætolians might expect to meet with so much the better treatment from the Romans, as they would be the first people in that part of the world who would have concluded an alliance with them: that Philip and the Macedonians were dangerous neighbours, whose power would, in all probability, be of the most fatal consequence to them: that the Romans had already humbled their pride, and would oblige them, not only to restore such fortresses as they had taken from the Ætolians, but even give them cause to fear for their own territories: that with regard to the Acarnanians, who had broke with the Ætolians, the Romans would force them to return to their alliance, on the same conditions which had been prescribed to them when they were admitted into it; or, in case of their refusal, would make them submit to the Ætolians by force of arms.

Scopas, who was at that time chief magistrate of the Ætolian state; and Doriachus, who, of all the citizens, had the greatest credit and authority; strongly enforced the arguments and promises of the prætor, and laid still greater stress upon the grandeur and power of the Romans, because they were not obliged to speak as modestly on those topics as Valerius Levinus, and the people would be more inclined to believe them than a foreigner, who spoke for the interests of his country. The circumstance which affected them most was, the hopes of their possessing themselves of Acarnania. Accordingly, the treaty was concluded between the Romans and the Ætolians. The people of Elis, of Lacedæmonia, Attalus king of Pergamus, Pleuratus king of Thrace, and Scerdilides of Illyria, were left at liberty to accede to this treaty on the same conditions, if they thought proper. The conditions were, "That the Ætolians should declare war as soon as possible against Philip: that the Romans should furnish them, at least, with twenty-five galleys of five benches of oars; that such cities as should be taken from Ætolia, as far as the island of Corcyra,³ should be possessed by the Ætolians, and all the spoils and captives by the Romans: that the Romans should aid the Ætolians in making themselves masters of Acarnania: that the Ætolians should not be allowed to conclude a peace with Philip, but upon condition that he should be obliged to withdraw his troops out of the territories of the Romans, and those of her allies; nor the Romans with Philip, but on the same terms. Immediately hostilities commenced. Philip was dispossessed of some cities, after which Levinus retired to Corcyra; fully persuaded that the king had so much business, and so many enemies, upon his hands, that he would have no time to think of Italy or Hannibal.

Philip was now in winter quarters at Pella, when advice was brought him of the treaty of the Ætolians. To be the sooner able to march out against them, he endeavoured to settle the affairs of Macedonia, and to secure it from any invasions of its neighbours. Scopas, on the other side made preparations for carrying on the war against the Acarnanians, who, though they saw it would be absolutely impossible for them to oppose, at one and the same time, two such powerful states as the Ætolians and Romans, yet took up arms out of despair, rather than from prudential motives, and resolved to sell their lives as dear as possible. Accordingly, having sent into Epirus, which lay very near them, their wives, children, and the old men who were upwards of sixty; all those who remained, from the age of fifteen to threescore, engaged themselves by oath never to return except victorious; denounced the most dreadful imprecations against such among them as should break their oath; and only desired the Epirots to bury, in the same grave, all who should fall in the battle, with the following inscription over them: HERE LIE THE ACARNANIANS, WHO DIED FIGHTING FOR THEIR COUNTRY, AGAINST THE VIOLENCE AND INJUSTICE OF THE ÆTOLIANS. Full of courage, they set out directly, and advanced to meet the enemy to the very frontiers of their country. Such resolution terrified the Ætolians, who had received advice that Philip was already upon his march to aid his allies. Upon this they returned home, and Philip did the same.

In the very beginning of the spring, Levinus besieged Anticyra,⁴ which surrendered a little after. He gave this city to the Ætolians, keeping only the plunder for himself. Here news was brought him, that he had been nominated consul in his absence, and that P. Sulpitius was coming to succeed him as prætor.

In the treaty concluded between the Romans and Ætolians,⁵ several other powers had been invited to accede to it; and we find that Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdilides, accepted of the invitation. The Ætolians exhorted the Spartans to imitate those princes. Chlenas, their deputy, represented in the strongest terms to the Lacedæmonians all the evils which the Macedonians had brought upon them; the design they had always harboured, and still entertained, of enslaving all Greece; particularly the sacrilegious impiety of Philip, in plundering a temple in the city of Thermæ; and his horrid treachery and cruelty to the Messenians. He added, that he had no reason to be under any apprehensions from the Achæans, who, after all the losses they had sustained in the last campaign, would think it a great happiness to be able to defend their own country; that with respect to Philip, when he should find the Ætolians invade him by land, and the Romans and Attalus by sea, he would not think of carrying his arms into Greece. He concluded with desiring the Lacedæmonians to persist in their alliance with Ætolia, or at least to stand neuter.

Lyciscus, the representative of the Acarnanians, spoke next, and declared immediately in favour of the Macedonians. He expatiated on the service which Philip, and afterwards Alexander the Great, had done Greece, by invading and ruining the Persians, its most ancient and most cruel enemies. He put the Lacedæmonians in mind of the gentleness and clemency with which Antigonus had treated them, when he took Sparta. He insisted upon the ignominy as well as danger of suffering barbarians, for so he called the Romans, to enter Greece. He said, that it was worthy of the Spartan wisdom, to foresee from far the storm already gathering in the West; and which would certainly break, first upon Macedonian, and afterwards upon all Greece, which it would involve in ruin. "From what motive did your ancestors," continued he, "throw into a well the man who came in Xerxes's name, to invite them to submit themselves to, and join with, that monarch? Wherefore did Leonidas your king, with his 300 Spartans, brave and defy death? Was it not merely to defend the common liberties of Greece? And now you are advised to give them up to other barbarians, who, the more moderate they appear, are so much the more dangerous. Let the Ætolians," says he, "if they please, dishonour themselves by so shameful a prevarication: this, indeed, would be natural for them to do, as they are utter strangers to glory, and affected with nothing but sordid views of interest. But as to you, O Spartans, who are born defenders of the liberty and honour of Greece, you will sustain that glorious title to the end."

The fragment of Polybius, where these two speeches are reported, goes no farther, and does not inform us what was the result of them. However, the sequel of the history shows, that Sparta joined with the Ætolians, and entered into the general treaty. It was at that time divided into two factions, whose intrigues and disputes, being carried to the utmost height, occasioned great disturbances in the city. One faction was zealous for Philip, and the other declared openly against him: the latter prevailed. We find it was headed by Machanidas, who, taking advantage of the feuds which infested the commonwealth, seized upon the government, and made himself tyrant of his country.

P. Sulpitius and king Attalus being arrived with their fleet to succour the Ætolians; the latter were flushed with the most sanguine hopes, and the opposite party filled with terror; especially as Machanidas, the tyrant of Sparta, was already invading the territories of the Achæans, whose near neighbour he was. Immediately the latter people and their allies sent a deputation to king Philip, and solicited him to come into Greece, to defend and support them. Philip lost no time. The Ætolians, under Pyrrhus, who that year had been appointed their general in conjunction with king Attalus, advanced to meet him as far as Lamia.³ Pyrrhus had been joined by the troops which Attalus and Sulpitius had sent him. Philip defeated him twice; and the Ætolians were forced to shut themselves up in Lamia. As to Philip, he retired to Phalaris⁴ with his army.

During his stay there, ambassadors came from Ptolemy king of Egypt, from the Rhodians, the Athenians, and the inhabitants of Chios; all with instructions to use their utmost endeavours for re-establishing a lasting peace between Philip and the Ætolians. It was not so much out of good will towards the latter, as from the uneasiness they were under in seeing Philip engage so strenuously in the affairs of Greece, which might render him more powerful than suited their interests. For his conquests over the Ætolians, and their confederates, paved the way for his making himself master of all Greece, to which his predecessors had always aspired, and even gave him access to those cities (out of Egypt) which Ptolemy possessed. Philip, however, suspended the debates on the peace, till the next assembly of the Achæans; and in the mean time granted the Ætolians a truce for thirty days. When he came to the assembly, the Ætolians made such very unreasonable proposals, as took away all hopes of an accommodation. Philip, offended that the vanquished should take upon them to prescribe laws to him, declared, that in coming to the assembly he had not depended in any manner on the justice and sincerity of the Ætolians, but that he was very glad to convince his allies, that he himself was sincerely desirous of peace, and that the Ætolians were the only people who opposed it. He set out from thence, after having left 4000 troops to defend the Achæans; and went to Argos, where the Nemean games were going to be exhibited, the splendour of which he was desirous of augmenting by his presence.

While he was busy in solemnizing these games, Sulpitius having set out from Naupactum, and landed between Sicyon and Corinth, laid waste all the open country. Philip upon this news left the games, marched with speed against the enemy, and meeting them laden with spoils, put them to flight, and pursued them to their ships. Being returned to the games, he was received with universal applause; and particularly, because he had laid down his diadem and robes of state, and mixed indiscriminately with the rest of the spectators; a very pleasing as well as soothing sight to the inhabitants of free cities. But as his unaffected and popular behaviour had gained him the love of all, so his enormous excesses soon made him odious. It was now his custom to go at night into people's houses in a plebeian dress, and there practise every kind of licentiousness. It was not safe for fathers and husbands to oppose him on these occasions, in which they would have endangered their lives.

Some days after the solemnization of the games, Philip, with the Achæans, whose captain-general was Cycliadus, having crossed the river of Larissa, advanced as far as the city of Elis, which had received an Ætolian garrison. The first day he laid waste the neighbouring lands; afterwards he drew near the city in battle-array, and caused some bodies of horse to advance to the gates, to induce the Ætolians to make a sally. Accordingly they came out; but Philip was greatly surprised to find some Roman soldiers among them. Sulpitius having left Naupactum with fifteen galleys, and landed 4000 men, had entered the city of Elis in the night. The fight was very bloody.⁴ Demophantus, general of the cavalry of Elis, seeing Philipæmen, who commanded that of the Achæans, advanced out of the ranks, and spurred towards him with great impetuosity. The latter waited for him with the utmost resolution; and preventing his blow, laid him dead, with a thrust of his pike, at his horse's feet. Demophantus being thus fallen, his cavalry fled. I mentioned Philipæmen before, and shall have occasion to speak more particularly of him hereafter. On the other side the infantry of Elis had fought with advantage. And now the king, perceiving that his troops began to give way, spurred his horse into the midst of the Roman foot. His horse being wounded with a javelin, threw him. It was then the battle grew furious, both sides making extraordinary efforts; the Romans to take Philip prisoner, and the Macedonians to save him. The king signaled his courage on this occasion, having been obliged to fight a long time on foot, in the midst of the cavalry; and a great slaughter was made in this engagement. At last, being carried off by his soldiers, and remounted on another horse, he retired. The king encamped about five miles from that place; and the next day, having attacked a castle, in which a great number of peasants, with all their flocks, were retired, he took 4000 prisoners, and 20,000 head of cattle of all sorts: an advantage which might console him for the affront he had lately received at Elis.

That instant, advice was brought him, that the barbarians had made an incursion into Macedonia; upon which he immediately set out to defend his country, having left with the allies a detachment from his army of 2,500 men. Sulpitius retired with his fleet to Ægina, where he joined king Attalus, and passed the winter. Some time after the Achæans gave the Ætolians and the people of Elis battle near Messene, in which they had the advantage.

SECTION V.—EDUCATION AND GREAT QUALITIES OF PHILOPEMEN.

PHILOPEMEN,¹ of whom large mention will be made hereafter, was of Megalopolis, a city of Arcadia, in Peloponnesus. He had received an excellent education through the care of Cassander of Mantinea, who, after his father's death, out of gratitude for the important services he had received from him, undertook to be guardian and governor to his son Philopemen.

When he was past the years of childhood, he was put under the care of Ecdemus and Demophanes, citizens of Megalopolis, who had been scholars to Arcesilaus, founder of the New Academy. The scope of philosophy in those days was, to prompt mankind to serve their country; and, by its precepts, to enable them to govern republics, and transact the greatest affairs of state. This was the inestimable advantage the two philosophers in question procured Philopemen, and thereby rendered him the common blessing of Greece. And, indeed, as it is said that mothers love those children best which they bring forth when advanced in years, Greece, as having given birth to Philopemen in her old age, and after having produced so many illustrious personages, had a singular affection for him, and took a pleasure in enlarging his power, in proportion as his fame increased. He was called the last of the Greeks, as Brutus was afterwards called the last of the Romans; undoubtedly to imply, that Greece, after Philopemen, had produced no great man worthy of her ancient glory.

Having formed himself upon the model of Epaminondas, he copied admirably his prudence in debating and resolving upon affairs; his activity and boldness in executing; and his perfect disinterestedness: but as to his gentleness, patience, and moderation, with regard to the feuds and divisions which usually break out in a state, these he could never imitate. A certain spirit of contention, which resulted naturally from his headstrong and fiery temper, had qualified him better for the military than political virtues.

And, indeed, from his infancy, the only class of people he loved was soldiers; and he took a delight only in such exercises as were necessary to qualify him for the profession of arms; such as fighting in armour, riding, and throwing the javelin. And as he seemed, by his muscles and stature, to be very well made for wrestling, and some particular friends advised him to apply himself to it, he asked them whether this exercise of the athlete contributed to the making a man the better soldier? His friends could not help answering, that the life of the athlete, who were obliged to observe a fixed and regular regimen; to eat a certain food, and that always at stated hours; and to devote a certain number of hours to sleep, in order to preserve their robustness, in which the greatest part of their merit consisted; that this way of life, I say, differed entirely from that of soldiers, who frequently are obliged to submit to hunger and thirst, cold and heat, and have not always fixed hours either for eating or sleeping. From thenceforth he conceived the highest contempt for the athletic exercises: looking upon them as of no service to the public, and considering them, from that instant, as unworthy a man of any elevation of soul, happiness of talents, or love for his country.

The moment he quitted his governors and masters, he entered among the troops which the city of Megalopolis sent to make incursions into Laconia, in order to plunder and bring off from thence cattle and slaves. And in all these irruptions, he was ever the first that marched out, and the last who came in.

During the intervals in which there were no troops in the field, he used to employ his leisure in hunting, to make himself robust and nimble; or else used to spend his hours in cultivating the ground, having a fine estate three miles from the city, whither he used to retire very frequently after dinner or supper. At night he would throw himself on a bed of straw, like one of his slaves, and thus pass the night. The next morning by day-break, he used to go with his vine-dressers, and work in the vineyard, or follow the plough with his peasants. After this, it was his custom to return to the city, and employ himself in public affairs with his friends and the magistrates.

Whatever he got in war, he expended either in horses and arms, or employed in ransoming those of his fellow-citizens who had been taken prisoners. He endeavoured to increase his estate, by improving his lands, which of all profits is the most lawful; and was not satisfied with barely visiting it now and then, and merely for diversion; but devoted his whole care to it; persuaded that nothing is more worthy of a man of probity and honour, than to improve his own fortune, provided he does not injure that of his neighbour.

I must entreat my readers, in order that they may form a right judgment of what I have here said of Philopemen, to convey themselves in imagination back to the ages I am speaking of, and to call to mind with what industry all well-governed nations, as the Hebrews, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, applied themselves to the tilling of land and manual labour, and the high esteem in which such exercises were had in those ages. It is universally known that the Romans, after having gained signal victories, and alighted from the triumphal car crowned with laurels and glory, returned immediately to their farms, whence they had been elected to command armies; and went to guide the plough and oxen, with the same hands which had just before vanquished and defeated their enemies. According to our customs and way of thinking, the exercises above mentioned are very low and contemptible; but it is our misfortune that they should be thought so. Luxury, by corrupting our manners, has vitiated our judgments. It makes us consider as great and valuable, what really in itself deserves nothing but contempt; and it affixes, on the contrary, an idea of contempt and meanness, to things of solid beauty and real greatness.

Philopemen was very fond of the conversations of philosophers, and read their works with the greatest satisfaction; however, he did not read them all without distinction, but such only as could contribute to his improvement in virtue. Of all the great ideas in Homer, he sought and retained such only as exalt the courage, and excite to great exploits; and that poet abounds with ideas of this kind, no writer having ever painted valour in such strong and lively colours. But the other works in which Philopemen delighted most, were those of Evangelus, called the Tactics, that is, the art of drawing up troops in battle-array; and the histories of Alexander the Great: for it was his opinion, that words should always have reference to actions, and theory to practice; and he had very little regard for those books that are written merely to satisfy a vain curiosity, or furnish a rapid and transient amusement.

After he had read the precepts and rules of the Tactics, he did not value the seeming demonstrations of them in plans drawn upon paper, but used to make the application on the spot, in the field: for in his marches, he used to observe exactly the position of the hills and valleys; all the irregularities of the ground; the several different forms and figures which battalions and squadrons are obliged to take by rivulets, ditches, and defiles, in their way, which oblige them to close or extend themselves: and after having reflected seriously on these particulars, he would discourse on them with them in his company.

He was in his thirtieth year when Cleomenes, king of Sparta, attacked Megalopolis. We have seen what courage and greatness of soul he displayed on that occasion. He signalized himself no less, some months after, in the battle of Selasia, where Antigonus gained a famous victory over the same Cleomenes. The king of Macedonia, charmed with such exalted merit, to which he himself had been witness, made him very advantageous offers to attach him to his service. However, so great was his love for his country, that he refused them; not to mention that he had naturally an aversion to a court life, which not only requires great subjection in the man who devotes himself to it, but deprives him of his liberty. However, as he did not choose to pass his life in indolence and inaction, he went into Crete, which was engaged in war, to improve himself in the military art. Crete served him as an excellent school; so that he made a great progress, and acquired a perfect knowledge in that science. He there found men of a very warlike disposition, expert in combats of every kind, extremely temperate, and inured to most severe discipline.

After having served for some time in the troops of that island, he returned among the Achæans with so much renown, that immediately upon his arrival he was appointed general of the horse. The first thing he did was to inquire into the state of his forces, among whom he did not find the least order or discipline. But he could neither dissemble nor suffer such remissness. He himself therefore went from city to city, exhorting particularly all the young men, inspiring them with sentiments of honour, animating them with promises of reward, and sometimes employing severity and punishment when he found them rebellious and ungovernable. He exercised and reviewed them often; or made them engage in tournaments, or similar sports, in places where the greatest number of spectators was likely to be found. By this practice he soon made all his soldiers so robust, expert, and courageous, and at the same time so ready and nimble, that the several evolutions and movements, to the right, to the left, or from the front to the rear, either or all the squadrons together, or of each trooper singly, were performed with so much skill and ease, that a spectator would almost have concluded, that this cavalry was only one individual body, moving spontaneously, at the impression of one and the same will.

In the battle fought near the city of Elis, the last we mentioned, and in which he commanded the horse, he gained great honour; and it was said universally, that he was not inferior to any of the private soldiers, with regard to the strength and ardour of his attacks; nor showed less wisdom and prudence than the oldest and most experienced generals; and that therefore he was equally capable either of fighting or commanding.

Aratus, indeed, was the first who raised the Achæan league to the exalted pitch of glory and power which it attained. Before his time they were despised and weak, because they were divided, and every city among them was studious of nothing but its peculiar interest. But Aratus made them formidable, by uniting and allying them together; and his design was, to form one body and one power of all Peloponnesus, which, by this union, would have become invincible. The success of his enterprises was not owing so much to his courage and intrepidity, as to his prudence, address, affability, and gentleness of demeanour; and what indeed was considered as a defect in his politics, to the friendship he contracted with foreign princes, which at length subjected his state to them. But the instant Philopœmen assumed the reins of government, as he was a great captain, and had come off victorious in all his first battles, he roused the courage of the Achæans; and finding they were able to make head alone against their enemies, he obliged them to shake off the yoke of foreign powers.

He made a great number of improvements in the discipline of the Achæan troops, and changed the manner of drawing up their forces, and their arms, which had a great many defects. He obliged them to use large and strong shields; gave them stout lances; armed them with helmets, breast-plates, and greaves; and thereby accustomed them to fight vigorously and gain ground, instead of hovering and flying about like light-armed troops, who rather skirmish than fight in line of battle.

He afterwards endeavoured to effect another improvement, which was much more difficult as well as more important in one sense; and this was to curb and restrain their luxury, and excessive profusion and expense. I say, to restrain; for he imagined that it would not be possible for him completely to eradicate their violent fondness for dress and ornament. He began by substituting a different object in their place, by inspiring them with the love for another kind of magnificence, viz. to distinguish themselves by their horses, their arms, and other accoutrements of war. This ardour had an effect even on their women, who now spent their whole time in working for their husbands or children. The only things now seen in their hands were helmets, which they adorned with plumes of feathers tinged with the brightest dyes; coats of mail for horsemen, and jackets for the soldiers; all which they embroidered. The bare sight of these things inflamed their courage, breathed into them a strong desire to defy the greatest dangers, and a kind of impatience to fly in quest of glory. Expense in all other things which attract the eye (says Plutarch,) infallibly induces luxury; and inspires all those who take a pleasure in gazing upon it with a secret effeminacy and indolence; the senses, enchanted and dazzled by these deceitful charms, conspiring to seduce the mind itself, and to enervate it by their soft insinuations. But, on the contrary, that magnificence, whose object is arms, animates and exalts courage.

Philopœmen is not the only great man who had this way of thinking. Plutarch observes, that Brutus, who had accustomed his officers to shun what was superfluous on every other occasion, was persuaded that the richness and splendour of the armour and weapons which soldiers have always in their hands, or on their bodies, exalt the courage of those men who are naturally brave and ambitious; and engage such as are of a covetous temper to exert themselves the more in fight, in order to defend their arms, which they look upon as a precious and honourable possession. The same author tells us, that the circumstance which gained Sertorius the affection of the Spaniards, was his bestowing on them, with a very liberal hand, gold and silver to adorn their helmets and enrich their shields. This was also the opinion of Cæsar, who always gave his soldiers arms that glittered with gold and silver; and this he did not only for pomp and splendour, but that they might act with greater courage in battle, through fear of losing arms of so great value.

However, I must not omit observing, that generals no less renowned than those we have mentioned, differed in opinion from them. Mithridates, taught by his misfortunes of how little advantage splendour to an army, would not allow among his soldiers such arms as were gilded or enriched with precious stones; and began to consider them as the riches of the conqueror, and not the strength of those who wore them. Papius, the famous dictator, who, by defeating the Samnites, so signally avenged the affront which the Romans had received at the Fucine Caudine, said to his troops, that it was proper for a soldier to appear with a rough and stern aspect; that ornaments of gold and silver ill became him; and that steel and bravery ought to form his glory and pride. And indeed, added he, gold and silver are rather spoils than arms. These ornaments dazzle the eye before the battle, but make a most hideous appearance in the midst of blood and slaughter. The soldier's ornament is his valour; the rest is always the consequence of victory. A rich enemy falls a prey to the conqueror, how poor soever he may be. It is well known, that Alexander the Great entertained the same idea of the richness and magnificence of the arms of the Persians.¹

In this opposition of opinions, it does not become me to decide which of those great men had the most just way of thinking. But we cannot but admire the skill and address of Philipæmen, who, seeing luxury prevalent and established in his country, did not think it advisable to attempt to banish it entirely; but contented himself with directing it to an object more laudable in itself, and more worthy of brave men.

After Philipæmen had accustomed the young men to make their splendour consist in that of their arms, he himself exercised and formed them very carefully in all the parts of military discipline. On the other side, the youths were very attentive to the instructions he gave them concerning military evolutions, and there arose a kind of emulation among them, which should execute them with the greatest ease and promptitude. They were wonderfully pleased with the manner of drawing up in order of battle, which he taught them; because they conceived, that where the ranks were so very close, they would be the more difficult to break; and their arms, though much more ponderous than before, became much more easy and light in the wearing, because they took great delight in carrying them, on account of their splendour and beauty; and for this reason they wanted to try them, and to see them imbrued in the blood of their enemies.

It must be confessed that Philipæmen, in what light soever we view him, is a great captain, and a noble pattern for the imitation of all who embrace a military life. I cannot too strongly exhort young officers and noblemen to study diligently so perfect a model, and to imitate him in all those things in which he can be imitated by them. Our young noblemen are full of courage, sentiments of honour, love of their country, and zeal for their prince: the war which has broken out so suddenly in Europe, and to which they fly with incredible ardour, is a convincing proof of this, and still more their behaviour in Italy and on the Rhine. They have fire, vivacity, genius, and do not want talents, and qualities capable of raising them to the highest pinnacle of greatness; but then they sometimes want a manly and vigorous education, which alone can form great men in any profession. Our manners being unhappily turned, through a taste which prevails almost universally, towards effeminacy, pleasures, and luxury; the admiration of things trifling in themselves, and a fondness for false splendour, enervate our courage in our most tender years, and blunt the edge of that valour of ancient Gaul, which was once natural to us.

Were the youth among our nobility educated like Philipæmen, so far, I mean, as is consistent with our manners; were they to imbibe in their early years an inclination for studies of a solid kind, for sound philosophy, history, and polity; were they to propose as models for their imitation, the many illustrious generals which the last age produced; were they to put themselves under the tuition of those who are now the ornament and glory of our nation; and would they once duly consider, that true greatness does not consist in surpassing others merely in pomp and profusion, but in distinguishing themselves by solid merit; were they, in a word, to make it their delight and glory to perfect themselves in the art of war, to study it in all its branches, and acquire the true scope and design of it, without omitting any of the means which conduce to their perfection in it; how illustrious a set of officers, commanders, and heroes, would France produce! One single man inspired the breast of the Achæans with this ardour and emulation. How much were it to be wished (and why should we not hope it?) that some one of our princes, great in all things, in valour as well as birth, would revive in our armies this taste of the ancients for simplicity, frugality, and generosity; and direct the taste of the French nation to things truly beautiful, solid, and just! All conquests would be infinitely short of such a glory.

SECTION VI.—VARIOUS EXPEDITIONS OF PHILIP AND SULTIPIUS. A DIGRESSION OF POLYBIUS UPON SIGNALS MADE BY FIRE.

We have already said, that Sulpitius the proconsul, and king Attalus, had continued in winter quarters at Ægina.² As soon as spring appeared they quitted them, and sailed to Lemnos with their fleets, which together amounted to sixty galleys. Philip, on the other side, having appointed Larissa, a city in Thessaly, as the rendezvous of his army, advanced towards Demetrias, that he might be able to oppose the enemy either by sea or land, whither the ambassadors of the allies came from all parts to implore his aid in the imminent danger to which they were exposed. Philip gave them a favourable reception; and promised to furnish them with such succours as the present juncture and the necessity of their affairs might require. He kept his promise, and sent bodies of soldiers into different places, to secure them from the attacks of the enemy. He repaired to Scotussa, and made his troops march thither from Larissa, which lies very near it; and then returned to Demetrias. And in order to enable himself to give seasonable succour to such of his allies as should be attacked, he fixed signals in Phocis, Eubœa, and in the little island Peparethos; and placed, in that part where he lay, on Tisæum, a very lofty mountain of Thessaly, men to observe them, that he might have speedy notice of the enemy's march, and of the places he might design to attack. I shall explain the nature of these signals hereafter.

The proconsul and king Attalus advanced towards Eubœa, and laid siege to Oreum, one of its chief cities. It was defended by two castles strongly fortified, and was able to hold out a long time; but Plator, who commanded it for Philip, surrendered it treacherously to the besiegers. He had purposely made the signals too late, that Philip might not have an opportunity of succouring it. But the same did not happen with respect to Chalcis, which Sulpitius besieged immediately after the taking of Oreum. The signals were made very seasonably there; and the commander, deaf and inaccessible to the offers of the proconsul, prepared for a stout defence. Sulpitius perceived that he had made an imprudent attempt, and was so wise as to desist immediately from it. The city was strongly fortified in itself; and besides, situated on the Euripus, that famous strait,³ in which the sea does not ebb and flow seven times every day, at fixed and sated hours, as (says Livy) is commonly reported, but irregularly, whilst the waves roll on all sides with so much impetuosity, that they seem like torrents rushing down from the mountains; so that ships can never ride there in safety.

Attalus besieged Opus, a city situated not far from the sea-side, among the Locrians, in Achaia. Philip advanced with incredible diligence to its aid, having marched upwards of sixty miles in one day.⁴ The city had been just taken before he arrived at it; and he might have surprised Attalus, who was employed in plundering the place, had not the latter, the instant he heard of his approach, retired with great precipitation. However, Philip pursued him to the sea-side.

Attalus having retired to Oreum, and received advice there that Prusias king of Bithynia had entered his territories, returned towards Asia, and Sulpitius to the island of Egina. Philip, after having taken some small cities, and frustrated the project of Machanidas, the Spartan tyrant, who designed to attack the people of Elis, who were employed in preparing for the solemnization of the Olympic games, repaired to the assembly of the Achæans, which was held at Egium, where he expected to find the Carthaginian fleet, and to join it with his own; but advice being brought that the ships of the Romans and king Attalus had sailed away, that fleet had done the same.

Philip was truly grieved to find, that though he employed the utmost diligence, he always came too late to put his projects in execution; fortune, he would say, taking a pleasure in bereaving him of every opportunity, and in frustrating all his incursions and expeditions. However, he concealed his uneasiness from the assembly, and spoke with an air of confidence and resolution. Having called the gods and men to witness, that he had never neglected any opportunity of marching out, on all occasions, in quest of the enemy; he added, that he did not know which side used the greatest despatch: whether himself in flying to the aid of his allies, or his enemies in avoiding him by flight; that this was a tacit confession that they thought themselves inferior to him in strength: nevertheless, that he hoped soon to gain so complete a victory over them, as would evidently demonstrate his superiority. This speech greatly encouraged the allies. After having given the necessary orders, and made some expeditions of no great importance, he returned to Macedonia, to carry on the war against the Dardanians.

Digression of Polybius on signals made by fire.

The subject which Polybius here treats is curious enough in itself; and besides, it is so closely connected with the history I am now relating, as to excuse my introducing a digression, that will not be of a great length, and which the reader may pass over, if he finds it tedious. I shall repeat it almost literally as I find it in Polybius. Livy, in his account of the particulars above related, and which he has copied almost word for word from Polybius, mentions these signals made by fire; but then he only hints at them, because, as they were not invented by the Romans, this was consequently a subject which did not relate so immediately to the history he was writing. But this use of signals, which is a part of the art of war, belongs properly to the history of the Greeks; and shows to how great a perfection they had carried all the branches of that noble art, the judicious reflections they had formed upon every thing connected with it, and the astonishing progress they had made with respect to the construction of machines of war, different kinds of armour, and military signals.

As the method of making signals by fire, says Polybius, though of great use in war, has hitherto not been treated with any accuracy, I believe it will be proper not to pass over them superficially, but to dwell a little upon that head, in order to give my readers a more perfect idea of it.

It is a truth universally acknowledged, that opportunity is of great advantage in all things, but especially in war. Now, among the several things which have been invented to enable men to seize it, nothing can be more conducive to that end than signals made by fire. Whether transactions have happened but a little before or are then actually taking place, they may, by this method, be very easily made known, at places distant three or four days' journey from where they happened, and sometimes at a still greater distance; and by this means the necessary aids may be obtained in time.

Formerly this method of giving notice was of very little advantage, because of its too great simplicity. For, in order to make use of it, it was necessary that certain signals should be agreed upon; and as events are infinitely various, it was impossible to communicate the greatest part of them by this method. As for instance, not to depart from the present history it was very easy to make known, that a fleet was arrived at Oreum, at Peparethos, or at Chalcis; because the parties whom it concerned had foreseen this event, and accordingly had agreed upon such signals as might denote it. But an unexpected insurrection, treason, a horrid murder committed in a city, and such like accidents, as happen but too often, and which cannot be foreseen, this kind of events, which require immediate consideration and a speedy remedy, cannot be signified by a beacon. For it is not possible to agree upon a signal for such events as it is impossible to foresee.

Æneas, who wrote a treatise on the duties of a general, endeavoured to complete what was wanting on this occasion; but he was far from succeeding so well as could have been wished, or as he himself had proposed, of which the reader may now judge.

Those, says he, who would give signals to one another upon affairs of importance, must first prepare two earthen vessels, exactly equal in breadth and depth: and they need be but four feet and a half deep, and a foot and a half wide. They then must take pieces of cork, proportioned to the mouth of these vessels, but not quite so wide, [that they may sink with ease to the bottom of these vessels.] They next fix, in the middle of this cork, a stick, which must be of equal size in both these vessels. This stick must be divided into portions, of three inches each, very distinctly marked, in order that such events as generally happen in war may be written on them. For example, in one of these intervals the following words may be written: A BODY OF HORSE ARMED INTO THE COUNTRY. On another. A BODY OF INFANTRY HEAVILY ARMED ARE APPROACHING HITHER. On a third: INFANTRY LIGHTLY ARMED. On a fourth: A BODY OF CAVALRY AND INFANTRY. Or another: SHIPS. Then, PROVISIONS, and so on till all the events, which are foreseen as probable to happen in the war that is carrying on, are written down in these intervals.

This being done, each of the two vessels must have a little tube or cock of equal bigness, to let out the water in equal proportion. Then the two vessels must be filled with water; the pieces of cork, with their sticks thrust through them, must be laid upon them, and the corks must be opened. Now it is plain, that as these vessels are equal, the corks will sink, and the sticks descend lower in the vessels, in proportion as they empty themselves. But to be more certain of this exactness, it will be proper to make the experiment first, and to examine whether all things correspond and agree together, by a uniform execution on both sides.

When this is well ascertained, the two vessels must be carried to the two places where the signals are to be made and observed: water is poured in, and the corks and sticks are put in the vessels. According as any of the events which are written on the sticks shall happen, a torch, or other light, is raised, which

Although this method differs from that which was practised in early ages, in which men agreed only upon a single signal which was to denote the event the other party desired to be informed of, and which had been agreed upon, it nevertheless was too vague and indeterminate. For it is impossible to foresee all the accidents that may happen in a war; and even though they could be foreseen, there would be no possibility of writing them all on a piece of stick. Besides, when any unexpected accident should happen, how could notice be given of it according to this method? Add to this, that the inscription on the stick is nowise exact and circumstantial. It does not tell how many horse and foot are come, what part of the country they are in, how many ships are arrived, nor the quantity of provisions. For before these several particulars could be written on the stick, they must have been foreseen, which was altogether impossible, though these are points of the highest importance; and how can succours be sent, when it is not known how many enemies are to be opposed, nor in what part of the country they are? How can a party either confide in or doubt their own strength? In a word, how will they know what to do, when they are not told how many ships, or what quantity of provisions, are come from the enemy.

The last method was invented by Cleoxenus, while others ascribe it to Democlitus; however, we have brought it to perfection, says Polybius, who continues the sole speaker upon this head. This fixes every circumstance, and enables us to give notice of whatsoever happens. The only thing required, is great care and exactness. This method is as follows:

The twenty-four letters of the alphabet must be taken and divided into five parts; and these must be fixed on a board, from top to bottom, in their natural order in five columns; five letters in each column, the last excepted, which will have but four.

The alphabet being disposed in this manner, the man who is to make the signal must begin by showing two torches or lights; and these he must hold aloft till the other party has also shown two lights. This first signal is only to show that both sides are ready, after which the lights must be removed.

The next point is, to make the other party read, in this alphabet, the information we want to acquaint them with. The person who gives the signal, shall hold up torches to his left, in order to denote to the correspondent party, from which of the columns he must take letters, to write them down in proportion as they shall be pointed out to him; so that if it is the first column, he only holds up one torch; if the second, he shows two, and so on, and always to the left. He must do the same to the right hand, to point out to the person who receives the signal, which letter in the column he must observe and write down. This both parties must agree upon between them.

These several preliminaries being arranged, and each of them taken his post, the man who gives the signal must have a geometrical instrument with two tubes, in order that he may know by one of them the right, and by the other the left of him who is to answer. The board must be set up near to this instrument; and to the right and left a solid must be raised ten feet broad, and about the height of a man; in order that the torches, which shall be lifted up over it, may spread a strong, clear light; and that when they are to be lowered, they may be entirely hid behind it.

All things being thus disposed on each side, I will suppose, for instance, that advice is to be given that A hundred Cretans, or Kretans, are gone over to the enemy. First, it will be necessary to choose such words as will express what is here said in the fewest letters possible, as Cretans, or Kretans, a hundred have deserted, which expresses the very same idea in much fewer letters. The following is the manner in which this information will be given.

The first letter is a K, which is in the second column. Two torches must therefore be lifted to the left, to inform the person who receives the signal, that he must look into the second column. Five torches are then to be lifted up to the right, to denote that the letter sought for is the fifth of the second column, that is a K.

Afterwards four torches must be held up to the left, to point out the P, which is in the fourth column; then two to the right, to denote that this letter is the second of the fourth column. The same must be observed with respect to the rest of the letters.

By this method, every event that comes to pass may be communicated in a fixed and determinate manner.

The reason why two sets of lights are used, is because every letter must be pointed out twice; the first time, to denote the column to which it belongs; and the second, to show its place in order in the column pointed out. If the persons employed on these occasions observe the rules here laid down, they will give exact notice; but it must be practised a long time before they will be able to be very quick and exact in the operation.

This is what is proposed by Polybius, who, it is well known, was a great soldier and politician, and for this reason his hints ought to be valued. They might be improved, and put in practice on a great many occasions. These signals were employed in a mountainous country.

A pamphlet was lent me, printed in 1702, and entitled, The art of making signals both by sea and land. The pamphlet was dedicated to the king, by the Sieur Marcel, commissioner of the navy at Arles. This author affirms, that he communicated several times, at the distance of two leagues (in as short a space of time as a man could write down and form exactly the letters contained in the advice he communicated,) an unexpected piece of news that took up a page in writing.

I cannot say what this new invention was, nor what success it met with; but in my opinion such discoveries as these ought not to be neglected. In all ages and nations, men have been very desirous of finding out and employing methods for receiving or communicating news with speed, and of these, signals by fire are one of the principal.

In the fabulous times, when the fifty daughters of Danaus murdered all their husbands in one night Hypermenestra excepted, who had spared Lynceus, it is related that when they escaped by flight, and had each arrived at a place of safety, they informed one another of it by signals made by fire; and that this circumstance gave rise to the festival of torches established in Argos.

Agamemnon, at his setting out for the Trojan expedition, had promised Clytemnestra, that the very day the city should be taken, he would give notice of the victory by fires kindled for that purpose. He kept his word, as appears from the tragedy of Æschylus, which takes its name from that prince; in which the sentinel, appointed to watch for this signal, declares he had spent many tedious nights in that uncomfortable post.

We also find, in the Commentaries of Julius Cæsar, that he himself used the same method.

Cæsar gives us an account of another method in use amongst the Gauls. Whenever any extraordinary event happened in their country, or they stood in need of immediate succour, they gave notice to one another by repeated shouts, which were caught from place to place; so that the massacre of the Romans in Orleans at sunrise, was known by eight or nine o'clock in the evening in Auvergne, forty leagues from the other city.

We are told of a much shorter method.¹ It is pretended that the king of Persia, when he carried the war into Greece, had posted a kind of sentinels at proper distances, who communicated to one another, by their voices, such news as it was necessary to transmit to a great distance; and that advice could be communicated from Athens to Susa (upwards of 150 leagues,) in forty-eight hours.

It is also related that a Sidonian proposed to Alexander the Great, an infallible method for establishing a speedy and safe communication between all the countries subject to him. He required but five days for giving notice, through so great a distance as that between his hereditary kingdom, and his most remote conquest in India: but the king, looking upon this offer as a mere chimera, rejected it with contempt; however, he soon repented it, and very justly; for the experiment might have been made with little trouble to himself.

Pliny relates another method,² which is not altogether improbable. Decimus Brutus defended the city of Modena, besieged by Antony, who kept him closely blocked up, and prevented his sending the least advice to the consuls, by drawing lines round the city, and laying nets in the river. However, Brutus employed pigeons, to whose feet he fastened letters, which arrived in safety wherever he thought proper to send them. Of what use, says Pliny,³ were Antony's intrenchments and sentinels to him? Of what service were all the nets he spread, when the new courier took his route through the air?

Travellers relate, that to carry advice from Alexandria to Aleppo, when ships arrive in that harbour, they make use of pigeons, who have young ones at Aleppo. Letters, containing the advices to be communicated, are fastened to the pigeons' necks, or feet; this being done, the pigeons take wing, soar to a great height, and fly to Aleppo, where the letters are taken from them. The same method is used in many other places.

Description of the instrument employed in signals made by fire.

M. Chevalier, mathematical professor in the royal college, a fellow-member with me, and my particular friend, has been so good as to delineate, at my request, the figure⁴ of the instrument, mentioned by Polybius, and to add the following explication of it.

In this manner I conceive to have been constructed the instruments described by Polybius, for communicating advices at a great distance, by signals made by fire.

AB is a beam about four or five feet long, five or six inches broad, and two or three inches thick. At the extremities of it are, well dove-tailed and fixed exactly perpendicular in the middle, two cross pieces of wood, CD, EF, of equal breadth and thickness with the beam, and three or four feet long. The sides of these cross pieces of timber must be exactly parallel, and their upper superficies very smooth. In the middle of the surface of each of these pieces, a right line must be drawn parallel to their sides; and consequently these lines will be parallel to one another. At an inch and a half or two inches distance from these lines, and exactly in the middle of the length of each cross piece, there must be driven in very strongly, and exactly perpendicular, an iron or brass screw⁵ (2), whose upper part, which must be cylindrical, and five or six lines in diameter,⁶ shall project seven or eight lines above the superficies of these cross pieces.

On these pieces must be placed two hollow tubes or cylinders GH, IK, through which the observations are made. These tubes must be exactly cylindrical and formed of some hard, solid metal, in order that they may not shrink or warp. They must be a foot longer than the cross piece on which they are fixed and thereby will extend six inches beyond it at each end. These two tubes must be fixed on two plates of the same metal, in the middle of whose length shall be a small convexity (3) of about an inch round. In the middle of this part (3) must be a hole exactly round, about half an inch in diameter; so that applying the plates on which these tubes are fixed, upon the cross pieces of wood CD, EF, this hole must be exactly filled by the projecting and cylindrical part of the screw (2) which was fixed in it, and in such a manner as to prevent its play. The head of the screw may extend some lines beyond the superficies of the plates, and in such a manner as that those tubes may turn with their plates about these screws, in order to direct them on the boards or screens P, Q, behind which the signals by fire are made, according to the different distances of the places where the signals shall be made.

The tubes must be blackened within, in order that when the eye is applied to one of their ends, it may not receive any reflected rays. There must also be placed towards the end, on the side of the observer, a perforated ring, the aperture of which must be about three or four lines; and at the other end must be placed two threads, the one vertical, and the other horizontal, crossing one another in the axis of the tube.

In the middle of the beam AB must be made a round hole, two inches in diameter, in which must be fixed the foot LMNOP, which supports the whole machine, and round which it turns as on its axis. This machine may be called a rule and sights, though it differs from that which is applied to circumferentiators, theodolites, and even geometrical squares, which are used to draw maps, take plans and surveys, &c. but it has the same use, which is to direct the sight.

The person who makes the signal, and he who receives it, must each have a similar instrument: otherwise, the man who receives the signal could not distinguish whether the signals are made to the right or left of him who makes them, which is an essential circumstance according to the method proposed by Polybius.

The two boards or screens, PQ, which are to denote the right and left hand of the man who gives the signals, or to display or hide the fires, according to the circumstances of the observation, ought to be greater or less, and nearer or farther distant from one another, according as the distance between the places where the signals must be given and received is greater or less.

In my description of the preceding machine, all I have endeavoured is, to explain the manner how Polybius's idea might be put in execution, in making signals by fire; but I do not pretend to say, that it is of use for giving signals at a considerable distance; for it is certain that how large soever this machine be, signals made by 2, 3, 4, and 5 torches will not be seen at 5, 6, or more leagues distance, as he supposes. To make them visible at a greater distance, such torches must not be made use of, as can be lifted up and down with the hand, but large wide-spreading fires of whole loads of straw or wood; and, consequently, boards or screens of a prodigious size must be employed, to hide or eclipse them.

Telescopes were not known in Polybius's time; they were not discovered or improved till the last century. Those instruments would have made the signals in question visible at a much greater distance than bare tubes could have done; but I still doubt whether they could be employed for the purpose mentioned by Polybius, at a greater distance than two or three leagues. However, I am of opinion, that a city besieged might communicate its wants to an army sent to succour it, or give notice how long it could hold out a siege, in order that proper measures might be taken; and that, on the other side, the army sent to its aid might communicate its designs to the city besieged, especially by the assistance of telescopes.

SECTION VII.—PHILOPEMEN GAINS A FAMOUS VICTORY NEAR MANTINEA, OVER MACHANIDAS, TYRANT OF SPARTA. THE HIGH ESTEEM IN WHICH THAT GENERAL IS HELD. NABIS SUCCEEDS MACHANIDAS. SOME INSTANCES OF HIS AVARICE AND CRUELTY. A GENERAL PEACE CONCLUDED BETWEEN PHILIP AND THE ROMANS, IN WHICH THE ALLIES ON BOTH SIDES ARE INCLUDED.

THE Romans, wholly employed in the war with Hannibal, which A. M. 3798. they resolved to terminate, inter- Ant. J. C. 206. meddled very little with that of the Greeks, and did not molest them during the two following years.

In the first, Philopemen was appointed captain-general of the Achæans. As soon as he was invested with this employment, which was the highest in the state, he assembled his allies before he took the field, and exhorted them to second his zeal with courage and warmth, and support with honour both their fame and his. He insisted strongly on the care they ought to take, not of the beauty and magnificence of their dress, which became women only, and those too of little merit; but of the good condition and splendour of their arms, an object worthy of men, intent upon their own glory and the good of their country.

His speech was received with universal applause, inasmuch that at the breaking up of the assembly, all those who were magnificently dressed were pointed at; so great an influence have the words of an illustrious person, not only in dissuading men from vice, but in inclining them to virtue; especially when his actions correspond with his words, for then it is scarce possible to resist his exhortations. This was the character of Philopemen. Plain in his dress, and frugal in his diet, he took very little care of his body. In conversation he suffered patiently the ill temper of others, even when they used contemptuous expressions; for he himself, he was particularly careful never to give the least offence to any one. It was his study, during his life, to speak nothing but the truth; and indeed, the slightest expressions of his were heard with respect, and immediately believed. And he was not obliged to employ a great many words to persuade, his conduct being a model of what every body else ought to do.

The assembly being dismissed, all returned to their respective cities, in the highest admiration of Philopemen, whose words as well as actions had charmed them; and fully persuaded, that as long as he should preside at the head of affairs, the state would never suffer any loss. He immediately visited the several cities, and gave the necessary orders in them. He assembled the people in every place, acquainted them with every thing that was necessary to be done, and raised troops. After spending near eight months in making the various preparations for the war, he took the field.

Machanidas,² tyrant of Lacedæmonia, was watching at the head of a powerful army, for an opportunity to subject all Peloponnesus. The moment advice was brought of his arrival in the territories of Mantinea, Philopemen prepared to give him battle.

The tyrant of Sparta set out upon his march at day-break, at the head of the heavy-armed infantry, and posted to the right and left on the same line, but a little more advanced, the light infantry composed of foreigners; and behind them chariots laden with catapultæ,³ and darts to sustain them. It appears by the sequel, that before him lay a ditch, that ran along part of the plain, beyond which his troops extended at each end.

At the same time Philopemen marched his army in three bodies out of the city. The first, consisting of the Achæan horse, was posted to the right. The second, composed of heavy-armed foot, was in the centre, and advanced to the ditch. The third, composed of Illyrians, cuirassiers, foreigners, light-armed troops, and some Tarentine horse,⁴ were on the left with Philopemen at their head.

The time for beginning the battle approaching, and the enemy in view, that general, flying up and down the ranks of the infantry, encouraged his men in few but energetic words. Most of them were even not heard; for he was so dear to his soldiers, and they reposed such confidence in him, that they were sufficiently inclined of themselves to fight with incredible ardour. In a kind of transport they animated their general, and pressed him to lead them on to battle. All he endeavoured to make them understand was, that the time was come in which their enemies would be reduced to an ignominious captivity, and themselves restored to a glorious and immortal liberty.

Machanidas marched his infantry in a kind of column, as if he intended to begin the battle by charging the right wing: but when he was advanced to a proper distance, he on a sudden made his infantry wheel about, in order that it might extend to his right, and form a front equal to the left of the Achæans; and to cover it, he caused all the chariots laden with catapultæ to advance forward. Philopemen plainly saw that his design was to break his infantry, by overwhelming it with darts and stones: however, he did not give him time for it, but caused the Tarentine horse to begin the battle with great vigour, on a spot where they had room enough to engage in. Machanidas was forced to do the same, and to lead on his Tarentines. The first charge was very furious. The light-armed soldiers advancing a little after to sustain them, in a moment the foreign troops were universally engaged on both sides: and, as in this attack they fought man to man, the battle was a long time doubtful. At last the foreigners in the tyrant's army had the advantage; their numbers and dexterity, acquired by experience, giving them the superiority. The Illyrians and cuirassiers, who sustained the foreign soldiers in Philopemen's army could not withstand so furious a charge. They were entirely broke, and fled with the utmost precipitation towards the city of Mantinea, about a mile from the field of battle.

Philopemen seemed now lost to all hopes. On this occasion, says Polybius, appeared the truth of a maxim, which cannot reasonably be contested, That the events of war are generally successful or unfortunate, only in proportion to the skill or ignorance of the generals who command. Philopemen, so far from desponding at the ill success of the first charge, or losing his presence of mind, was solely intent upon taking advantage of the errors which the enemy might commit. Accordingly they were guilty of a great one, which indeed is but too frequent on these occasions, and for that reason cannot be too strongly guarded against. Machanidas, after the left wing was routed, instead of improving that advantage, by charging in front that instant with his infantry the centre of that of the enemies, and taking it at the same time in flank with his victorious wing, and thereby terminating the whole affair, suffers himself, like a young man, to be hurried away by the fire and impetuosity of his soldiers, and pursues without order or discipline, those who were flying; as if, after having given way, fear alone would not have carried them to the gates of the city.

Philopemen, who upon this defeat had retired to his infantry in the centre, takes the first cohorts, commands them to wheel to the left, and at their head marches and seizes the post which Machanidas had abandoned. By this movement he divided the centre of the enemy's infantry from his right wing. He then commanded these cohorts to stay in the post they had just seized, till farther orders; and at the same time directed Polybius,¹ the Megalopolitan to rally all the Illyrians, cuirassiers, and foreigners, who without quitting the ranks, and flying, as the rest had done, had drawn off to avoid the fury of the conqueror; and, with these forces, to post himself on the flank of the infantry in his centre, to check the enemy in their return from the pursuit.

But now the Lacedæmonian infantry, elate with the first success of their right wing, without waiting for the signal, advance with their pikes lowered towards the Achæans as far as the brink of the ditch. When they came up to it, whether that from being so near the enemy, they were shamed not to go on, or that they did not value the ditch, because it was dry and had no hedge; and besides, being no longer able to retire, because the advanced ranks were pushed forward by those in the rear, they rushed into the ditch at once. This was the decisive point of time which Philopœmen had long awaited, and thereupon he orders the charge to be sounded. His troops, levelling their pikes, fell with dreadful shouts on the Lacedæmonians. The latter, who at their descending into the ditch, had broken their ranks, no sooner saw the enemy above them, than they immediately fled; nevertheless, great numbers of them were left in the ditch, having been killed either by the Achæans or their own soldiers.

To complete the glory of this action, it now remained to prevent the tyrant from escaping the conqueror. This was Philopœmen's only object. Machanidas, on his return, perceived that his army fled; and being sensible of his error, he endeavoured, but in vain, to force his way through the Achæans. His troops perceiving that the enemy were masters of the bridge which lay over the ditch, were quite dispirited, and endeavoured to save themselves as well as they could. Machanidas himself, finding it impossible to pass the bridge, hurried along the side of the ditch, in order to find a place where he might pass it. Philopœmen knew him by his purple mantle and the trappings of his horse: so that, after giving the necessary orders to his officers, he passed the ditch, in order to stop the tyrant. The latter having found a part of the ditch which might easily be crossed, claps spurs to his horse, which springs forward in order to leap over. That very instant Philopœmen hurled his javelin at him, which laid him dead in the ditch. The tyrant's head being struck off, and carried from rank to rank, gave new courage to the victorious Achæans. They pursued the fugitives, with incredible ardour, as far as Tegææ, entered the city with them, and being now masters of the field, the very next day they encamped on the banks of the Eurotas.

The Achæans did not lose many men in this battle, but the Lacedæmonians lost not less than 4000, without including the prisoners, who were still more numerous. The baggage and arms were also taken by the Achæans.

The conquerors, struck with admiration at the conduct of their general, to whom the victory was entirely owing, erected a brazen statue to him in the same attitude in which he had killed the tyrant; which statue they afterwards placed in the temple of Apollo at Delphi.

Polybius justly observes, that this signal victory must not be ascribed either to chance, or a concurrence of circumstances, but entirely to the abilities of the general, who had foreseen and made every necessary disposition for this great event. And, indeed, from the beginning (it is Polybius who still speaks, and continues his reflections) Philopœmen had covered himself with the ditch: not to avoid coming to battle, as some have imagined, but because, like a judicious man and a great soldier, he had reflected, that should Machanidas attempt to make his army pass the ditch, before he had examined it, his troops would certainly be cut to pieces, and entirely defeated; or if, being stopped by the ditch, he should change his resolution, and break his order of battle through fear, that he would be thought the most unskilful of generals, in abandoning victory to the enemy, without daring to come to a battle, and in carrying off no other marks of his enterprise, than the ignominy of having renounced it. Polybius also highly applauds the presence of mind and resolution of Philopœmen, in not depending or losing courage when his left wing was routed, but in having made that very defeat an occasion of his gaining a glorious victory.

It appears to me that these small battles, where there are not many combatants on either side, and in which, for that reason, one may follow, as it were, with the eye, the several steps of the commanding officers, observe the several orders they give, the precautions they take, and the errors they commit, may be of great service to those who are one day to command armies; and this is one of the chief advantages resulting from the study of history.

It is related that, in the assembly of the Nemean games, which were A. M. 3799. solemnized this year after this famous battle of Mantinea, Philopœmen being elected general of the Achæans a second time, and having then no employment for his forces, upon account of the festival, caused his phalanx, very splendidly clothed, to pass in review before all the Greeks, and made them perform their usual exercises, to show with what dexterity, strength, and agility, they performed the several military movements, without ever breaking or disordering their ranks. He afterwards went into the theatre, in which the musicians were disputing for the prize in their art, accompanied by those youths in their coats of arms, all of a graceful stature, and in the flower of their age; all filled with the highest veneration for their general, and fired at the same time with a martial intrepidity; sentiments with which their glorious battles and success, under this illustrious general, had inspired them.

The very instant that this flourishing troop of youths entered with Philopœmen, Pylades the musician, who was singing to his lyre the Persians of Timotheus,² happened accidentally to repeat the following verse:

The wreath of liberty to me you owe.

The grandeur of the poetry being finely expressed by the singer, who had an exquisite voice, struck the whole assembly. At the same time all the Greeks cast their eyes upon Philopœmen, and clapping their hands and raising shouts of joy, they called to mind the glorious ages of triumphant Greece; soothing themselves with the pleasing hopes, that they should revive those ancient times, and their pristine glory, so greatly did a general like Philopœmen increase their confidence, and inflame their courage.

And indeed, says Plutarch, as we find young colts are always fond of those they are used to, and that in case any other person attempts to mount them, they are restive, and prance about with their new rider; the same disposition appeared in the Achæan league. The instant they were to embark in a new war, and a battle was to be fought, if any other general was appointed, immediately the deputies of the confederate powers would be discouraged, and turn their eyes in quest of Philopœmen; and the moment he appeared, the whole league revived and were ready for action; so strongly were they persuaded of his great valour and abilities; well knowing that he was the only general whose presence the enemy dreaded, and whose name alone made the enemy tremble.

Can there, humanly speaking, be more pleasing, more affecting, or more solid glory for a general or a prince, than to see himself esteemed, beloved, and revered, by the army and by nations, in the manner Philopœmen was? Is it possible for any man to be so void of taste and sound sense, as to prefer, or even compare, to the honour which the exalted qualities of Philopœmen acquired him, the pretended glory which so many persons of quality imagined they derived from their equipages, buildings, furniture, and the ridiculous expence of their tables? Philopœmen affected magnificence more than they do; but then he placed it in what it really consists; the clothing his troops splendidly; providing them good horses and shining arms: supplying, with a generous hand, all their wants both public and private; distributing money seasonably to encourage the officers, and even the private men: in acting thus, Philopœmen, though dressed in a very plain habit, was looked upon as the greatest and most magnificent general of his time.

² This was a dithyrambic poet, who lived about the 95th Olympiad, i. e. 398 years before Christ. One of his pieces was entitled the Persians.

Sparta did not recover its ancient liberty by the death of Machanidas, the only consequence of which was, its changing one oppressor for another. The tyrant had been extirpated, but not the tyranny. That unhappy city, formerly so jealous of its liberty and independence, and now abandoned to slavery, seemed by its indolence studious of nothing but to make itself new chains, or to support its old ones. Machanidas was succeeded by Nabis, a still greater tyrant than the former, yet the Spartans did not show the least spirit, or make the least effort to shake off the yoke of slavery.

Nabis, in the beginning of his government, was not desirous to undertake any foreign expedition; but employed his whole endeavours in laying the solid foundation of a lasting and cruel tyranny. For that purpose he made it his particular care to destroy all the remaining Spartans in that republic. He banished from it all such as were distinguished for their quality and wealth, and gave their estates and wives to the chief men of his party. We shall speak of these persons hereafter under the name of the Exiles. He had taken into his pay a great number of foreigners, all plunderers and assassins, and capable of perpetrating the blackest crimes for gain. This kind of people, who had been banished their country for their crimes, flocked round the tyrant, who lived in the midst of them as their protector and king; employing them as his attendants and guards, to strengthen his tyranny, and confirm his power. He was not satisfied with banishing the citizens; he acted in such a manner that they could not find any secure asylum, even in foreign countries; some were butchered in their journey by his emissaries, and he recalled others from banishment with no other view but to murder them.

Besides these barbarities, he invented a machine which may be called an infernal one, representing a woman magnificently dressed, and exactly resembling his wife. Every time that he sent for any person to extort money from him, he would first converse with him in the kindest and most gentle terms, on the danger with which the whole country, and Sparta in particular, was menaced by the Achæans; the number of foreigners he was obliged to keep in pay for the security of the state; the great sums he expended for the worship of the gods, and for the good of the public. In case the person spoken to was wrought upon by his words, he proceeded no farther, this being all he wanted: but, if he was refractory, and refused to give him money, he would say, "Probably the talent of persuasion is not mine; but I hope that Apega will be able to persuade you." Apega was the name of his wife. He no sooner uttered these words than his machine appeared. Nabis, taking her by the hand, raised her from her chair, and led her to the person. The hands, the arms, and breast of this machine were stuck with sharp iron points, concealed under the clothes. The pretended Apega embraced the unhappy wretch, folded him in her arms; and laying hers round his waist, clasped him to her bosom, whilst he uttered the most lamentable cries. The machine was made to perform these several motions by secret springs. In this manner did the tyrant put many to death, from whom he could not otherwise extort the sums he demanded.

Would one believe that a man could be capable of contriving, in cold blood, such a machine, merely to torture his fellow-creatures, and to feed his eyes and ears with the cruel pleasure of seeing their agonies and hearing their groans? It is astonishing that in such a city as Sparta, where tyranny was had in the utmost detestation; where men thought it glorious to confront death; where religion and the laws, so far from restraining men as among us, seemed to arm them against all who were enemies to liberty, it is astonishing, I say, that so horrid a monster should be suffered to live one day.

I have already observed, that the Romans, employed in a more important war, had intermeddled very little with the affairs of Greece.²

The Ætolians, finding themselves neglected by that powerful people, who were their only refuge, made a peace with Philip. Scarce was the treaty concluded, when P. Sempronius the proconsul arrived with 10,000 foot, 1000 horse, and thirty-five ships of war. He was very much offended at them for making this peace without having first obtained the consent of the Romans, contrary to the express words of the treaty of alliance. The Epirots also, tired with the length of the war, sent deputies (with the proconsul's leave) to Philip, who now was returned to Macedonia, to exhort him to agree to a general peace; hinting to him, that they were almost sure, if he consented to have an interview with Sempronius, they would easily agree upon the conditions. The king was greatly pleased with these overtures, and went to Epirus. As both parties were desirous of peace; Philip, that he might have leisure to settle the affairs of his kingdom; and the Romans, that they might be able to carry on the war against Carthage with greater vigour; a treaty was soon concluded. The king caused Prusias king of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bœotians, Thessalians, Arcadians, and Epirots, to be included in it; and the Romans included the people of Ilium, king Attalus, Pleuratus, Nabis the Spartan tyrant, successor to Machanidas, the people of Elis, the Messenians, and the Athenians. In this manner the war of the allies was terminated by a peace which was of no long continuance.

SECTION VIII.—THE GLORIOUS EXPEDITIONS OF ANTIOCHUS INTO MEDIA, PARTHIA, HYRCANIA, AND AS FAR AS INDIA. AT HIS RETURN TO ANTIOCH, HE RECEIVES ADVICE OF PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR'S DEATH.

THE history of the wars in Greece obliged us to interrupt the relation of the transactions in Asia, and therefore we now return to them.

Antiochus, after the death of Achæus, after he had employed some time in settling his affairs in Asia Minor, marched towards the East, to reduce those provinces which had revolted from the empire of Syria. He began with Media, of which the Parthians had just before dispossessed him. Arsaces, son to him who founded that empire, was their king. He had taken advantage of the troubles in which the wars of Antiochus with Ptolemy and Achæus had involved him, and had conquered Media.

This country, says Polybius, is the most powerful kingdom in all Asia, as well for its extent, as for the number and strength of the men, and the great quantity of horses it produces. Media furnishes all Asia with those beasts; and its pastures are so good, that the neighbouring monarchs send their studs thither. Ecabatana is its capital city. The edifices of this city surpass in richness and magnificence all others in the world, and the king's palace is 700 fathoms round. Though all the wood-work was of cedar and cypress, yet not the least piece of timber was visible; the joints, the beams, the ceilings, and columns which sustained the porticoes and piazzas, being covered with silver or gold plates. All the tiles were of silver. The greatest part of these rich materials had been carried off by the Macedonians under Alexander the Great, and the rest plundered by Antigonus and Seleucus Nicator. Nevertheless, when Antiochus entered this kingdom, the temple of Æna was still surrounded with gilded columns, and the soldiers found in it a great number of silver tiles, a few golden bricks, and a great many of silver. All this was converted into specie, and stamped with Antiochus's image; the whole amounting to 4000 talents, or about 600,000*l*. sterling.

Arsaces expected that Antiochus would advance as far as this temple; but he never imagined that he would venture to cross, with his numerous army, a country so barren as that which lies near it; and especially as no water can be found in those parts, none appearing on the surface of the earth. There are indeed rivulets and springs under ground; but no one, except those that know the country, can find them. On this subject, a true story is related by the inhabitants of the country, that the Persians, when they conquered Asia, gave to those who should raise water in places where none had been before, the profits arising from such places to the fifth generation inclusively. The inhabitants, animated by these promises, spared neither labour nor expense to convey water under ground from mount Taurus, whence a great quantity flows, as far as these deserts; inasmuch that at this time, says Polybius, those who make use of these waters, do not know from what springs the subterraneous rivulets flow that supply them with it.

It were to be wished that Polybius, who generally is diffusive enough, had been more circumstantial here, and had explained to us in what manner these subterraneous canals (for such were the wells here spoken of) were constructed, and the methods employed by Arsaces to stop them. From the account he gives of the prodigious labour employed, and the vast sums expended to complete this work, we are led to suppose that water had been conveyed into every part of this vast desert, by stone aqueducts built under ground, with openings at proper distances, which Polybius calls wells.

When Arsaces saw that Antiochus was crossing the deserts, in Ant. J. C. 211. spite of the difficulties which he imagined would impede his march, he gave orders for stopping up the wells. But Antiochus, having foreseen this, sent a detachment of horse, which posted itself near these wells, and beat the party that came to stop them. The army passed the deserts, entered Media, drove Arsaces out of it, and recovered all that province. Antiochus stayed there the rest of the year in order to regulate the affairs of the province, and to make the preparations necessary for carrying on the war.

The year following, he entered Ant. J. C. 210. very early into Parthia, where he was as successful as he had been the year before in Media; Arsaces was forced to retire into Hyrcania, where he imagined that by securing some passes of the mountains which separate it from Parthia, it would be impossible for the Syrian army to disturb him.

However, he was mistaken: for Ant. J. C. 209. as soon as the season would permit, Antiochus took the field; and after incredible difficulties, attacked all those posts at the same time with his whole army, which he divided into as many bodies as there were attacks to be made, and soon forced them all. He afterwards reassembled them in the plains, and marched to besiege Serings, which was the capital of Hyrcania. Having besieged it for some time, he at last made a great breach, and took the city by storm, upon which the inhabitants surrendered at discretion.

In the mean time Arsaces was very busy. As he retired, he reassembled troops, which at last formed an army of 120,000 foot and 20,000 horse. He then took the field against the enemy, and checked their progress with the utmost bravery. His resistance protracted the war, which seemed almost at an end. After many engagements, Antiochus perceiving he gained no advantage, judged that it would be extremely difficult to reduce so valiant an enemy, and drove him entirely out of the provinces, where by length of time he had so strongly established himself. For this reason he began to listen to the overtures which were made him for terminating so tedious a war.

At last a treaty was concluded, in which it was stipulated that Arsaces should continue in possession of Parthia and Hyrcania, upon condition that he should assist Antiochus in recovering the rest of the revolted provinces. A. M. 3796. Ant. J. C. 208.

Antiochus, after this peace, turned his arms against Euthydemus, king of Bactria. We have already shown in what manner Theodotus had disunited Bactria from the empire of Syria, and left it to his son of the same name with himself. This son had been defeated and dispossessed by Euthydemus, a brave and prudent man, who maintained for a long time a war against Antiochus. The latter used his utmost endeavours to recover Bactria;² but they all were rendered ineffectual by the valour and vigilance of Euthydemus. During the course of this war, Antiochus displayed his bravery in the most extraordinary manner. In one of these battles his horse was killed under him, and he himself received a wound in the mouth, which, however, was not dangerous, being attended with only the loss of some of his teeth. A. M. 3797. Ant. J. C. 207.

At last he grew weary of a war in which he plainly perceived that it would be impossible for him to dethrone this prince. He therefore gave audience to Euthydemus's ambassadors, who represented to him, that the war he was carrying on against their sovereign was not just: that he had never been his subject, and consequently that he ought not to avenge himself on their king, because others had rebelled against him; that Bactria had thrown off the yoke of the Syrian empire under other monarchs long before him; that he possessed this kingdom by right of conquest over the descendants of those chiefs of the rebellion, and preserved it as the reward of a just victory. They also insinuated to him that the Scythians, observing both parties had weakened themselves by this war, were preparing to invade Bactria with great fury; and that should they persist obstinately in disputing for it, those barbarians might very possibly dispossess both of it.

This reflection made an impression on Antiochus, who by this time was grown quite weary of so unprofitable and tedious a war; and for this reason he granted them such conditions as ended in peace. To confirm and ratify it, Euthydemus sent his son to Antiochus. He gave him a gracious reception; and judging, by his agreeable mien, his conversation, and the air of majesty conspicuous in his whole person, that he was worthy of a throne, he promised him one of his daughters in marriage, and granted his father the title of king. The other articles of the treaty were put into writing, and the alliance was confirmed by the usual oaths. A. M. 3798. Ant. J. C. 206.

Having received all Euthydemus's elephants, which was one of the articles of the peace, he passed mount Caucasus, and entered India, and then renewed his alliance with the king of that country. He also received elephants from him, which, with those Euthydemus had given him, amounted to 150. He marched from thence into Archoshia, afterwards into Drangiana, thence into Carmania, establishing his authority and good order in all those provinces.

He passed the winter in the latter country. From thence he returned by Persia, Babylon, and Mesopotamia, and at last arrived at Antioch, after having spent seven years in this expedition. The vigour of his enterprises, and the prudence with which he had conducted the whole war, acquired him the character of a wise and valiant prince, and made him formidable to Europe as well as Asia. A. M. 3799. Ant. J. C. 203.

A little after his arrival at Antioch, advice was brought him of the death of Ptolemy Philopator. That prince, by his intemperance and excesses, had quite ruined his constitution, which was naturally strong and vigorous. He died, as generally happens to those who abandon themselves to pleasure, before he had run half his course. He was little more than twenty years old when he ascended the throne, and reigned but seventeen years. He was succeeded by Ptolemy Epiphanes his son then five years old.

I RELATED in the preceding book

A. M. 3800. how Ptolemy Philopator, worn out with riots and excesses, had closed his life, after having reigned seventeen years. As the only persons present when that monarch expired were Agathocles, his sister, and their creatures, they concealed his death as long as possible from the public, in order that they might have time to carry off all the money, jewels, and other valuable effects in the palace. They also formed a plan to maintain themselves in the same authority they had enjoyed under the late king, by usurping the regency during the minority of his son, named Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was then but five years old. They imagined this might easily be done, if they could but take off Tlepolemus, who had succeeded Sosibius in the ministry; and accordingly they concerted measures to despatch him.

At last they informed the public of the king's death. Immediately a great council of the Macedonians² was assembled, in which Agathocles, and Agathoclea his sister, were present. Agathocles, after shedding abundance of tears, begins, by imploring their protection for the young king, whom he held in his arms. He tells them, that his royal father, in his expiring moments, had committed him to the care of Agathoclea, whom he pointed out to them; and had recommended him to the fidelity of the Macedonians: that for this reason he was come to implore their assistance against Tlepolemus, who, as he was well informed, had meditated a design of usurping the crown. He added, that he had brought witnesses expressly to prove his treason, and at the same time offered to produce them. He imagined that by this weak artifice Tlepolemus would be immediately despatched, and that in consequence he might easily obtain the regency; but the artifice was too gross, and the people immediately swore the destruction of Agathocles, his sister, and all their creatures. This last attempt recalling to their remembrance their other crimes, all the inhabitants of Alexandria rose against them. The young king was taken out of their hands, and seated on the throne in the Hippodrome. After which Agathocles, his sister, and Enanthe his mother, were brought before the king, and all three put to death, as by his order. The populace exposed their dead bodies to all the indignities possible; dragging them through the streets, and tearing them to pieces. All their relations and creatures met with the same treatment, and not one of them was spared; the usual and just end of those unworthy favourites, who abuse the confidence of their sovereign to oppress the people; but which does not effect the reformation of those who resemble them.

Philammon, the assassin, who had been hired to murder Arsinoe, being returned from Cyrene to Alexandria two or three days before this tumult broke out, the ladies of honour of that unfortunate queen had immediate notice of it, and taking this opportunity, which the distractions of the city gave them, they resolved to revenge their mistress's death. Accordingly they broke open the door of the house where he was, and killed him with clubs and stones.

The care of the king's person, till otherwise provided for, was given to Sosibius, son to him who had governed during the last three reigns. History does not inform us whether the father was still alive; but it is certain that he lived to a great age, as he had passed above threescore years in the administration. No minister was ever more cunning or more corrupt than this Sosibius.³ He made no scruple of committing the blackest crimes, provided they conducted to his ends. Polybius imputes to him the murder of Lysimachus, son of Ptolemy, and of Arsinoe, daughter of that Lysimachus; of Magas, son of Ptolemy, and of Berenice, daughter of Magas; of Berenice, mother of Ptolemy Philopator; of Cleomenes, king of Sparta; and lastly, of Arsinoe, daughter of Berenice. It is surprising that, notwithstanding the inhumanity and cruelty of his administration he should have supported himself so long in it, and at last come to a peaceable end.

Antiochus king of Syria,¹ and A. M. 3801. Philip king of Macedonia, during Ant. J. C. 203. the reign of Ptolemy Philopator, had discovered the strongest zeal for the interest of that monarch, and were ready to assist him on all occasions. Yet, no sooner was he dead, leaving behind him an infant, whom the laws of humanity and justice enjoined them not to disturb in the possession of his father's kingdom, than they immediately join in a criminal alliance, and excite each other to take off the lawful heir, and divide his dominions between them. Philip was to have Caria, Libya, Cyrenaica, and Egypt; and Antiochus all the rest. With this view, the latter entered Cœle-syria and Palestine; and, in less than two campaigns, made an entire conquest of those two provinces, with all their cities and dependencies. Their guilt, says Polybius, would not have been quite so glaring, had they, like tyrants, endeavoured to gloss over their crimes with some specious pretence; but so far from doing this, their injustice and cruelty were so barefaced, that to them was applied what is generally said of fishes, that the larger ones, though of the same species, prey on the lesser. One would be tempted, continues the same author, at seeing the most sacred laws of society so openly violated, to accuse Providence of being indifferent and insensible to the most horrid crimes; but it fully justified his conduct, by punishing those two kings according to their deserts; and made such an example of them, as ought in all succeeding ages to deter others from following their conduct. For, whilst they are meditating to dispossess a weak and helpless infant of his kingdom, by piecemeal, Providence raised up the Romans against them, who entirely subverted the kingdoms of Philip and Antiochus, and reduced their successors to almost as great calamities as those with which they intended to crush the infant king.

During that time, Philip was engaged in a war against the Rhodians, over whom he gained an inconsiderable advantage, in a naval engagement near the island of Lade, opposite to the city of Miletus.

The next year he attacked Attalus, and advanced as far as Pergamus, the capital of his kingdom.

Ant. J. C. 202. But all his efforts in assaulting that city being to no purpose, he turned his rage and fury against the gods; and not satisfied with burning their temples, he demolished their statues, broke to pieces their altars, and even pulled up the stones from the foundations, that not the least footsteps of them might remain.

He was not more successful against the Rhodians. Having already fought them with but indifferent success, he ventured a second battle off the island of Chios. Attalus had united his fleet to that of the Rhodians, and Philip was defeated with considerable loss. There were killed, in his army, 3000 Macedonians, and 6000 allies; and 2000 Macedonians and confederates, with 700 Egyptians, were taken prisoners. The Rhodians lost but sixty men, and Attalus threescore and ten.

Philip ascribed all the glory of this engagement to himself, and that for two reasons; the first was, that having repulsed Attalus to the shore, he had taken that prince's ship; and the second, that having cast anchor near the promontory of Argœnum, he had taken his station even among the wrecks of his enemies. But though he assumed the best air he could, he was sensible of his great loss, and could neither conceal it from others nor himself. This prince had never lost so great a number of men either by sea or land in one day. He was highly afflicted upon it, and was forced to abate much of his former vivacity.

Nevertheless, the ill success of this battle did not make Philip despond. The character of that prince was to be unshaken in his resolutions, and not to be dejected by disappointments but to overcome difficulties by inflexible constancy and perseverance; and accordingly he continued the war with fresh bravery. I am not certain whether we may not date, about this time, the cruelties which Philip exercised over the Cians; a barbarity with which he is often reproached, the particulars of which have unhappily been lost. Cios, whose inhabitants are called Ciansians, was a small city in Bithynia. The governor of it had been raised to that post by the Ætolians, who at that time were in alliance with Philip. We find that he besieged it at the request of his son-in-law Prusias, king of Bithynia, who pretended to have received some insult from it. The city was in all probability taken by storm. A great number of the inhabitants suffered the most cruel tortments; the rest were reduced to a state of captivity, which to them was worse than death; and the city was razed to the very foundations. This barbarity alienated the Ætolians from him, and particularly the Rhodians, who were allies and friends to the inhabitants of Cios. Polybius seems to ascribe its destruction to the imprudence of the Ciansians themselves, who used to bestow all posts and preferments on their most worthless citizens, and to follow so blindly their pernicious opinions in every thing, as even to persecute those who ventured to oppose them. He adds, that a people, who act in this manner, plunge voluntarily into the greatest calamities; and that it is surprising they do not correct themselves in this respect by the experience of all ages; which shows, that the ruin of the most powerful states is solely owing to the ill choice they make of those to whom they confide either the command of their armies, or the administration of their political affairs.

Philip marched afterwards to Thrace and the Chersonesus, where several cities surrendered voluntarily. However, Abydos shut her gates against him, and even refused to hear the deputies he had sent, so that he was forced to besiege it. This city is in Asia, and stands on the narrowest part of the Hellespont, now called the Dardanelles, and opposite to the city of Sestos in Europe. The distance between these two cities was about two miles. The reader will suppose that Abydos must be a city of great importance, as it commanded the straits, and made those who were possessed of it masters of the communication between the Euxine sea and the Archipelago.

Nothing of what is generally practised, in the assaulting and defending of cities, was omitted in this siege. No place was ever defended with greater obstinacy, which might be said at length, on the side of the besieged, to have risen to fury and brutality. Confiding in their own strength, they repulsed with the greatest vigour the first approaches of the Macedonians. On the side next the sea, the machines of war no sooner came forward, than they immediately were either dismounted by the balista, or consumed by fire. Even the ships, on which they were mounted, were in danger; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the besiegers saved them. On the land side, the Abydenians also defended themselves for some time with great courage, and did not despair even of defeating the enemy. But finding that the outward wall was sapped, and that the Macedonians were carrying their mines under the inward one, which had been raised to supply the place of the other, they sent deputies to Philip, offering to surrender their city upon the following conditions: that such forces, as had been sent them by the Rhodians and king Attalus, should return to their respective sovereigns under his safe conduct; and that all free citizens should retire whithersoever they pleased, with the clothes they then had on. Philip answering, that the Abydenians had only to choose, whether they would surrender at discretion, or continue to defend themselves valiantly, the deputies retired.

This report being made, the besieged, in transports of despair, assemble together, and consider what was to be done. They came to this resolution: first, that the slaves should be made free, to animate them to defend the city with the utmost vigour; secondly, that all the women should be shut up in the temple of Oanea and the children, with their nurses, in the city, and that they then should bring into the great square all the gold and silver in the city, and carry all the rest of the valuable effects into the Quadrirreme of the Rhodians, and the Trireme of the Cyziceniens. This resolution having passed unanimously, another assembly was called, in which they chose fifty of the wisest and most ancient of the citizens, but who at the same time had vigour enough left to execute what might be determined; and they were made to take an oath in presence of all the inhabitants, that the instant they saw the enemy master of the inward wall, they would kill the women and children, set fire to the two galleys laden with their effects, and throw into the sea all their gold and silver which they had heaped together: then sending for their priests, they took an oath either to conquer or die, sword in hand; and after having sacrificed the victims, they obliged the priests and priestesses to pronounce, before the altar, the greatest curses on those who should break their oath.

This being done, they left off countermining, and resolved, the instant the wall should fall, to fly to the breach, and fight to the last. Accordingly, the inward wall tumbling, the besieged, true to the oath they had taken, fought in the breach with such unparalleled bravery, that though Philip had perpetually sustained with fresh soldiers those who had mounted to the assault, yet when night separated the combatants, he was still doubtful with regard to the success of the siege. Such Abydenians as marched first to the breach, over the heap of the slain, fought with fury; and not only made use of their swords and javelins, but, after their arms were broken to pieces, or forced out of their hands, they rushed headlong upon the Macedonians, knocked down some, and broke the sarissæ or long spears of others, and with the pieces struck their faces, and such parts of their bodies as were uncovered, till they made them entirely despair of the event.

When night had put an end to the slaughter, the breach was quite covered with the dead bodies of the Abydenians; and those who had escaped were so overwhelmed with fatigue, and had received so many wounds, that they could scarce support themselves. Things being brought to this dreadful extremity, two of the principal citizens, unable to bring themselves to execute the dreadful resolution that had been taken, and which at that time displayed itself to their imaginations in all its horror, agreed, that to save their wives and children, they should send to Philip, by day-break, all their priests and priestesses, clothed in their pontifical habits, to implore his mercy, and open the gates to him.

Accordingly, next morning, the city, as had been agreed, was surrendered to Philip: while the greatest part of the Abydenians who survived vented millions of imprecations against their fellow-citizens, and especially against the priests and priestesses, for delivering up to the enemy those whom they themselves had devoted to death with the most dreadful oaths. Philip marched into the city, and seized, without the least opposition, all the rich effects which the Abydenians had heaped together in one place. But now he was greatly terrified with the spectacle he saw. Among these ill-fated citizens, whom despair had made furious and distracted, some were smothering their wives and children, and others stabbing them with their own hands; some were running to strangle them, others were plunging them into wells, whilst others again were precipitating them from the tops of houses; in a word, death appeared in all its variety of horrors. Philip, pierced with grief, and seized with horror at this spectacle, stopped the soldiers, who were eager for plunder, and published a declaration, importing, that he would allow three days to all who were resolved to lay violent hands on themselves. He was in hopes, that during this interval, they would change their determination; but their resolution was fixed. They thought it would be degenerating from those who had lost their lives in fighting for their country should they survive them. The individuals of every family killed one another, and none escaped this murderous expedition, but those whose hands were tied, or were otherwise kept from destroying themselves.

A little before the city surrendered, an ambassador from the Romans to Philip arrived. This embassy was sent on various accounts, all which it will be proper to explain. The fame and glory of this people had just before been spread through all parts of the world, by the victory which Scipio gained over Hannibal in Africa; an event that so gloriously (with regard to the Romans) terminated the second Punic war. The court of Egypt, being in so much danger from the union that had been formed between Philip and Antiochus against their infant king, had had recourse to the Romans for protection, and offered them the guardianship of the king, and the regency of his dominions during his minority; declaring, that the late monarch at his death had recommended them thus to act. It was the interest of the Romans not to suffer the power of Philip and Antiochus to increase by the addition of so many rich provinces, of which the empire of Egypt at that time consisted. It was not difficult to foresee, that they would soon be engaged in war with those two princes, with one of whom they already had had some differences, which threatened much greater. For these reasons they had not hesitated in accepting the guardianship; and in consequence had appointed three deputies, who were ordered to acquaint the two kings with their resolution, and to enjoin them not to infest the dominions of their royal pupil, for that otherwise they should be forced to declare war against them. Every reader will perceive, that the declaring so generously in favour of an oppressed infant monarch, was making a just and noble use of their power.

At the same time there arrived in Rome ambassadors from the Rhodians and from king Attalus, to complain also of the enterprises of the two kings; and to inform the Romans, that Philip, either in person or by his deputies, was soliciting several cities of Asia to take up arms, and was certainly meditating some great design. This was a fresh motive for hastening the departure of the three ambassadors.

Being arrived at Rhodes, and hearing of the siege of Abydos, they sent to Philip the youngest of their colleagues, named Æmilius, who, as has been observed, arrived at Abydos, at the very time that the city was upon the point of being surrendered. Æmilius acquainted Philip, that he was ordered, in the name of the senate, to exhort him not to make war upon any of the states of Greece, nor to invade any part of Ptolemy's dominions; but to refer to a just arbitration the claims which he had upon Attalus and the Rhodians. That, provided he acquiesced with these remonstrances, he would continue in peace; but that if he refused, the Romans would proclaim war against him. Philip endeavoured to show, that the Rhodians had occasioned the rupture. "But," says Æmilius, interrupting him, "did the Athenians and Abydenians attack you first?" Philip, who had not been used to hear truth, was offended at the boldness of such an answer addressed to a king: "Your age," says he to the ambassador, "your beauty, (for Polybius informs us that this ambassador had really a fine person,) and especially the Roman name exalt your pride to a prodigious degree. For my part, I wish your republic may observe punctually the treaties it has concluded with me; but, in case I should be invaded by it, I hope to show, that the empire of Macedonia does not yield to Rome either in valour or reputation." The deputy withdrew from Abydos with this answer, and Philip having taken that city, left a strong garrison in it, and returned to Macedonia.

Æmilius seems to have gone into Egypt, whilst the two other ambassadors went very probably to Antiochus. Æmilius, being arrived at Alexandria, assumed the guardianship of Ptolemy, in the name of the Romans, pursuant to the instructions he had received from the senate at his setting out; and settled every thing to as much advantage as the state of affairs in Egypt would then admit. He appointed Aristomenes, the Acarnanian, to superintend the education and person of the young monarch, and made him prime minister. This Aristomenes had grown old in the court of Egypt, and acted with the utmost prudence and fidelity in the employment conferred upon him.

In the mean time the forces of Philip¹ laid Attica waste, the pretence of which invasion was as follows: Two young men of Acarnania being in Athens, at the time when the great mysteries were solemnizing there, had entered with the crowd into the temple of Ceres, not knowing that it was forbidden. Though their fault proceeded entirely from ignorance, they were immediately massacred, as guilty of impiety and sacrilege. The Acarnanians, justly exasperated at so cruel a treatment, had recourse to Philip, who gladly embraced this opportunity, and gave them a body of forces, with which they entered Attica, ravaged the whole country, and returned home laden with spoils.

The Athenians² carried their complaints against this enterprise to Rome, and were joined on that occasion by the ambassadors of the Rhodians and king Attalus. The Romans only sought for an opportunity to break with king Philip, at whom they were very much offended. He had infringed the conditions of the treaty of peace, concluded with him three years before, in not ceasing to infest the allies who were included in it. He had just before sent troops and money to Hannibal in Africa; and a report was spread, that he was at that time very busy in Asia.

This made the Romans uneasy, who called to mind the trouble which Pyrrhus had brought upon them, with only a handful of Epirots, a people very much inferior to the Macedonians. Thus, having ended the war against Carthage, they imagined it advisable to prevent the enterprises of this new enemy, who might become formidable, in case they should give him time to increase his strength. The senate, after making such an answer that pleased all the ambassadors, ordered M. Valerius Levinus, the prætor, to advance towards Macedonia with a fleet, in order to examine matters nearer at hand, and be in a condition to give immediate aid to the allies.

In the mean time the Roman senate³ deliberated seriously on what was to be done in the present juncture. At the very time it assembled to consider that important affair, a second embassy arrived from the Athenians, which brought advice that Philip was upon the point of invading Attica in person; and that in case they were not immediately succoured he would infallibly make himself master of Athens. They also received letters from Levinus the prætor, and from Aurelius his lieutenant, by which they were informed, that they had the strongest reasons to believe that Philip had some design against them; and that the danger being imminent, they had no time to lose.

Upon this news,⁴ the Romans resolved. A. M. 3804. solved to proclaim war against Philip. Ant. J. C. 200. Accordingly, P. Sulpitius the consul, to whom Macedonia had fallen by lot, put to sea with an army, and soon arrived there. Here he was soon informed that Athens was besieged, and implored his assistance. He detached a squadron of twenty galleys, commanded by Claudius Cento, who set sail that instant. Philip had not laid siege to Athens in person, but deputed one of his lieutenants for that purpose; having himself taken the field against Attalus and the Rhodians.

SECTION II.—EXPEDITIONS OF THE CONSUL Sulpitius in Macedonia. THE ÆTOLIANS WAIT FOR THE EVENT, IN ORDER TO DECLARE THEMSELVES PHILIP LOSES A BATTLE. VILLIUS SUCCEEDS Sulpitius. NO CONSIDERABLE TRANSACTION HAPPENS DURING HIS GOVERNMENT. FLAMINIVS SUCCEEDS HIM. ANTIOCHUS RECOVERS COLE-SYRIA, OF WHICH HE HAD BEEN DISPOSSESSED BY ARISTOMENES, THE PRIME MINISTER OF EGYPT VARIOUS EXPEDITIONS OF THE CONSUL INTO PHOCIS. THE ACHÆANS, AFTER LONG DEBATES, DECLARE FOR THE ROMANS.

CLAUDIUS CENTO,⁵ whom the consul had sent to succour Athens, A. M. 3804 having entered the Piræus with Ant. J. C. 200 his galleys, revived the drooping courage of the inhabitants. He was not satisfied with placing the city and the country round it in a state of security; but as he had been informed that the garrison of Chalcis did not observe the least order or discipline, as considering themselves remote from danger, he sailed out with his fleet, arrived near the city before day, and finding the sentinels asleep, entered it without molestation; set fire to the public magazines, which were full of corn and to the arsenal, that was well provided with machines of war; cut the whole garrison to pieces; and after carrying on board his ships the immense booty he had amassed, he returned to the Piræus.

Philip, who was then at Demetrias, the instant he heard of the disaster which had befallen that confederate city, flew thither, in hopes of surprising the Romans. However, they were gone; so that he seemed to have come for no other purpose, but to view the mournful spectacle presented by that city, still burning and half ruined. He would certainly have treated Athens in the same manner, if one of the couriers, called Hænerodromi,⁶ who perceived the king's troops from the eminence where he was posted, had not carried the news of it immediately to Athens, where the inhabitants were all asleep. Philip arrived a few hours after, but before day-break. Perceiving that his stratagem had not taken effect, he resolved to attack the city. The Athenians had drawn up their soldiers in order of battle without the walls, at the gate Dipylus; Philip, marching at the head of his army, attacked them with vigour, and having killed several of them with his own hand, repulsed them back into the city, whither he did not think it advisable to pursue them. But he wreaked his vengeance on the country seats, on the places for the public exercises, as the Lyceum, and especially on such temples as stood without the city; setting fire to every thing, and ruining whatever came in his way, not sparing either the tombs or the most sacred places.

He marched from hence with a view of surprising Eleusis, where his project also proved abortive. He then proceeded towards Corinth, when hearing that the Achæans held their assembly at Argos, he went thither.

They were deliberating how to act in regard to Nabis, the tyrant of Sparta, who had succeeded Machanidas, and infested the whole country with his incursions. Philip offered to undertake alone the management of that war, and his proposal was received with universal joy. However, he added a condition which abated it very much: that they should furnish him with as many troops as were necessary for garrisoning Oreum, Chalcis, and Corinth; that he might not leave the places behind without defence, whilst he was fighting for them. They perceived that his design was to draw out of Peloponnesus all the Achæan youth, in order to make himself master of it, and engage it in the war against the Romans. Cycladias, who presided in the assembly, eluded the proposal, by observing, that it was not allowed by their laws, to debate on any subject but that for which the assembly had been summoned. They therefore broke er after having resolved upon the war against Nabis; and the hopes of Philip were again defeated.

He made a second attempt upon Athens, which succeeded no better than the former, except that he completed the demolition of such temples, statues, and valuable works, as remained in that country. After this expedition, he retired into Boeotia.

The consul, who was encamped between Apollonia and Dyrrachium, sent to Macedonia a considerable detachment, under the command of Apustius, his lieutenant, who laid waste the open country, and took several small cities. Philip, who was returned into Macedonia, carried on his military preparations with prodigious vigour.

The great object which both parties had in view, was to engage the Ætolians on their side. They were now going to hold their general assembly, to which Philip, the Romans, and Athenians, sent their ambassadors; he who was deputed by Philip spoke first. All he required was, that the Ætolians should observe strictly the conditions of the peace which they had concluded three years before with Philip; having then experienced how useless their alliance with the Romans was to them. He instanced several cities, of which that people had possessed themselves, upon pretence of succouring them, as Syracuse, Tarentum, Capua; the last city especially, which was no longer Capua, but the grave of the Campanians, and the skeleton, as it were, of a city, having neither senate, inhabitants, or magistrates; having been more barbarously used by those who had left it to be inhabited in this condition, than if they had entirely destroyed it. "If foreigners," says he, "who differ from us more by their language, their manners, and their laws, than by the wide distance of land and sea which separate us from them, should dispossess us of this country, it would be ridiculous in us to expect more humane treatment from them than their neighbours have met with. Among us, who are of the same country, whether Ætolians, Acarnanians, or Macedonians, and who speak the same language, slight disputes may arise of little or no consequence or duration; but with foreigners, with barbarians, we, as Greeks, are, and shall for ever be, at war. In this same assembly three years since you concluded a peace with Philip; the same causes still subsist; and we hope that you will act in the same manner."

The Athenian ambassadors, by the consent of the Romans, spoke next. They began by displaying, in an affecting manner, the impious and sacrilegious fury which Philip had exercised on the most sacred monuments of Attica, on the most august temples, and the most venerated tombs; as if he had declared war, not only against men, and the living, but against the manes of the dead and the majesty of the gods. That Ætolia and all Greece must expect the same treatment, if Philip should have the like occasion. They concluded with conjuring the Ætolians to take compassion on Athens, and to undertake, under the auspices of the gods, and of the Romans, whose power that of the gods alone could equal, so just a war as that proposed to them.

The Roman ambassador, after having refuted very circumstantially the reproaches of the Macedonian, with respect to the treatment which Rome had made the conquered cities suffer; and adduced as an example to the contrary, the instance of Carthage, which out just before had been allowed a peace, and was restored to its liberty; declared, that the only circumstance the Romans had to fear was, that the too great mildness and lenity which they exercised towards those they conquered, would prompt other nations to take up arms against them, because the vanquished might depend on the Roman clemency. He represented in a short, but strong and pathetic speech, the criminal actions of Philip, the murders committed by him on his own family and his friends; his infamous debaucheries, which were still more detested than his cruelty; all facts more immediately known to the persons whom he then addressed, as they were nearer neighbours to Macedonia. "But to confine my speech to what relates directly to you," says the ambassador, addressing himself to the Ætolians, "we engaged in the war against Philip, with no other view than to defend you; and you have concluded a separate peace with him. Possibly you may observe in your own justification, that seeing us employed in the war against the Carthaginians, and being awed by fear, you were obliged to submit to whatever conditions the victor was pleased to prescribe; whilst we, on the other side, employed in affairs of greater importance, neglected a war which you had renounced. However, having now put an end (thanks to the gods) to the Carthaginian war, we are going to turn the whole force of our arms against Macedonia. This gives you an opportunity of returning to our friendship and alliance, unless you should choose to perish ingloriously with Philip, rather than conquer with the Romans.

Damocritus, the Ætolian prætor, plainly perceived that this speech would gain all the voices. It is said, that he had been bribed by Philip. Without seeming inclined to either side, he represented the affair as too important to be determined immediately, and required time for a more mature deliberation. By this artifice he eluded the effect which the assembly would otherwise have had; and boasted his having done a very essential service to the republic, which now, he said, might wait the event before it took up arms, and then declare for the strongest army.

In the mean time, Philip was preparing for a vigorous war both by sea and land; but the consul had already begun it. He had entered Macedonia, and advanced towards the Dassaretæ. Philip also took the field. Neither party knew which way the enemy had marched; but each sent out a detachment upon the discovery, and the two parties met. As both consisted entirely of chosen troops, a bloody skirmish ensued, and the victory was doubtful. Forty Macedonian troopers, and thirty-five of the Romans, were killed on the spot.

The king, persuaded that the care he should take to bury those who had lost their lives in this skirmish, would contribute very much to gain him the affection of his soldiers, and excite them to behave gallantly in his service, caused their dead bodies to be brought into the camp, in order that the whole army might be eyewitnesses of the honours paid to their memory.

Nothing is less to be relied upon than the sentiments and dispositions of the vulgar. The spectacle, which Philip imagined would animate the soldiers, had quite a contrary effect, and damped their courage. Hitherto he had engaged in a war with none but Greeks and Illyrians, who employed scarce any other weapons than arrows, javelins, and lances; and for that reason the wounds they made were not so deep. But when they saw the bodies of their comrades covered with deep and wide gashes, made by the Spanish sabres, whole arms cut off, shoulders lopped away, and heads separated from the bodies, they were terrified at the sight, and plainly perceived against what kind of enemy they were to act.

The king himself, who had never yet seen the Romans engaged in a regular battle, was terrified at the sight. Being informed by some deserters of the place where the enemy had halted, he took guides and marched thither with his army, consisting of 20,000 foot and 4000 horse; and posted himself at a little above 200 paces from their camp, near the city of Athacus, on an eminence which he fortified with good ditches and strong intrenchments. Surveying from the top of the hill the order and disposition of the Roman camp, he cried out, That what he saw was not the camp of barbarians.⁴

The consul and the king were quiet for the first two days, each waiting till the other should make some movement. On the third day, Sulpitius came out of his camp, and drew up his troops in order of battle. Philip, being afraid of coming to a general battle, detached against the enemy a body consisting of about 1500 men, the one half horse and the other foot; against whom the Romans opposed an equal number, who had the advantage and put the other to flight. They avoided, with no less prudence, an ambuscade, which the king had laid for them. These two advantages, the one gained by open force and the other by stratagem, inflamed the courage of the Roman soldiers. The consul marched them back into the camp, and after allowing them a day's repose, he led them out and offered the king battle, which he did not think proper to accept, and lay close in his camp, in spite of all the insults and reproaches of Sulpitius, who charged him with meanness of spirit and cowardice.

As foraging, where two armies lay so near one another, would be very dangerous, the consul drew off to about eight miles' distance, and advanced towards a village, called Octolophos, where the foragers dispersed themselves all over the neighbouring country in separate platoons. The king at first lay close in his intrenchments, as if afraid of venturing out: in order that the enemy, growing bolder on that account, might for that reason be less vigilant. This happened directly as Philip had foreseen. When he saw great numbers of them spread over the plains, he quitted his camp on a sudden with all his horse, whom the Cretans followed as fast as it was possible for infantry to march, and rode full speed to post himself between the Roman camp and the foragers.

There, dividing his forces, he detached part of them against the foragers; ordering them to cut to pieces all who should come in their way, whilst he himself seized all the passes by which they could return. And now nothing was seen on all sides but blood and slaughter; during which the Romans did not know what was doing out of their camp, because such as fled were intercepted by the king's forces; and those who guarded the passes killed a much greater number than the others detached in pursuit of the enemy.

At last the melancholy news of the slaughter arrived in the Roman camp; upon which the consul ordered the cavalry to march out and succour their comrades wherever they could; as for himself, he made the legions quit the camp, and marched them in a hollow square against the enemy. The troopers, being dispersed up and down, lost their way at first, being deceived by the shouts and cries which echoed from different places. Many of these parties fell in with the enemy, and skirmishes were fought in different places at the same time. The warmest engagement was where the king himself commanded, and which, by the great number of the horse and foot that composed it, formed almost an army: not to mention that these troops, being prodigiously animated by the presence of the king, and the Cretans, fighting in a compact body, and with the utmost vigour, against enemies dispersed and in disorder, killed great numbers of them. It is certain that, had they not pursued the Romans so vigorously, this day might have decided, not only the present battle, but perhaps the success of the whole war. But, by abandoning themselves to a rash and inconsiderate ardour, they fell into the midst of the Roman cohorts, who had advanced with their officers. And now the soldiers who fled perceiving the Roman ensigns, faced about, and pushed their horses against the enemy, who were all in disorder. In an instant the face of the battle was quite changed; those who pursued before, now flying in their turn, many were killed in close fight, and many lost their lives in flying; and numbers fell, not by the sword alone, as several plunging into morasses were swallowed up, with their horses, in the mire. The king himself was in very great danger; for having been thrown by his horse, which had received a severe wound, multitudes were going to attack him, had not a trooper leaped that moment from his horse, and mounted him on it; but the man himself, being unable to keep pace with the troopers who fled, was killed by the enemy. Philip, after having taken a long compass round the fens, came at last to the camp, where he had been given over for lost.

We have already seen on many occasions, and it cannot be too strongly inculcated on those of the military profession, in order to their avoiding the like error, that battles are often lost by the too great ardour of the officers, who, solely intent upon pursuing the enemy, forget and neglect what passes in the rest of the army, and suffer themselves to be deprived, through an imprudent desire of glory, of a victory which they had in their hands, and which they might have secured.

Philip had not lost a great number of men in this action, but he dreaded coming to a second; and was afraid lest the conqueror should advance to attack him suddenly. He therefore despatched a herald to the consul, to desire a suspension of arms in order to bury the dead. The consul, who was at dinner, sent word that he should have an answer on the morrow. Upon this, Philip, to conceal his march from the Romans having left a great number of fires in his camp, set out, without noise, the instant it was dark; and having got a whole night's march before the consul, and part of the following day, he thereby put it out of his power to pursue him.

Sulpitius began his march the next day, not knowing which way the king had taken. Philip had flattered himself with the hopes of intercepting him at some passes, the entrance of which he fortified with ditches, intrenchments, and great works of stones and trees; but the patience of the Romans was superior to all these difficulties. The consul, after laying waste the country, and seizing upon several fortresses of importance, marched his army back to Apollonia, from whence he had set out in the beginning of the campaign.

The Ætolians, who only waited the event in order to choose their side, no longer hesitated to declare for the Romans, and the Athamanians followed their example. Both nations made some incursions into Macedonia, but with ill success, Philip having defeated them on several occasions. He also defeated the Dardanians, who had entered his country during his absence; and with these small advantages consoled himself for his ill success against the Romans.

In this campaign the Roman fleet joined that of Attalus, and came into the Piræus, to the great joy of the Athenians. The hatred they bore to Philip, which fear had forced them to dissemble for a long time, now broke out immoderately, at the sight of so powerful a succour. In a free city like that of Athens, where eloquence was all powerful, the orators had gained so great an ascendancy over the minds of the people, that they made them form whatever resolutions they pleased. Here the people, at their request, ordained that all the statues and images of Philip and his ancestors should be destroyed; that the festivals, sacrifices, and priests, established in honour of them, should be abolished: that every place where any monument had been set up, or inscription engraved relating to them, should be declared impure and profane: that the priests, every time they offered up prayers to the gods for the Athenians, their allies, their armies, and fleets, should also denounce imprecations and curses of every kind against Philip, his children, and kingdom, his forces both by sea and land; in a word, against the Macedonians in general, and all that belonged to them. To this decree was added, that whatever might be afterwards proposed, which tended in any manner to dishonour and bring an odium on Philip, would be grateful to the people, and that whosoever should dare to say or do any thing in favour of Philip, or against the decrees in question, might be killed on the spot, without any formality. The last clause was, that whatever had been enacted against the Pisistratide, should likewise be enacted against Philip. In this manner the Athenians made war against Philip by their decrees and ordinances, 4 which at that time were their only strength. Carrying all things to extremes, they now lavished encomiums, honours, and homage of every kind on Attalus and the Romans.

The fleet, at its leaving Piræus, attacked and took several fortresses and small islands; after which Attalus and the Romans separated and went into winter quarters.

In Rome, the year following,¹ A. M. 3805. new consuls being chosen, Villius Ant. J. C. 199. had Macedonia for his province.

Philip, whilst he made preparations for carrying on the ensuing campaign, was exceedingly anxious with regard to the success of the war he had undertaken. Besides his having to deal with powerful and formidable enemies, he was afraid that the hope of protection from the Romans would draw off many of his allies from him; and that the Macedonians, uneasy at, and dissatisfied with, his government, would rebel against him.

To obviate these dangers, he gave up some cities to the Achæans, thinking to attach them more strongly to his interest by this unexpected generosity; and at the same time he sent ambassadors into Achaia, to make the allies take the oath which was to be renewed every year. But could he possibly look upon this ceremony as a strong tie, and one capable of keeping the confederates in their duty; when he himself professed an open violation of all oaths, and did not make the least scruple to forfeit his promise, nor show the least veneration for the Supreme Being, religion, and all that mankind consider as most sacred?

As to the Macedonians,² he endeavoured to recover their love and affection, by sacrificing Heraclides, one of his ministers and confidants, whom the people hated and detested on account of his rapine and grievous oppressions; all which had made the government odious to them. He was of very mean extraction, and born in Tarentum, where he had exercised the meanest and most contemptible offices, and had been banished from thence, for attempting to deliver up the city to the Romans. He had fled to Philip, who, finding him a man of sense, of a lively genius, a daring spirit, and at the same time so insatiably ambitious as not to scruple at the commission of the blackest crimes, had attached him to himself in a particular manner, and trusted him with all his secrets; a fit instrument for a prince, who had neither probity nor honour. Heraclides, says Polybius, was born with all those qualities which constitute the consummate villain. From his most tender years he had prostituted himself in the most infamous manner. Haughty and terrible to all his inferiors, he behaved with the meanest and most grovelling adulation towards his superiors. He was in such great credit and authority with Philip, that, according to the same author, he almost ruined a powerful kingdom, by the universal discontent which his injustice and oppression occasioned. At last the king caused him to be seized and thrown into prison, which occasioned a universal joy amongst the people. As we have only a few fragments of Polybius on this subject, history does not inform us what became of Heraclides, nor whether he came to the end his crimes deserved.

Nothing considerable was transacted during this campaign any more than the foregoing, because the consuls did not enter Macedonia till very late; and the rest of the time was spent in slight skirmishes, either to force certain passes, or to carry off convoys.³

T. Quintus Flamininus⁴ having A. M. 3806. been nominated consul, and Macedonia falling to him by lot, he did not follow the example of his predecessors but set out from Rome at the opening of the spring, with Lucius his brother, who, by leave of the senate, was to command the fleet.

At the beginning of this year, Antiochus attacked Attalus very vigorously both by sea and land. The ambassadors of the latter king came to Rome, and informed the senate of the great danger to which their sovereign was exposed. They entreated the Romans in Attalus's name, either to undertake his defence with the forces of the republic, or to permit king Attalus to recall his troops. The senate made answer, that as nothing could be more just and reasonable than Attalus's demand, he therefore was at full liberty to recall his forces; that the Romans never intended to incommode their allies in any manner; but that they would employ all their influence with Antiochus, to dissuade him from molesting Attalus. Accordingly, the Romans sent ambassadors to the former, who remonstrated to him, that Attalus had lent them his troops as well as ships, which they now employed against Philip their common enemy: that they should think it an obligation, if he would not invade that prince; that it was fitting that such kings as were confederates and friends to the Romans should be at peace with each other. These remonstrances being made to Antiochus, he immediately drew off his forces from the territories of king Attalus.

The instant he had, at the request of the Romans, laid aside his designs against that prince, he marched in person into Cele-syria, to recover those cities of which Aristomedes had dispossessed him. The Romans had intrusted this general with the administration of Egypt. The first thing he had endeavoured was, to defend himself against the invasion of the two confederate kings, and for this purpose he raised the best troops he could. He sent Scopas into Ætolia with large sums of money,⁵ to levy as many troops as possible; the Ætolians being at that time looked upon as the best soldiers. This Scopas had formerly enjoyed the highest posts in his own country,⁶ and was thought to be one of the bravest and most experienced generals of his time. When the time of continuing in his employment expired, he had flattered himself with the hopes of being continued in it, but was disappointed. This gave him disgust, so that he left Ætolia, and engaged in the service of the king of Egypt. Scopas had such good success in his levies, that he brought 6000 soldiers from Ætolia; a good reinforcement for the Egyptian army.

The administration of Alexandria,⁷ seeing Antiochus employed in Asia Minor in the war which had broken out between him and Attalus king of Pergamus, sent Scopas into Palestine and Cele-syria, to endeavour to recover these provinces. He carried on the war there so successfully, that he recovered several cities, retook Judea, threw a garrison into the citadel of Jerusalem, and, upon the approach of winter, returned to Alexandria; whither he brought (besides the glory of his victories) exceeding rich spoils taken in the conquered countries. We find, by the sequel, that the great success of this campaign was owing principally to Antiochus's being absent, and to the little resistance which had therefore been made.

He no sooner arrived there in person,⁸ than the face of things changed immediately, and victory declared in his favour. Scopas, who was returned with an army, was defeated at Paneas, near the source of the river Jordan, in a battle wherein a great slaughter was made of his troops. He was forced to fly to Sidon, where he shut himself up with the 10,000 men he had left. Antiochus besieged him in it, and reduced him to such extremities, that being in absolute want of provisions, he was forced to surrender the city, and content himself with having his life spared. However, the government of Alexandria had employed its utmost efforts to relieve him in Sidon, and three of the best generals at the head of the choicest troops of the state had been sent to raise the siege. But Antiochus made such judicious arrangements, that all their efforts were defeated, and Scopas was obliged to accept of the ignominious conditions above mentioned; after which he returned to Alexandria, naked and disarmed.

met with so strong a resistance as exasperated him; and accordingly, having taken the city, he abandoned the plunder of it to his soldiers. This being done, he secured the passes through which the troops were to come that might be sent from Egypt; and returning back, subjected all Palestine and Coele-syria.

The instant that the Jews,¹ who at that time had reason to be displeased with the Egyptians, knew that Antiochus was advancing towards their country, they came very zealously to meet him, and delivered up the keys of all their cities; and when he came to Jerusalem, the priests and elders came out in pomp to meet him, paid him all kinds of honour, and assisted him in driving out of the castle the soldiers which Scopas had left in it. In return for these services, Antiochus granted them a great many privileges; and enacted, by a particular decree, that no stranger should be allowed access to the inner part of the temple; a prohibition which seemed visibly to have been made on account of Philopator's attempt, who would have forced his way thither.

Antiochus,² in his eastern expeditions, had received so many services from the Jews of Babylonia and Mesopotamia, and depended so much on their fidelity, that when a sedition broke out in Phrygia and Lydia, he sent 2000 Jewish families to quell it and keep the country in peace, and granted them a variety of extraordinary favours. From these Jews, transplanted at this time, descended many of those who were dispersed or scattered abroad,³ whom we shall afterwards find so numerous, especially in the gospel times.

Antiochus, having thus subjected all Coele-syria and Palestine, resolved, if possible, to make the like conquests in Asia Minor. The great object he had in view was, to raise the empire of Syria to its pristine glory, by reuniting to it all that his predecessors had ever possessed, and particularly Seleucus Nicator, its founder. As it would be necessary,⁴ for succeeding in his design, to prevent the Egyptians from molesting him in his new conquests, at a time that he should be at a distance from his kingdom, he sent Eucles the Rhodian to Alexandria, to offer his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to king Ptolemy; but on this condition, that they should not celebrate their nuptials till they should be a little older; and that then, on the very day of their marriage, he would give up those provinces to Egypt as his daughter's dowry. This proposal being accepted, the treaty was concluded and ratified; and the Egyptians relying on his promises, suffered him to carry on his conquests without molestation.

I now resume the affairs of Macedonia.⁵ I observed that Quintus Ant. J. C. 193. Flamininus (by either of which names I shall call him hereafter) had set out from Rome as soon as he had been appointed consul, and had carried with him Lucius his brother to command the fleet. Being arrived in Epirus, he found Villius encamped in presence of Philip's army, who, for a long time, had kept the passes and defiles along the banks of the Apsus, a river of the country of the Taulantians, between Epirus and Illyria. Having upon himself the command of the forces, the first thing he did was to consider and examine the situation of the country. As this pass seemed impracticable to any army, because there was but one narrow steep path in it, cut in the rock, and that the enemy were masters of the eminences; he therefore was advised to take a large compass, as this would bring him to a wide smooth road. But, besides that he must have employed too much time in this circuitous march, he was afraid to move too far from the sea, from whence he had all his provisions. For this reason, he resolved to go over the mountains, and to force the passes, whatever might be the consequence.

Philip having in vain made proposals of peace, in an interview between him and the consul, in which they could not agree upon terms, was obliged to have recourse again to arms. Accordingly, several slight skirmishes were fought in a pretty large plain; the Macedonians coming down in platoons from their mountains to attack the enemy, and afterwards retreating by steep craggy ways. The Romans, hurried on by the fury of the battle, pursuing them to those places, were greatly annoyed, the Macedonians having planted on all these rocks catapultæ and balistæ overwhelmed them with stones and arrows. Great numbers were wounded on both sides, and night separated the combatants.

Matters being in this state, some shepherds, who fed their sheep in these mountains, came and told Flamininus, that they knew a by-way, which was not guarded; and promised to guide him to the top of the mountains, in three days at farthest. They brought with them, as their guarantee, Charops, a person of the greatest distinction among the Epirots, who secretly favoured the Romans. Flamininus having such a voucher, sends a general with 4000 foot and 300 horse. These shepherds, whom the Romans had chained together for fear of a surprise, led the detachment. During these three days, the consul contented himself with only a few slight skirmishes to amuse the enemy. But on the fourth, at day-break, he caused his whole army to stand to their arms; and having perceived on the mountains a great smoke, which was the signal agreed upon between them, he marches directly against the enemy, perpetually exposed to the darts of the Macedonians, and still fighting hand to hand against those who guarded the passes. The Romans redouble their efforts, and repulse the enemy with great vigour into the most craggy ways; making great shouts, in order that they might be heard by their comrades on the mountain. The latter answered from the heights, with a most dreadful noise; and at the same time fall upon the Macedonians, who, seeing themselves attacked both in front and rear, are struck with a panic, and fly with the utmost speed. However, not above 2000 of them were killed, the paths being so craggy and steep, that it was impossible to pursue them far. The victors plundered their camp, and seized their tents and slaves.

Philip had marched at first towards Thessaly; but being afraid that the enemy would follow and attack him again there, he turned off towards Macedonia and halted at Tempe, that he might be the better able to succour such cities as should be besieged.

The consul marched by Epirus, but did not lay waste the country, although he knew that all the persons of the greatest distinction in it, Charops excepted, had opposed the Romans. However, as they submitted with great cheerfulness, he had a greater regard to their present disposition, than to their past fault; a conduct that won him entirely the hearts of the Epirots, and conciliated their affection. From thence he marched into Thessaly. The Etolians and Athamanians had already taken several cities in that country; and he made himself master of the most considerable of them. Atrax, a city he besieged, detained him a long time, and made so stout a defence that he at last was forced to leave it.

In the meantime, the Roman fleet,⁶ reinforced by those of Attalus and the Rhodians, was also active. They took two of the chief cities of Eubœa, Eretria, and Carystus, garrisoned by Macedonians, after which, the three fleets advanced towards Cenchrea, a port of Corinth.

The consul having marched into Ploceis, most of the cities surrendered voluntarily. Elatia was the only city that shut her gates against him; so that he was obliged to besiege it in form. Whilst he was carrying on this siege, he meditated an important design; and this was, to induce the Achæans to abandon Philip, and join the Romans. The three united fleets were upon the point of laying siege to Corinth; however, before he began it, he thought proper to offer the Achæans to make Corinth enter again into their league and to deliver it up to them, provide they would declare for the Romans. Ambassadors sent in the consul's name by Lucias, his brother, and in the name of Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Athenians, carried this message. The Achæans gave them audience in Sicyon.

The Achæans were very much at a loss in regard to the resolution it was necessary to take. The power of the Lacedæmonians, their perpetual enemies, kept them in awe; and, on the other side, they were in still greater dread of the Romans. They had received, from time immemorial, and very lately, great favours from the Macedonians; but Philip was suspected, on account of his perfidy and cruelty; and they were afraid of being enslaved by him, when the war should be terminated. Such was the disposition of the Achæans. The Roman ambassador spoke first, and afterwards those of Attalus, the Rhodians, and Philip; the Athenians were appointed to speak last, in order that they might refute what Philip's ambassadors should advance. They spoke with greater virulence against the king, because no people had been so cruelly treated by him; and they gave a long detail of his injustice and cruelty in regard to them. These speeches took up the whole day, so that the assembly was put off till the morrow.

All the members being met, the herald, as was the custom, gave notice, in the name of the magistrates, that all those who intended to speak might begin. But no one rose up; and all, gazing upon one another, continued in a deep silence. Upon this Aristæus, chief magistrate of the Achæans, in order that the assembly might not break up without doing business, spoke as follows: "What then is become of that warmth and vigour with which you used to dispute, at your tables, and in your conversations, about Philip and the Romans; which generally rose to so great a height, that you were ready to cut one another's throats? And now, in an assembly summoned for no other purpose, after hearing the speeches and arguments on both sides, you are mute! Surely, if the love of your country cannot loose your tongues, ought not the party zeal which has biased each of you in private, either for or against Philip and the Romans, to oblige you to speak; especially as there is none of you but knows that it will be too late, after the resolution should be once taken?"

These reproaches, though so judicious and reasonable, and made by the principal magistrate, could not prevail with any of the members to give his opinion; nor even occasion the least murmur, the least noise in this assembly, though so very numerous, and composed of the representatives of so many states. Every body continued dumb and motionless.

Aristæus then spoke again to this effect: "Chiefs of the Achæans; I perceive plainly that you want courage more than counsel, since not one among you dares to speak his sentiments, with regard to the common interest, at the risk of danger to himself. Was I a private man, I possibly might act as you do; but being the chief magistrate of the Achæans, it is my opinion, either that the ambassadors should not have been allowed a seat in our assembly, or that they should not be dismissed without some answer. Now, how will it be possible for me to make any, unless you authorize me by a decree? But, since not one among you is willing, or dares to speak his thoughts, let us suppose for a moment, that the speeches of the ambassadors which we heard yesterday, are so many counsels they give, not for their own interest, but purely for ours; and let us weigh them maturely. The Romans, the Rhodians, and Attalus, desire our friendship and alliance; and they request us to assist them in their war against Philip. On the other side, the latter puts us in mind of the treaty which we concluded with him, and sealed and ratified by an oath: one moment he requires us to join with him, and the next he insists upon our observing a strict neutrality. Is no one among you surprised to hear those who are not yet our allies, demand more than he who has long been one? Doubtless, it is not either modesty in Philip, nor temerity in the Romans, which prompts them to act and speak as they do. This difference in their sentiments, arises from the disparity of their strength and situation. My meaning is; we see nothing here belonging to Philip, but his ambassador; whereas the Roman fleet now lies at anchor near Cenchrea, laden with the spoils of Eubœa; and the consul and his legions, who are but at a little distance from the fleet, lay waste Phocis and Locris with impunity. You are surprised that Cleomedon, Philip's ambassador, should have advised you, in so fearful and reserved a manner, to take up arms in favour of the king against the Romans. If, in consequence of the treaty in question, and of the oath on which he lays such stress, we should require Philip to defend us against Nabis, the Lacedæmonians, and the Romans; he would not have any answer to make, much less would he be able to give us any real succour. This we experienced last year, when, notwithstanding the express words of our alliance, and the mighty promises he made us, he suffered Nabis and the Lacedæmonians to ravage our lands without any opposition. In my opinion, Cleomedon seemed evidently to contradict himself in every part of his speech. He spoke with contempt of the war against the Romans, pretending it would have the same success as that which they had already made with Philip. Why then does he implore our succour at a distance, and by an ambassador, instead of coming and defending us in person (we who are his ancient allies) against Nabis and the Romans? Why did he suffer Eretria and Crystus to be taken? Why has he abandoned so many cities of Thessaly, and every part of Phocis and Locris? Why does he suffer Elatia to be besieged at this instant? Was it superior strength; was it fear, or his own will, that made him abandon the defiles of Epirus, and give up to the enemy those insuperable barriers, to go and conceal himself in the most remote part of the kingdom? If he has voluntarily abandoned so many allies to the mercy of the enemy, ought he to keep them from providing for their own safety? If he was actuated by fear, he ought to forgive the same weakness in us. If he has been forced to it, do you, Cleomedon, believe, that it is possible for us, Achæans, to make head against the Roman arms, to which the Macedonians have been obliged to submit? No comparison can be made between the past and the present war. The Romans, at that time employed in affairs of greater importance, gave their allies little or no aid. Now, that they have put an end to the Punic war, which they sustained sixteen years in the very heart of Italy, they do not send succours to the Ætolians, but they themselves, at the head of their armies, invade Philip both by sea and land. Quintus, the third consul whom they have sent against him, having found him in a post which seemed inaccessible, did nevertheless force him from it, plundered his camp, pursued him to Thessaly, and took, almost in his sight, the strongest fortresses belonging to his allies. I will take it for granted, that whatever the Athenian ambassador has advanced concerning the cruelty, the avarice, and the excesses, of Philip, is not true; that the crimes which he committed in Attica do not any way affect us, any more than those he perpetrated in many other places against the gods, celestial and infernal; that we even ought to bury in everlasting oblivion the injuries we ourselves have suffered from him. In a word, let us suppose that we are not treating with Philip, but with Antigonus, a mild and just prince, and from whom we all have received the greatest services; would he make a demand like that which has been insisted on to-day, so evidently adverse to our safety and preservation? In case Nabis and his Lacedæmonians should come and invade us by land, and the Roman fleet by sea, will it be possible for the king to support us against such formidable enemies, or shall we be able to defend ourselves? Past transactions put out of us what we must expect hereafter. The medium which is proposed, of our standing neutral, will infallibly render us a prey to the conqueror, who will not fail to attack us as cunning politicians, who waited for the event, before we would declare ourselves. Believe what I say, when I assure you there is no medium. We must either have the Romans for our friends or for our enemies; and they are come to us with a strong fleet, to offer us their friendship and their aid. To refuse so advantageous an offer, and slight so favourable an occasion, which will never return, would be the highest folly, and show, that we run voluntarily on our own destruction."

This speech was followed by a great noise and murmuring throughout the whole assembly, some applauding it with joy, and others opposing it with violence. The magistrates, called Demiurgi, were no less divided among themselves. Of these, who were ten in number, five declared that each of them would deliberate upon the affair in his assembly, and before his people; the other five protested against it, upon pretence that the laws forbade both the magistrate to propose and the assembly to pass any decree contrary to the alliance concluded with Philip. This day was entirely spent in quarrels and tumultuous cries.

There remained but one day more, as the laws appointed the assembly to end at that time. The debates grew so hot, with regard to what was to be concluded in it, that fathers could scarce forbear striking their sons. Memnon of Pellene was one of the five magistrates who refused to refer the debate. His father, whose name was Rhisiases, entreated and conjured him a long time, to let the Achæans provide for their own safety; and not expose them by his obstinacy, to inevitable ruin. Finding his prayers could not avail, he swore that he would kill him with his own hands, if he did not come into his opinion, considering him not as his son, but the enemy of his country. These terrible menaces made such an impression on Memnon, that he at last suffered himself to yield to paternal authority.

The next day, the majority in the assembly desiring to have the affair debated, and the people discovering plainly enough their own sentiments, the Dymeans, Megalopolitans, and some of the Argives, withdrew from the assembly before the decree passed; and no one took offence at this, because they had particular obligations to Philip, who had even very lately done them considerable services. Gratitude is a virtue common to all ages and nations, and ingratitude is abhorred every where. All the other states, when the votes were to be taken, confirmed immediately, by a decree, the alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians; and suspended the entire conclusion of that with the Romans, till ambassadors should be sent to Rome, to obtain the ratification from the people, without which nothing could be concluded.

In the meantime, three ambassadors were sent to Quintius; and the whole army of the Achæans marched to Corinth, which Lucius, the consul's brother, had already besieged, having before taken Cenchrea. They at first carried on the attack but very faintly, from the hopes that a quarrel would soon arise between the garrison and the inhabitants. However, finding the city was quiet, the machines of war were made to approach on all sides, and various assaults were made, which the besieged sustained with great vigour, and always repulsed the Romans. There was in Corinth a great number of Italian deserters, who, in case the city was taken, expected no quarter from the Romans, and therefore fought in despair. Philoctes, one of Philip's captains, having thrown a fresh reinforcement into the city, and the Romans despairing to force it, Lucius at last acquiesced in the advice of Attalus, and accordingly the siege was raised. The Achæans being sent away, Attalus and the Romans returned on board the fleet. The former sailed to the Piræus, and the latter to Corcyra.

Whilst the fleets besieged Corinth, T. Quintius the consul was employed in the siege of Elatia, where he was more successful; for, after the besieged had made a stout and vigorous resistance, he took the city, and afterwards the citadel.

At the same time such of the inhabitants of Argos as had declared for Philip, found means to deliver up their city to Philoctes, one of his generals. Thus, notwithstanding the alliance which the Achæans had just before concluded with the Romans, Philip still possessed two of their strongest cities, Corinth and Argos.

A PEACE CONCLUDED WITH PHILIP, WHICH PUTS AN END TO THE MACEDONIAN WAR. THE EXTRAORDINARY JOY OF THE GREEKS AT THE ISTHMIAN GAMES, WHEN PROCLAMATION IS MADE THAT THEY ARE RESTORED TO THEIR ANCIENT LIBERTY BY THE ROMANS.

New consuls were appointed at Rome;¹ but as the slow progress which had been made in the affairs of Macedonia was justly ascribed to the frequent changing of those who were charged with them, Flaminius was continued in his command, and recruits were sent him.

The season being already advanced,² Quintius had taken up his winter quarters in Phocis and Locris, when Philip sent a herald to him, to desire an interview. Quintius complied very readily, because he did not yet know what had been resolved upon at Rome with regard to himself; and a conference would give him the liberty either to continue the war, in case he should be continued in the command, or to dispose matters so as to bring about a peace, if a successor were appointed him. The time and place being agreed upon, both parties met. Philip was attended by several Macedonian noblemen, and Cycliadus, one of the chiefs of the Achæans, whom that people had banished a little before. The Roman general was accompanied by Amyntander, king of Athamania, and by deputies from all the allies. After some disputes with regard to the ceremonial, Quintius made his proposals, and every one of the allies their demands. Philip answered them; and as he began to inveigh against the Achæans, Pheneas, their magistrate, interrupted him in these words: "We are not met here merely about words; our business is, either to conquer sword in hand, or to submit to the most powerful."—"A blind man may see that," replied Philip, ridiculing Pheneas, whose sight was bad. Philip was very fond of jests,³ and could not refrain from them, even in treating on the most serious affairs; a behaviour very unbecoming in a prince.

This first interview being spent in altercation, they met again the next day. Philip came very late to the place of meeting, which it is believed he did purposely, in order that the Ætolians and Achæans might not have time sufficient for answering him. He had a private conference with Quintius, who, having acquainted the confederates with his proposals, not one approved them; and they were upon the point of breaking off the conference, when Philip desired that the decision might be suspended till the next day; promising that he himself would comply, in case it were not in his power to bring them into his opinion. At their next meeting, he earnestly entreated Quintius and the allies not to oppose a peace; and he now merely requested time for sending ambassadors to Rome, promising, either to agree to a peace on the conditions which he himself should prescribe, or accept of such as the senate might require. They could not refuse so reasonable a demand; and accordingly a truce was agreed upon, but on condition that his troops should immediately leave Phocis and Locris. After this, the several parties sent ambassadors to Rome.

Being arrived there, those of the allies were heard first. They inveighed heavily against Philip upon several accounts; but they endeavoured particularly to prove, by the situation of the places, that in case he should continue possessed of Demetrias in Thessaly, Chalcis in Euboea, and Corinth in Achaia (cities which he himself justly, though insolently, called the shackles of Greece,) it would be impossible for that country to enjoy its liberty. The king's ambassadors were afterwards called in. As they began a prolix harangue, they were interrupted and asked at once, whether they would give up the three cities in question or not? Having answered, that no orders or instructions had been given them on that head, they were sent back without being gratified in a single demand. It was left to the option of Quintius, either to conclude a peace, or carry on the war. By this he perceived that the Senate would not be dissatisfied at the latter; and he himself was much better pleased to put an end to the war by a victory, than by a treaty of peace. He therefore would not agree to an interview with Philip; and sent to acquaint him, that hereafter he would never agree to any proposals he might offer with regard to peace, if he did not engage by way of preliminary entirely to quit Greece.

Philip now seriously engaged in making the necessary preparations for war.¹ As it would be difficult for him to preserve the cities of Achaia, on account of their great distance from his hereditary dominions, he thought it expedient to deliver up Argos to Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, but only as a trust, which he was to surrender back to him, in case he should be victorious in this war; but, if things should fall out otherwise, he then was to possess it as his own. The tyrant accepting the conditions, was brought in the night into the city. Immediately the houses and possessions of such of the principal men as had fled were plundered: and those who stayed behind were robbed of all their gold and silver, and taxed in very heavy sums. Those who gave their money readily and cheerfully were not molested farther; but such as were either suspected of concealing their riches, or discovering only part of them, were cruelly whipped with rods like so many slaves, and treated with the utmost indignity. At length Nabis having summoned the assembly, the first decree he enacted was for abolishing of debts; and the second for dividing the lands equally among the citizens. This is the double bait generally hung out to win the affections of the common people, and exasperate them against the rich.

The tyrant soon forgot from whom and on what condition he held the city. He sent ambassadors to Quintius and to Attalus, to acquaint them that he was master of Argos; and to invite them to an interview, in which he hoped that they would agree, without difficulty, to the conditions of a treaty which he was desirous of concluding with them. His proposal was accepted; in consequence of which the proconsul and the king had an interview with him near Argos; a step which seemed very unbecoming the dignity of either. In this meeting the Romans insisted that Nabis should furnish them with troops, and discontinue the war with the Achæans. The tyrant agreed to the first article, but would consent only to four months' truce with the Achæans. The treaty was concluded on those conditions. This alliance with such a tyrant as Nabis, so infamous for his injustice and cruelty, reflects dishonour on the Romans; but in war, soldiers think themselves allowed to take all advantages, at the expense even of honour and equity.

Nabis, after putting a strong garrison into Argos, had plundered all the men and deprived them of all their riches: a little after he sent his wife thither, to use the ladies in the same manner. Accordingly, she sent for the women of the greatest distinction, either separately or in company; when, partly by civility, and partly by threats, she extorted from them at different times, not only all their gold, but also their richest clothes, their most valuable furniture, and all their precious stones and jewels.

When the spring was come,² (for the incidents I have here related happened in the winter,) Quintius and Attalus resolved, if possible, to secure the alliance of the Boeotians, who till then had been uncertain and wavering. In this view they went, with some ambassadors of the confederates, to Thebes, which was the capital of the country, and the place where the common assembly met. They were secretly favoured and supported by Antiphilus the chief magistrate. The Boeotians thought at first that they had come without forces and unguarded; but were greatly surprised when they saw Quintius followed by a considerable detachment of troops, whence they immediately judged that things would be carried on in an arbitrary manner in the assembly. It was summoned to meet on the morrow. However, they concealed their grief and surprise; and indeed it would have been of no use, and even dangerous, to have discovered them.

Attalus spoke first, and expatiated on the services which his ancestors and himself had done to all Greece, and the republic of the Boeotians in particular. Being hurried away by his zeal for the Romans, and speaking with greater vehemence than suited his age, he fell down in the midst of his speech, and seemed half dead; so that they were forced to carry him out of the assembly, which interrupted their deliberations for some time. Aristæus, captain general of the Achæans, spoke next: and after him, Quintius, who said but little; and laid greater stress on the fidelity of the Romans, than on their power or arms. Afterwards the votes were taken, when an alliance with the Romans was unanimously resolved upon; no one daring to oppose or speak against it.

As Attalus's disorder did not seem dangerous Quintius left him at Thebes, and returned to Elatia highly satisfied with the double alliance he had concluded with the Achæans and Boeotians, which entirely secured him behind, and gave him an opportunity of employing his whole attention and efforts on the side of Macedonia.

As soon as Attalus had recovered a little strength, he was carried to Pergamus,³ where he died soon after, aged threescore and twelve years, of which he had reigned fifty-four. Polybius observes that Attalus did not imitate most men, to whom great riches are generally the occasion of plunging into vices and irregularities of every kind. His generous and magnificent use of riches, directed and tempered by prudence, gave him an opportunity of enlarging his dominions, and of adorning himself with the title of king. He imagined he was rich, only that he might do good to others; and thought that he put out his money at a high and very lawful interest, in expending it in acts of bounty and in purchasing friends. He governed his subjects with the strictest justice, and always observed inviolable fidelity towards his allies. He was a generous friend, a tender husband an affectionate father; and perfectly discharged all the duties of a king, and of a private man. He left four sons, Eumenes, Attalus, Philæterus, and Athenæus, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel.

The armies on both sides had set out upon their march,⁴ in order to terminate the war by a battle. The forces were pretty equal on both sides, and each consisted of about 25 or 26,000 men. Quintius advanced into Thessaly, where he was informed the enemy were also arrived; but being unable to discover exactly the place where they were encamped, he commanded his soldiers to cut stakes, in order to make use of them upon occasion.

Here Polybius, and Livy, who frequently copies him, show the different manner in which the Greeks and Romans used the stakes with which they fortified their camp. Among the former, the best stakes were those round whose trunk a great number of branches were spread, which made them so much the heavier; besides, as the arms of the Grecian soldiers were so ponderous that they could scarce support them, they consequently could not easily carry stakes at the same time. Now the Romans did not leave above three, at the most four, branches to each stake they cut, and all of them on the same side. In this manner the soldier was able to carry two or three of them, when tied together, especially as he was not incommoded with his arms; his buckler being thrown over his shoulders and having only two or three javelins in his hand.

Besides, the latter kind of stakes do much greater service. Those of the Greeks might very easily be pulled up. As this stake, whose trunk was large, was single and detached from the rest; and besides, as the branches of it were strong and many in number, two or three soldiers could easily pull it out, and by that means open a way to the camp; not to mention that all the stakes near it must necessarily have been loosened, because their branches were too short to interweave one with the other. But it was not so with the stakes cut by the Romans; their branches being so closely interwoven, that it was scarce possible to discover the stake to which they belonged. Nor could any man pull up those stakes by thrusting his hand into the branches, as they were so closely intertwined, that no vacant place was left; besides which, all the ends of them were sharp-pointed. But even supposing any hold could have been laid on them, yet the stake could not easily be torn up, for two reasons; first, because it was driven so deep in the ground, that there was no moving it; and secondly, because the branches were so closely interwoven, that it was impossible to pull up one without forcing away several others at the same time. Though two or three men put their whole strength to them, it was yet impossible for them to force the stakes away. And yet, even if by shaking and moving them about, they at last were forced out of their places, still the opening made in that manner was almost imperceptible. Thus these kind of stakes were preferable, on three accounts, to those of the Greeks; they were to be had every where, could be carried with ease, and were a strong palisade to a camp, which could not easily be broken through.

These sort of digressions, made by so great a master as Polybius, which relate to the usages and practices of war, commonly please persons of the military profession, to whom they may furnish useful hints; and, in my opinion, I ought to neglect nothing that may in any respect conduce to the public utility.

After the general had taken the precautions above mentioned, he marched out at the head of all his forces. After some slight skirmishes, in which the Ætolian cavalry signalized themselves and were always victorious, the two armies halted near Scotussa. Exceeding heavy rains, attended with thunder, having fallen the night before, the next day was so cloudy and dark, that a man could scarce see two spaces before him. Philip then detached a body of troops, with orders to seize upon the summit of the hills called Cynoscephale, which separated his camp from that of the Romans. Quintus also detached ten squadrons of horse, and about 1000 light-armed troops, to reconnoitre the enemy; and at the same time directed them, in the strongest terms, to beware of ambuscades, as the weather was so very gloomy. This detachment met that of the Macedonians which had seized the eminences. At first both parties were a little surprised at meeting, and afterwards began to skirmish. Each party sent advice to their general of what was going forward. The Romans, being severely handled, despatched a courier to their camp to desire a reinforcement. Quintus immediately sent Archedamus and Eupolemus, both Ætolians, and with them two tribesmen, each of whom commanded 1000 men, with 500 horse, which joining the former, soon changed the face of the engagement. The Macedonians behaved valiantly enough; but being oppressed with the weight of their arms, they fled to the hills, and from thence sent to the king for succour.

Philip, who had detached a party of his soldiers for forage, being informed of the danger his first troops were in, and the sky beginning to clear up, despatched Heraclides, who commanded the Thessalian cavalry, Leo, who commanded that of Macedonia, and Athenagoras, under whom were all the hired soldiers, those of Thrace excepted. When this reinforcement joined the first detachment, the courage of the Macedonians revived, they returned to the charge, and drove the Romans from the hills. They even would have gained a complete victory, had it not been for the resistance made by the Ætolian cavalry, who fought with astonishing courage and intrepidity. This was the best of all the Grecian cavalry and was particularly famous for skirmishes and single combats. These so well sustained the impetuous charge of the Macedonians, that had it not been for their bravery, the Romans would have been repulsed into the valley. At some distance from the enemy they took breath a little, and afterwards returned to the fight.

Couriers came every moment to inform Philip, that the Romans were terrified and fled, and that the time was come for defeating them entirely. Philip was not pleased either with the place or the weather, but could not withstand the repeated shouts and entreaties of his soldiers, who besought him to lead them on to battle; and accordingly, he marched them out of his entrenchments. The proconsul did the same, and drew up his soldiers in order of battle.

The leaders on each side, in this instant which was going to determine their fate, animated their troops by all the most affecting motives. Philip represented to his soldiers, the Persians, Bactrians, Indians, in a word, all Asia and the whole East, subdued by their victorious arms; adding, that they ought now to behave with the greater courage, as they now were to fight, not for sovereignty, but for liberty, which, to valiant minds, is more dear and valuable than the empire of the universe. The proconsul put his soldiers in mind of the victories they had so lately gained; on one side, Sicily and Carthage; on the other, Italy and Spain, subdued by the Romans; and to say all in a word, Hannibal, the great Hannibal, certainly equal, if not superior to Alexander, driven out of Italy by their triumphant arms; and, which ought to rouse their courage the more, this very Philip, whom they now were going to engage, defeated by them more than once, and obliged to fly before them.

Fired by these speeches, the soldiers, who, on one side, called themselves victors of the East; and on the other, conquerors of the West; the former elated with the glorious achievements of their ancestors, and the latter proud of the trophies and the victories they had so lately gained, prepared on each side for battle. Flaminius, having commanded the right wing not to move from its post, placed the elephants in the front of this wing; and, marching with a haughty and intrepid air, led on the left wing against the enemy in person. And now the skirmishers, seeing themselves supported by the legions, return to the charge, and begin the attack.

Philip, with his light-armed troops, and the right wing of his phalanx, hastened towards the mountains; commanding Nicanor to march the rest of the army immediately after him. When he approached the Roman camp, and found his light armed troops engaged, he was exceedingly pleased at the sight. However, not long after, seeing them give way, and in exceeding want of support, he was obliged to sustain them, and engage in a general battle, though the greatest part of his phalanx was still upon their march towards the hills where he then was. In the mean time he receives such of his troops as had been repulsed; posts them, whether horse or foot, on his right wing; and commands the light armed soldiers and the phalanx to double their files, and to close their ranks on the right.

This being done, as the Romans were near, he commands the phalanx to march towards them with their pikes presented, and the light-armed to extend beyond them on the right and left. Quintus had also, at the same time, received into his intervals those who had begun the fight, and now charged the Macedonians. The onset being begun, each side sent up the most dreadful cries. Philip's right wing had visibly all the advantage; for as he charged with impetuosity from the heights with his phalanx on the

† His adhortationibus utrinque conclatati milites, prælio concurrunt, alteri Orientis, alteri Occidentis imperio gloriantes ferentesque in bellum, alii majorum suorum antiquam et obsoletam gloriam, alii virentem recentibus experimentis virtutis florem. Justin.

Romans, the latter could not sustain the shock of troops so well closed and covered with their shields, and whose front presented an impenetrable hedge of pikes. The Romans were obliged to give way.

But it was different with regard to Philip's left wing, which was but just arrived. As its ranks were broken and separated by the hillocks and uneven ground, Quintius flew to his right wing, and charged vigorously the left wing of the Macedonians: persuaded, that if he could but break it, and put it in disorder, it would draw after it the other wing, although victorious. The event answered his expectations. As this wing, on account of the unevenness and ruggedness of the ground, could not keep in the form of a phalanx, nor double its ranks to give it depth, in which the whole strength of the body consists, it was entirely defeated.

On this occasion a tribune, who had not above twenty companies under him, made a movement that contributed very much to the victory. Observing that Philip, who was at a great distance from the rest of the army, was charging the left wing of the Romans with vigour, he leaves the right where he was, (it not being in want of support,) and consulting only his own reason, and the present disposition of the armies, he marches towards the phalanx of the enemy's right wing, and charges them in the rear with all his troops. The phalanx, on account of the prodigious length of the pikes, and the closeness of its ranks, cannot face about to the rear, nor fight man to man. The tribune breaks into it, killing all before him as he advanced; and the Macedonians, not being able to defend themselves, throw down their arms and fly. What increased the slaughter was, that the Romans who had given way, having rallied, were returned to attack the phalanx in front at the same time.

Philip, judging at first of the rest of the battle from the advantage he had obtained in his wing, assured himself of a complete victory. But when he saw his soldiers throw down their arms, and the Romans pouring upon them behind, he drew off with a body of troops to some distance from the field of battle, and from thence took a survey of the whole engagement: when perceiving that the Romans, who pursued the left wing, extended almost to the summit of the mountains, he got together all the Thracians and Macedonians he could assemble, and endeavoured to save himself by flight.

After the battle, in every part of which victory had declared for the Romans, Philip retired to Tempe, where he halted to wait for those who had escaped the defeat. He had been so prudent as to send orders to Larissa, to burn all his papers, that the Romans might not have an opportunity of distressing any of his friends. The Romans pursued for some time those who fled. The Ætoliens were accused of having occasioned Philip's escape, for they amused themselves in plundering his camp, whilst the Romans were employed in pursuing the enemy; so that when they returned, they found scarcely any thing in it. They reproached them at first on that account, and afterwards quarrelled outright, each side loading the other with the grossest invectives. On the morrow, after having got together the prisoners and the rest of the spoils, they marched towards Larissa. The Romans lost about 700 men in this battle, and the Macedonians 13,000, whereof 8000 died in the field, and 5000 were taken prisoners. Thus ended the battle of Cynoscephale.

The Ætoliens had certainly signalized themselves in this battle, and contributed very much to the victory; but they were so vain, or rather insolent, as to ascribe the success of it entirely to themselves; declaring, without reserve or modesty, that they were far better soldiers than the Romans; and spread this report throughout all Greece. Quintius, who was already offended at them, for their greedy impatience in seizing the plunder without waiting for the Romans, was still more enraged at them for their insolent reports in regard to their superior valour. From that time he behaved with great coldness towards them, and never informed them of any thing relating to public affairs, affecting to humble their pride on all occasions.

These reports seem to have made too strong an impression on Quintius, who did not act with due prudence and caution towards allies so useful to the Romans; for by thus alienating their affections, he paved the way, at a distance, for that open defection, to which the resentment of the Ætoliens afterwards carried them. But had he dissembled wisely; had he shut his eyes and ears to many things, and appeared sometimes ignorant of what the Ætoliens might say or do improperly, he might perhaps have remedied every thing.

Some days after the battle, Philip sent ambassadors to Flamininus, who was at Larissa, upon pretence of desiring a truce for burying their dead; but in reality to obtain an interview with him. The proconsul agreed to both requests, and was so polite as to bid the messenger tell the king, "that he desired him not to despond." The Ætoliens were highly offended at this message. As these people were not well acquainted with the character of the Romans, and judged of their disposition from their own, they imagined that Flamininus would not have appeared favourable to Philip, if the latter had not corrupted him with bribes; and they were not ashamed to spread such reports among the allies.

The Roman general set out, with the confederates for the appointed place of meeting, which was at the entrance of Tempe. He assembled them before the king arrived, to inquire what they thought of the conditions of peace. Amynder, king of Athamania, who spoke in the name of the rest, said that such a treaty ought to be concluded as might enable Greece to preserve peace and liberty even in the absence of the Romans.

Alexander the Ætolian spoke next, and said, that if the proconsul imagined that in concluding a peace with Philip, he should procure a solid peace for the Romans, or lasting liberty for the Greeks, he was greatly mistaken, that the only way to put an end to the Macedonian war, would be to drive Philip out of his kingdom; and that this might be very easily effected, provided he would take the advantage of the present occasion. After corroborating what he had advanced with several reasons he sat down.

Quintius, addressing himself to Alexander; "You do not know," says he, "either the character of the Romans, my views, or the interest of Greece. It is not usual with the Romans, after they have engaged in war with a king, or other power, to ruin him entirely; and of this Hannibal and the Carthaginians are a manifest proof. As to myself, I never intended to make an irreconcilable war against Philip; but have always been inclined to grant him a peace, whenever he should yield to the conditions that should be prescribed him. You yourselves, Ætoliens, in the assemblies which were held for that purpose, never once mentioned depriving Philip of his kingdom. Should victory inspire us with such a design? How shameful are such sentiments! When an enemy attacks us in the field, it is our business to repel him with bravery and haughtiness; but when he is fallen it is the duty of the victor to show moderation, gentleness, and humanity. With regard to the Greeks, it is their interest, I confess, that the kingdom of Macedonia should be less powerful than formerly; but it no less concerns their welfare, that it should not be entirely destroyed. That kingdom serves them as a barrier against the Thracians and the Gauls, who, were they not checked by it, would certainly pour down upon Greece, as they have frequently done before."

Flamininus concluded with declaring, that his opinion and that of the council, was, that if Philip would promise to observe faithfully all the conditions which the allies had formerly prescribed, that then a peace should be granted him, after having consulted the senate about it; and that the Ætoliens might adopt whatever resolution they pleased on this occasion. Phœneus, prætor of the Ætoliens, having represented in very strong terms, that Philip, if he should escape the present danger, would soon form new projects, and light up a fresh war; "I shall take care of that," replied the proconsul; "and shall take effectual methods to put it out of his power to undertake any thing against us."

† A great number of Gauls had settled in the countries adjoining to Thrace.

The next day Philip arrived at the place appointed for the conference; and three days after, the council being met again, he came into it, and spoke with so much prudence and wisdom, as softened the whole assembly. He declared that he would accept, and execute, whatever conditions the Romans and the allies should prescribe; and that with regard to every thing else, he would rely entirely on the discretion of the senate. Upon these words the whole council were silent. Only Phœneas the Ætolian started some difficulties, which were altogether improper, and for that reason entirely disregarded.

But what prompted Flamininus to urge the conclusion of the peace was, his having advice, that Antiochus, at the head of an army, was marching out of Syria, in order to make an irruption into Europe. He apprehended that Philip might think of putting his cities into a condition of defence, and thereby might gain time. Besides, he was sensible that should another consul come in his stead, all the honour of that war would be ascribed to him. These reasons prevailed with him to grant the king a four month's truce; whereupon he received 400 talents¹ from him, took Demetrius his son, and some of his friends, as hostages, and gave him permission to send to Rome to receive such farther conditions from the senate, as they should prescribe. Matters being thus adjusted, the parties separated, after having mutually promised, that in case a peace should not be concluded, Flamininus should return Philip the talents and the hostages. This being done, the several parties concerned sent deputations to Rome; some to solicit peace, and others to throw obstacles in its way.

Whilst these measures were concerting to bring about a general peace,² some expeditions, of little importance, were undertaken in several places. Androthènes, who commanded under the king, at Corinth, had a considerable body of troops, consisting of above 6000 men: he was defeated in a battle by Nicostratus, pretor of the Achæans, who came upon him unawares, and attacked him at a time when his troops were dispersed up and down the plains, and plundering the country. The Acarnanians were divided in their sentiments, some being for Philip, and others for the Romans. The latter had laid siege to Leucas. News being brought of the victory gained at Cynoscephale, the whole country submitted to the conquerors. At the same time the Rhodians took Pera, a small country in Caria, which, as they pretended, belonged to them, and had been unjustly taken from them by the Macedonians. Philip, on the other side, repulsed the Dardanian, who had made an irroad into his kingdom, in order to take advantage of the ill state of his affairs. After this expedition, the king retired to Thessalonica.

At Rome³ the time for the elec-

At the same time letters arrived from Quintius, containing the particulars of his victory over Philip. They were first read before the senate, and afterwards to the people; and public prayers, during five days, were ordered, to thank the gods for the protection they had granted the Romans in the war against Philip.

Some days after, the ambassadors arrived to treat of the intended peace with the king of Macedonia. The affair was debated in the senate. Each of the ambassadors made long speeches, according to their respective views and interests; but, at last, the majority were for peace. The same affair being brought before the people, Marcellus, who passionately desired to command the armies in Greece, used his utmost endeavours to break the treaty, but all to no purpose; for the people approved of Flamininus's proposal, and ratified the conditions. The senate then appointed ten of the most illustrious citizens to go into Greece, in order to settle, in conjunction with Flamininus, the affairs of that country, and secure its liberties. In the same assembly, the Achæans desired to be received as allies of the people of Rome; but that affair meeting with some difficulties, it was referred to the ten commissioners.

A sedition had broken out in Boeotia, between the partisans of Philip and those of the Romans, which rose to a great height. Nevertheless, it was not attended with any ill consequences, the proconsul having soon appeared it.

The ten commissioners,⁴ who had set out from Rome to settle the affairs of Greece, arrived soon in that country. The chief conditions of the treaty of peace, which they settled in concert with Flamininus, were as follow: That all the other⁵ cities of Greece, both in Asia and Europe, should be free, and be governed by their own laws: that Philip, before the celebration of the Isthmian games, should evacuate those in which he then had garrisons: that he should restore to the Romans all the prisoners and deserters, and deliver up to them all the ships that had decks, five feluccas excepted, and the galley having sixteen benches of rowers: that he should pay 1000 talents;⁶ one half immediately, and the other half in ten years, fifty every year, by way of tribute. Among the hostages required of him, was Demetrius his son, who accordingly was sent to Rome.

In this manner Flamininus ended the Macedonian war, to the great satisfaction of the Greeks, and very happily for Rome. For, not to mention Hannibal, who, though vanquished, might still have an opportunity of finding the Romans considerable employment; Antiochus seeing his power considerably increased by his glorious exploits, which had acquired him the surname of Great, was at that time meditating to carry his arms into Europe. If, therefore, Flamininus, by his great prudence, had not foreseen what would come to pass, and had not speedily concluded this peace; had the war against Antiochus been joined, in the midst of Greece, with the war carrying on against Philip; and had the two greatest and most powerful kings then in the world, (uniting their views and interests) made head against Rome at the same time; it is certain the Romans would have been engaged in as many battles, and in as great dangers, as those they had been obliged to sustain in the war against Hannibal.

As soon as this treaty of peace was known, all Greece, Ætolia excepted, received the news of it with universal joy. The inhabitants of the latter country seemed dissatisfied, and inveighed privately against it among the confederates, affirming, that it was nothing but empty words; that the Greeks were amused with the name of liberty; with which specious term the Romans covered their interested views: that they indeed suffered the cities in Asia to enjoy their freedom; but that they seemed to reserve to themselves those of Europe, as Oœuni, Eretria, Chalcis, Demetrias, and Corinth. That therefore Greece, strictly speaking, was not freed from its chains; and, at most, had only changed its sovereign.

These complaints made the proconsul so much the more uneasy, as they were not altogether without foundation. The commissioners, pursuant to the instructions they had received from Rome, advised Flamininus to restore all the Greeks to their liberty; but to keep possession of the cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, which were the keys of Greece; and to put strong garrisons into them, to prevent their being seized by Antiochus. He obtained, in the council, to have Corinth set at liberty; but it was resolved there, that a strong garrison should be put into the citadel, as well as in the two cities of Chalcis and Demetrias; and this for a time only, till they should be entirely rid of their fears with regard to Antiochus.

It was now the time in which the Isthmian games were to be solemnized; and the expectation of what was there to be transacted, had drawn thither an incredible multitude of people, and persons of the highest rank. The conditions of the treaty of peace, which were not yet entirely made public, formed the topic of all conversations, and various opinions were entertained concerning them; but very few could be persuaded, that the Romans would evacuate all the cities they had taken. All Greece was in this uncertainty, when, the multitude being assembled in the stadium to see the games, a herald comes forward, and publishes with a loud voice:—"The senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintus the general, having overcome Philip and the Macedonians, set at liberty from all garrisons, and taxes, and imposts, the Corinthians, the Locrians, the Phocians, the Eubœans, the Phthiot Achæans, the Magnesians, the Thessalians, and the Perrhæbians; declare them free, and ordain that they shall be governed by their respective laws and usages."

At these words,¹ which many heard but imperfectly, because of the noise that interrupted them, all the spectators were filled with excess of joy. They gazed upon and questioned one another with astonishment, and could not believe either their eyes or ears; so like a dream was what they then saw and heard. It was thought necessary for the herald to repeat the proclamation, which was now listened to with the most profound silence, so that not a single word of the decree was lost. And now fully assured of their happiness, they abandoned themselves again to the highest transports of joy, and broke into such loud and repeated acclamations, that the sea resounded with them at a great distance: and some ravens, which happened to fly that instant over the assembly, fell down in the stadium; so true it is, that of all the blessings of this life, none are so dear to mankind as liberty! The games and sports were hurried over, without any attention being paid to them; for so great was the general joy upon this occasion, that it extinguished all other sentiments.

The games being ended, all the people ran in crowds to the Roman general; and every one being eager to see his deliverer, to salute him, to kiss his hand and throw crowns and festoons of flowers over him; he would have run the hazard of being pressed to death by the crowd, had not the vigour of his years (for he was not above thirty-three years old,) and the joy which so glorious a day gave him, sustained and enabled him to undergo the fatigue of it.

And indeed I would ask, whether any mortal ever experienced a more happy or a more glorious day than this was for Flamininus and the Roman people? What are all the triumphs of the world in comparison with what we have seen on this occasion? Should we heap together all the trophies, all the victories, all the conquests of Alexander and the greatest captains, how little would they appear, when opposed to this single action of goodness, humanity, and justice? It is a great misfortune to princes, that they are not so sensible as they ought to be to so refined a joy, to so affecting and exquisite a glory, as that which arises from doing good to mankind.

The remembrance of so delightful a day,² and of the valuable blessings then bestowed, was continually renewed, and for a long time formed the only subject of conversation at all times and in all places. Every one cried in the highest transports of admiration, and a kind of enthusiasm, "That there was a people in the world, who at their own expense and the hazard of their lives, engaged in a war for the liberty of other nations; and that, not for their neighbours, or people situated on the same continent, but who crossed seas, and sailed to distant climes, to destroy and extirpate unjust power from the earth, and to establish universal law, equity, and justice. That by a single word, and the voice of a herald, liberty had been restored to all the cities of Greece and Asia. That a great soul only could have formed such a design; but that to execute it was the effect at once of the highest good fortune, and the most consummate virtue."

They called to mind all the great battles,³ which Greece had fought for the sake of Liberty. "After sustaining so many wars," said they, "never was its valour crowned with so blessed a reward, as when strangers came and took up arms in its defence. It was then, that almost without shedding a drop of blood, or losing scarce one man, it acquired the greatest and noblest of all prizes for which mankind can contend. Valour and prudence are rare at all times; but of all virtues, justice is most rare. Agesilaus, Lysander, Nicias, and Alcibiades, had great abilities for carrying on war, and gaining battles both by sea and land; but then it was for themselves and their country, not for strangers and foreigners, they fought. That height of glory was reserved for the Romans."

Such were the reflections the Greeks made on the present state of affairs; and the effects soon answered the glorious proclamation made at the Isthmian games; for the commissioners separated, to go and put their decree in execution in all the cities.

Flamininus, being returned from Argos, was appointed president of the Nemean games. He discharged perfectly well all the duties of that employment, and used his utmost endeavours to add to the pomp and magnificence of the festival; and he also published by a herald at these games, as he had done at the others, the liberty of Greece.

As he visited the several cities, he established good regulations in them, reformed the administration of justice, restored amity and concord between the citizens, by appeasing quarrels and seditions, and recalling the exiles; infinitely more pleased with being able by the means of persuasion to reconcile the Greeks one to another, and to re-establish unity amongst them, than he had been in conquering the Macedonians; so that even liberty seemed the least of the blessings they had received from him. And, indeed, of what service would liberty have been to the Greeks, had not justice and concord been restored among them? What an example is here for governors of provinces! How happy are the people under magistrates of this character!

It is related that Xenocrates the philosopher, having been delivered at Athens, by Lycurgus the orator, out of the hands of the tax-gatherers, who were dragging him to prison, in order to make him pay a sum which foreigners were obliged by law to pay into the public treasury, and meeting soon after the sons of his deliverer, he said to them, "I repay with usury the kindness your father did me: for I am the cause that all mankind praise him." But the gratitude which the Greeks showed Flamininus and the Romans, did not terminate merely in causing them to be praised, but also infinitely contributed to the augmentation of their power, by inducing all nations to confide in them, and rely on the faith of their engagements. For they not only received such gene-als as the Romans sent them, but requested earnestly that they might be sent; they called them in, and put themselves into their hands with joy. And not only nations and cities, but princes and kings, who had complaints to offer against the injustice of neighbouring powers, had recourse to them, and put themselves in a manner under their safeguard; so that, in a short time, from an effect of the Divine protection (to use Flutarch's expression,) ¹ the whole earth submitted to their empire.

Cornelius, one of the commissioners, who had dispersed themselves up and down, came to the assembly of the Greeks which was held at Thermæ,² a city of Ætolia. He there made a long speech, to exhort the Ætoliens to continue firmly attached to the party for whom they had declared; and never to infringe the alliance they had made with the Romans. Some of the principal Ætoliens complained, but with modesty, that the Romans, since the victory they had obtained, did not show so much favour as before to their nation. Others reproached him, but in harsh and injurious terms, that had it not been for the Ætoliens, the Romans not only would never have conquered Philip, but would never have been able to set foot in Greece. Cornelius, to prevent all disputes and contests, which are always of pernicious consequence, was so prudent as only to refer them to the senate, assuring them that all possible justice would be done them. Accordingly they came to that resolution; and thus ended the war against Philip.

SECTION IV.—COMPLAINTS BEING MADE AND SUSPICIONS ARISING CONCERNING ANTIOCHUS, THE ROMANS SEND AN EMBASSY TO HIM, WHICH HAS NO OTHER EFFECT, THAN TO DISPOSE BOTH PARTIES FOR AN OPEN RUPTURE. A CONSPIRACY IS FORMED BY SCOPAS THE ÆTOLIAN AGAINST PTOLEMY. HE AND HIS ACCOMPLICES ARE PUT TO DEATH. HANNIBAL RETIRES TO ANTIOCHUS. WAR OF FLAMININUS AGAINST NABIS, WHOM HE BESIEGES IN SPARTA: HE OBLIGES HIM TO SUE FOR PEACE, AND GRANTS IT HIM. HE ENTERS ROME IN TRIUMPH.

THE war in Macedonia had ended very seasonably for the Romans, who otherwise would have had upon their hands at the same time two powerful enemies, Philip and Antiochus: for it was evident, that the Romans would soon be obliged to proclaim war against the king of Syria, who enlarged his conquests daily, and undoubtedly was preparing to cross over into Europe.

After having left himself nothing A. M. 3808. to fear on the side of Cœle-syria Ant. J. C 196. and Palestine,³ by the alliance he had concluded with the king of Egypt, and possessed himself of several cities of Asia Minor, and among them that of Ephesus, he took the most proper measures for the success of his designs; and the reinstating himself in the possession of all those kingdoms which he pretended had formerly belonged to his ancestors.

Smyrna, Lampsacus, and the other Grecian cities of Asia which enjoyed their liberty at that time, seeing plainly that he intended to bring them under subjection, resolved to defend themselves. But being of themselves unable to resist so powerful an enemy, they had recourse to the Romans for protection, which was readily granted. The Romans saw plainly that it was their interest to check the progress of Antiochus towards the West, and how fatal the consequence would be, should they suffer him to extend his power by settling on the coast of Asia, according to the plan he had laid down. They were therefore very glad of the opportunity those free cities gave them, of opposing it; and immediately sent an embassy to him

Before the ambassadors had time to reach Antiochus, he had already sent off detachments from his army, which had formed the sieges of Smyrna and Lampsacus. That prince had passed the Hellespont in person with the rest of it, and possessed himself of all the Thracian Chersonesus. Finding the city of Lysimachia ⁴ all in ruins (the Thracians having demolished it a few years before) he began to rebuild it, with the design of founding a kingdom there for Seleucus his second son; to bring all the country round it under his dominion, and to make this city the capital of the new kingdom.

At the very time that he was revolving all these new projects, the Roman ambassadors arrived in Thrace. They came up with him at Selymbria, a city of that country, and were attended by some deputies from the Grecian cities in Asia. In the first conferences, the whole time was passed in mutual civilities, which appeared sincere; but when they proceeded to business, the face of affairs was soon changed. L. Cornelius, who spoke on this occasion, required Antiochus to restore to Ptolemy the several cities in Asia which he had taken from him; to evacuate all those which had been possessed by Philip; it not being just that he should reap the fruits of the war, which the Romans had carried on against that prince; and not to molest such of the Grecian cities of Asia as enjoyed their liberty. He added, that the Romans were greatly surprised at Antiochus, for crossing into Europe with two such numerous armies, and so powerful a fleet; and for rebuilding Lysimachia, an undertaking which could have no other view but to invade them.

To all this Antiochus answered that Ptolemy should have full satisfaction, when his marriage, which was already concluded, should be solemnized: that with regard to such Grecian cities as desired to retain their liberties, it was from him and not from the Romans they were to receive it. With respect to Lysimachia, he declared, that he rebuilt it with the design of making it the residence of Seleucus his son; that Thrace, and the Chersonesus, which was part of it, belonged to him; that they had been conquered from Lysimachus by Seleucus Nicator, one of his ancestors; and that he came thither as into his own patrimony. As to Asia, and the cities he had taken there from Philip, he knew not what right the Romans could have to them; and therefore he desired them to interfere no farther in the affairs of Asia than he did with those of Italy.

The Romans desiring that the ambassadors of Smyrna and Lampsacus might be called in, they accordingly were admitted. They spoke with so much freedom, as incensed Antiochus to that degree, that he cried in a passion, that the Romans had no business to judge of those affairs. Upon this the assembly broke up in great disorder; none of the parties received satisfaction, and every thing seemed to tend to an open rupture.

During these negotiations, a report was spread that Ptolemy Epiphanes was dead. Antiochus immediately thought himself master of Egypt, and accordingly went on board his fleet, in order to go and take possession of it. He left his son Seleucus at Lysimachia, with the army, to complete the projects he had formed with regard to those parts. He first landed at Ephesus, where he caused all his ships in that port to join his fleet, in order to sail as soon as possible for Egypt. On his arrival at Patara in Lycia, certain advice was brought, that the report which was spread concerning Ptolemy's death was false. He then changed his course, and made for the island of Cyprus, in order to seize it; but a storm that arose sunk many of his ships, destroyed a great number of his men, and frustrated all his measures. He thought himself very happy in having an opportunity of entering the harbour of Seleucia with the remnant of his fleet, which he there refitted, and went and wintered at Antioch, without making any new attempt that year.

The foundation of the rumour which was spread of Ptolemy's death,¹ was from a conspiracy having been really formed against his life. This plot was contrived by Scopas. That general seeing himself at the head of all the foreign troops, the greatest part of which were Ætolians as well as himself, imagined that with so formidable a body of well-disciplined veteran forces, it would be easy for him to usurp the crown during the king's minority. His plan was already formed; and had he not let slip the opportunity, by wasting the time in consulting and debating with his friends, instead of acting, he would certainly have succeeded. Aristomenes, the prime minister, being apprised of the conspiracy, laid Scopas under an arrest; after which he was examined before the council, found guilty, and executed, with all his accomplices. This plot made the government confide no longer in the Ætolians, who till then had been in great esteem for their fidelity; most of them were removed from their employments, and sent into their own country. After Scopas's death, immense treasures were found in his coffers, which he had amassed, by plundering the provinces over which he commanded. As Scopas, during the course of his victories in Palestine, had subjected Judæa and Jerusalem to the Egyptian empire, the greatest part of his treasures arose, no doubt, from thence. The transition from avarice to perfidy and treason is often very short; and the fidelity of that general, who discovers a passion for riches, cannot be safely relied on.

One of Scopas's principal accomplices was Dichæarchus, who had formerly been admiral to Philip, king of Macedonia. A very strange action is related of this man. That prince having commanded him to fall upon the islands called Cyclades, in open violation of the most solemn treaties, before he came out of the harbour he set up two altars, one to Injustice and the other to Impiety, and offered sacrifices on both, to insult, as one would imagine, at the same time both gods and men. As this wretch had so greatly distinguished himself by his crimes, Aristomenes distinguished him also from the rest of the conspirators in his execution. He despatched all the others by poison, but as for Dichæarchus, he caused him to die in exquisite torments.

The contrivers of the conspiracy being put to death, and all their measures entirely defeated, the king was declared of age, though he had not yet quite attained the years appointed by the laws, and was set upon the throne with great pomp and solemnity. He thereby took the government upon himself, and accordingly began to transact business. As long as Aristomenes was in administration under him, all things went well; but when the king conceived disgust for that faithful and able minister, and not long after put him to death, (to rid himself of a man whose virtue was offensive to him,) the remainder of his reign was one continued series of disorder and confusion. His subjects laboured now under as many evils, and even greater, than in his father's reign, when vice was most triumphant.

When the ten commissioners,² A. M. 3809. who were sent to settle the affairs Ant. J. C. 195. of Philip, were returned to Rome, and made their report, they told their senate, that they must expect and prepare for a new war, which would be still more dangerous than that they had just before terminated: that Antiochus had crossed into Europe with a strong army, and a considerable fleet: that upon a false report which had been spread concerning Ptolemy's death, he had set out, in order to possess himself of Egypt, and that otherwise he would have made Greece the seat of the war: that the Ætolians, a people naturally restless and turbulent, and ill-affected to Rome, would certainly rise on that occasion: that Greece fostered in its own bosom a tyrant (Nabis) more avaricious and cruel than any of his predecessors, who was meditating how to enslave it; and that thus having been restored in vain to its liberty by the Romans, it would only change its sovereign, and would fall under a more grievous captivity than before, especially if Nabis should continue in possession of the city of Argos.

Flaminius was commanded to have an eye on Nabis, and they were particularly vigilant over all Antiochus's steps. He had just before left Antioch, in the beginning of the spring, in order to go to Ephesus; and had scarce left it, when Hannibal arrived there, and claimed his protection. That general had lived unmolested in Carthage, during six years from the conclusion of peace with the Romans; but he was now suspected of holding a secret correspondence with Antiochus, and of forming with him the design of carrying the war into Italy. His enemies sent advice of this secretly to the Romans, who immediately deputed an embassy to Carthage, to inform themselves more particularly as to the fact; with orders, in case the proof should be manifest, to require the Carthaginians to deliver up Hannibal to them. But that general had too much penetration and foresight,³ and had been too long accustomed to prepare for storms, even in the greatest calms, not to suspect their design; so that before they had an opportunity to execute their commission, he withdrew privately, got to the coast, and went on board a ship which always lay ready by his order against such an occasion. He escaped to Tyre, and went from thence to Antioch, where he expected to find Antiochus, but was obliged to follow him to Ephesus.

He arrived there exactly at the time that the prince was in suspense whether he should engage in a war with the Romans. The arrival of Hannibal gave him great satisfaction. He did not doubt, but with the counsel and assistance of a man who had so often defeated the Romans, and who had thereby justly acquired the reputation of being the greatest general of the age, he should be able to complete all his designs. He now thought of nothing but victories and conquests: accordingly war was resolved, and all that year and the following were employed in making the necessary preparations. Nevertheless, during that time, embassies were sent on both sides, upon pretext of an accommodation; but, in reality, to gain time, and see what the enemy were doing.

With regard to Greece,⁴ all the states except the Ætolians, whose secret discontent I noticed before, enjoyed the sweets of liberty and peace, and in that condition admired no less the temperance, justice, and moderation, of the Roman victor, than they had before admired his courage and intrepidity in the field. Such was the state of things, when Quintus received a decree from Rome, by which he was permitted to declare war against Nabis. Upon this, he convenes the confederates at Corinth, and after acquainting them with the cause of their meeting, "You perceive," says he, "that the subject of the present deliberation solely regards you. Our business is to determine, whether Argos, an ancient and most illustrious city, situated in the midst of Greece, shall enjoy its liberty in common with the rest of the cities, or whether it shall continue subject to the tyrant of Sparta, who has seized it. This affair concerns the Romans no otherwise, than as the slavery of a single city hinders their glory in having delivered all Greece from being full and complete. Consider therefore what is to be done, and your resolutions shall determine my conduct."

No doubt could be entertained as to the sentiments of the assembly: the Ætolians alone could not forbear showing their resentment against the Romans, which they carried so high, as to charge them with a breach of faith in keeping possession of Chalcis and Demetrias, at a time that they boasted their having restored liberty to the whole of Greece. They inveighed no less against the rest of the allies, who, in their turn desired to be secured from the rapine of the Ætolians, who were Greeks only in name, but real enemies in their hearts. The dispute growing warm, Quintus obliged them to debate only on the subject before them; upon which it was unanimously resolved, that war should be declared against Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, in case he should refuse to restore Argos to its former liberty; and every one promised to send a speedy succour; which was faithfully performed. Aristenus, general of the Achæans, joined Quintius near Cleone, with 10,000 foot and 1000 horse.

Philip, on his part, sent 1500 men, and the Thesalians 400 horse. Quintius's brother arrived also with a fleet of forty galleys, to which the Rhodians and king Eumenes joined theirs. A great number of Lacedæmonian exiles came to the Roman camp, in hopes of having an opportunity of returning to their native country. They had Agesipolis at their head, to whom the kingdom of Sparta justly belonged. When but an infant, he had been expelled by Lyrurgus, the tyrant, after the death of Cleomenes.

The allies designed at first to besiege Argos, but Quintius thought it more advisable to march directly against the tyrant. He had greatly strengthened the fortifications of Sparta; and had sent for 3000 chosen soldiers from Crete, whom he had joined to the other thousand he had already among his forces. He had 3000 other foreign troops in his service; and, besides these, 10,000 natives of the country, exclusively of the Helots.

At the same time he also concerted measures to secure himself from domestic commotions. Having caused the people to come unarmed to the assembly, and having posted his guards armed round them; after some little preamble, he declared, that as the present juncture of affairs obliged him to take some precautions for his own safety, he therefore was determined to imprison a certain number of citizens, whom he had just cause to suspect; and that the instant the enemy should be repulsed, (whom, he said, he had no reason to fear, provided things were quiet at home,) he would release those prisoners. He then named about eighty youths of the principal families; and throwing them into a secure prison, ordered all their throats to be cut the night following. He also put to death in the villages a great number of the Helots, who were suspected of a design to desert to the enemy. Having by this barbarity spread universal terror, he prepared for a vigorous defence; firmly resolved not to quit the city during the ferment it was in, nor hazard a battle against troops much superior in number to his own.

Quintius having advanced to the Eurotas, which runs almost under the walls of the city, whilst he was forming his camp, Nabis detached his foreign troops against him. As the Romans did not expect such a sally, because they had not been opposed at all upon their march, they were at first put into some disorder, but soon recovering themselves, they repulsed the enemy to the walls of the city. On the morrow, Quintius leading his troops in order of battle, near the river on the other side of the city, when the rearguard had passed, Nabis caused his foreign troops to attack it. The Romans instantly faced about, and the charge was very violent on both sides; but, at last the foreigners were broken and put to flight. Great numbers of them were killed; for the Achæans, who were well acquainted with the country, pursued them every where, and gave them no quarter. Quintius encamped near Anycle; and after ravaging all the beautiful plains that lay round that city, he removed his camp towards the Eurotas; and from thence laid waste the valleys, at the foot of Mount Taygetus, and the lands lying near the sea.

At the same time, the proconsul's brother, who commanded the Roman fleet, laid siege to Gythium, at that time a strong and very important city. The fleet of Eumenes and the Rhodians came up very seasonably; for the besieged defended themselves with great courage. However, after making a long and vigorous resistance, they surrendered.

The tyrant was alarmed at the taking of this city; and therefore sent a herald to Quintius, to demand an interview, which was granted. Besides several other arguments in his own favour on which Nabis laid great stress, he insisted strongly on the late alliance which the Romans, and Quintius himself, had concluded with him in the war against Philip: an alliance on which he ought to rely the more, as the Romans professed themselves faithful and religious observers of treaties, which they boasted their never having violated; that no change had taken place on his part since the treaty: that he was then what he had always been; and had never given the Romans any new occasion for complaints or reproaches.—These arguments were very just; and, to say the truth, Quintius had no solid reasons to oppose to them. Accordingly, in his answer, he only expatiated in random complaints, and reproached him with his avarice, cruelty, and tyranny. But was he less covetous, cruel, and tyrannical, at the time of the treaty? Nothing was concluded in this first interview.

The next day, Nabis agreed to abandon the city of Argos, since the Romans required it; as also, to give them up their prisoners and deserters. He desired Quintius, in case he had any other demands to put them into writing, in order that he might deliberate upon them with his friends: to which Quintius consented. The Roman general also held a council with his allies. Most of them were of opinion, that they should continue the war against Nabis, which could only terminate gloriously, either by extirpating the tyrant, or at least his tyranny; for that otherwise nobody could be assured that the liberty of Greece was restored: that the Romans could not make any kind of treaty with Nabis, without acknowledging him in a solemn manner, and giving a sanction to his usurpation. Quintius was for concluding a peace, because he was afraid that the Spartans were capable of sustaining a long siege, during which the war with Antiochus might break out on a sudden, and he not be in a condition to act with his forces against him. These were his pretended motives for desiring an accommodation; but the true reason was, his being apprehensive that a new consul would be appointed to succeed him in Greece, and by that means deprive him of the glory of having terminated this war: a motive which commonly influenced the resolutions of the Roman generals, more than the good of the public.

Finding that none of his reasons could make the least impression on the allies, he pretended to accede to their opinion, and by that artifice brought them all over to his own. "Let us besiege Sparta," says he, "since you think it proper, and exert ourselves to the utmost for the success of our enterprise. As you are sensible that sieges are often protracted to a greater length than is generally desired, let us resolve to take up our winter quarters here, since it must be so; this is a resolution worthy of you: courage. I have a sufficient number of troops for carrying on this siege; but the more numerous they are, the greater supply of provisions and convoys will be necessary. The winter that is coming on exhibits nothing to us but a naked, ruined country, from which we can have no forage. You see the great extent of this city, and consequently the great number of catapultæ, battering rams, and other machines of all kinds, that will be wanting. Write each of you to your cities, in order that they may furnish you speedily, in an abundant manner, with all things necessary. We are obliged in honour to carry on this siege vigorously: and it would be shameful for us, after having begun it, to be reduced to abandon our enterprise." Every one then making his own reflections, perceived a great many difficulties which he had not foreseen, and was fully sensible that the proposals they were to make to their cities would meet with a very ill reception, when private persons would find themselves obliged to contribute, out of their own purses, to the expense of the war. Changing therefore immediately their opinion, they gave the Roman general full liberty to act as he should think proper, for the good of his republic, and the interest of the allies.

Upon which Quintius, admitting none into his council but the principal officers of the army, agreed, in concert with them, on the conditions of peace to be offered the tyrant. The chief were: that, within ten days, Nabis should evacuate Argos, and all the rest of the cities of Argolis, garrisoned by his troops: that he should restore to the maritime cities all the galleys he had taken from them: and that he himself should keep only two feluccas, with sixteen oars each: that he should surrender up to the cities in alliance with the Romans, all their prisoners, deserters, and slaves: that he should also restore to the Lacedæmonian exiles such of their wives and children as were willing to follow them, without, however, forcing them to do so: that he should give five hostages, to be chosen by the Roman general, of which his son should be one: that he should pay down 100 talents of silver, and afterwards fifty talents, annually, during eight years. A truce was granted for six months, that all parties might have time to send ambassadors to Rome, in order that the treaty might be ratified there.

The tyrant was not satisfied with any of these articles: but he was surprised, and thought himself happy, that no mention had been made of recalling the exiles. When the particulars of this treaty were known in the city, it raised a general sedition, from the necessity to which it reduced private persons, of restoring many things they were not willing to be deprived of. Thus, no farther mention was made of peace, and the war began again.

Quintius was now resolved to carry on the siege with great vigour, and began by examining very attentively the situation and condition of the city. Sparta had been a long time without walls; disdain- ing every other kind of fortification than the bravery of its citizens. Walls had been built in Sparta only since the tyrants governed it; and those alone in places which lay open, and were easy of access: all the other parts were defended only by their natural situation, and by bodies of troops posted in them. As Quintius's army was very numerous (consisting of above 50,000 men, because he had sent for all the land as well as naval forces,) he resolved to make it extend quite round the city, and to attack it at the same time on all sides, in order to strike the inhabitants with terror, and render them incapable of knowing on which side to turn themselves. Accordingly, the city being attacked on all sides at the same instant, and the danger being every where equal, the tyrant did know how to act, what orders to give, or to which quarter to send succours, and was quite distracted.

The Lacedæmonians sustained for some time the attacks of the besiegers, as long as they fought in defiles and narrow places. Their darts and javelins did little execution, because, as they pressed on one another, they could not stand firm on their feet, and had not their arms at liberty to discharge them with strength. The Romans drawing near the city, found themselves on a sudden overwhelmed with stones and tiles, thrown at them from the house tops. However, laying their shields over their heads, they came forward in the form of the testudo, or tortoise, by which they were entirely covered from the darts and tiles: when the Romans advanced into the broader streets, the Lacedæmonians being no longer able to sustain their efforts, nor make head against them, fled and withdrew to the most craggy and rugged eminences. Nabis, imagining the city was taken, was greatly perplexed how to make his escape. But one of his chief commanders saved the city, by setting fire to such edifices as were near the wall. The houses were soon in flames: the fire spread on all sides; and the smoke alone was capable of stopping the enemy. Such as were without the city, and attacked the wall, were forced to move to a distance from it; and those who were got into the city, fearing that the spreading of the flames would cut off their communication, retired to their troops. Quintius then caused a retreat to be sounded; and, after having almost taken the city, was obliged to march his troops back into the camp.

The three following days he took advantage of the terror with which he had filled the inhabitants, sometimes by making new attacks, and at other times by stopping up different places with works; in order that the besieged might have no opportunity to escape, but be lost to all hopes. Nabis, seeing things desperate, deputed Pythagoras to Quintius, to treat of an accommodation. The Roman general refused at first to hear him, and commanded him to leave the camp. But the petitioner, throwing himself at his feet, after many entreaties, at last obtained a truce upon the same conditions as had been prescribed before. Accordingly the money was paid, and the hostages delivered to Quintius.

While these things were doing, the Argives, who from the repeated accounts they had one after another, imagined that Lacedæmon was taken, restored themselves to liberty, by driving out their garrison. Quintius, after granting Nabis a peace, and taking leave of Eumenes, the Rhodians, and his brother, (who returned to their respective fleets,) repaired to Argos, whose inhabitants he found in incredible transports of joy. The Nemæan games, which could not be celebrated at the usual time because of the war, had been put off till the arrival of the Roman general and his army. He performed all the honours of them, and distributed the prizes; or rather, he himself was the show. The Argives, especially, could not take off their eyes from a man, who had undertaken that war merely on their account, had freed them from a cruel and ignominious slavery, and restored them to their ancient liberty.

The Achæans were greatly pleased to see the city of Argos again united to their league, and restored to all its privileges: but Sparta being still enslaved and a tyrant suffered in the midst of Greece, gave an alloy to their joy, and rendered it less perfect.

With regard to the Ætolians, it may be affirmed that the peace granted to Nabis was their triumph. From the time of that shameful and inglorious treaty, (for so they called it,) they exclaimed in all places against the Romans. They observed, that in the war against Philip, the Romans had not laid down their arms, till after they had forced that prince to evacuate all the cities of Greece: that here, on the contrary, the usurper was maintained in the peaceable possession of Sparta; whilst the lawful king, (meaning Agesipolis,) who had served under the proconsul, and so many illustrious citizens of Sparta, were condemned to pass the remainder of their days in banishment: in a word, that the Romans had made themselves the tyrant's guards and protectors. The Ætolians, in these complaints, confined their views solely to the advantages of liberty: but in great affairs, men should have an eye to all things, should content themselves with what they can execute with success, and not attempt a thousand schemes at once. Such were the motives of Quintius, as he himself will show hereafter.

Quintius returned from Argos to Elatia, from whence he had set out to carry on the war with Sparta. He spent the whole winter in administering justice to the people, in reconciling cities and private families, in regulating the government, and establishing order in all places; things which, properly speaking, are the real fruits of peace, the most glorious employment of a conqueror, and a certain proof of a war's being undertaken on just and reasonable motives. The ambassadors of Nabis being arrived at Rome, demanded and obtained a ratification of the treaty.

In the beginning of the spring, Quintius went to Corinth, where he A. M. 3810.
had convened a general assembly of Ant. J. C. 194.
the deputies of all the cities. There he represented to them the joy and ardour with which the Romans had complied with the entreaties of the Greeks when they implored their succour; and had made an alliance with them, which he hoped neither side would have occasion to repent. He gave an account, in few words, of the actions and enterprises of the Roman generals his predecessors; and mentioned his own with a modesty of expression that heightened their merit. He was heard with universal applause, except when he began to speak of Nabis; on which occasion, the assembly, by a modest murmur, discovered their grief and surprise, that the deliverer of Greece should have left, in so renowned a city as Sparta, a tyrant not only insupportable to his own country, but formidable to all the rest of the cities.

Quintius, who was not ignorant of the disposition of people's minds with regard to him, thought proper to give an account of his conduct in a few words. He confessed, that no accommodation ought to have been made with the tyrant, could this have been done without hazarding the entire destruction of Sparta. But as there was reason to fear, that this considerable city would be involved in the same ruin with Nabis, he therefore had thought it more prudent to let the tyrant live, weakened and incapable of doing harm, as he now was, than perhaps to run the hazard, should they employ too violent remedies, of destroying the city, and that by the very endeavours employed to deliver it.

He added to what he had said of past transactions, that he was preparing to set out for Italy, and to carry with him the whole army thither: that before ten days were elapsed, they should hear that the garrisons of Demetrias and Chalcis were withdrawn, and that he would before their eyes surrender to the Achæans the citadel of Corinth: that this would show, whether the Romans or Ætolians were most worthy of belief: whether the latter had the least foundation for the report they spread universally, that nothing could be of more dangerous consequence to a people, than to trust the Romans with their liberties; and that they only shifted the yoke, in accepting that republic for their master, instead of the Macedonians. He concluded with saying, that it was well known the Ætolians were not over prudent and discreet either in their words or actions.

He hinted to the other cities, that they ought to judge of their friends, not from words but actions; to be cautious whom they trusted, and against whom it was proper for them to guard. He exhorted them to use their liberty with moderation; that with this wise precaution, it was of the highest advantage to private persons as well as to cities; but that without moderation, it became a burden to others, and even pernicious to those who abused it; that the chief men in cities, the different orders that compose them, and the citizens themselves in general, should endeavour to preserve a perfect harmony; that so long as they should be united, neither kings or tyrants would be able to distress them; that discord and sedition opened a door to dangers and evils of every kind, because the party which finds itself weakest within, seeks for support without; and chooses rather to call in a foreign power to its aid, than submit to its fellow-citizens. He concluded his speech with conjuring them in the mildest and most gentle terms, to preserve and maintain by their prudent conduct, the liberty which they owed to foreign arms; and to make the Romans sensible, that in restoring them to their freedom, they had not afforded their protection and beneficence to persons unworthy of it.

This counsel was received as the advice of a father to his children. Whilst he spoke in this manner, the whole assembly wept for joy, and Quintius himself could not refrain from tears. A gentle murmur expressed the sentiments of all that were present. They gazed upon one another with admiration; and every one exhorted his neighbour to receive, with gratitude and respect, the words of the Roman general, as so many oracles, and imprint the remembrance of them deeply on their hearts.

After this, Quintius causing silence to be made, desired that they would inquire strictly after such Roman citizens as might still remain in slavery in Greece, and send them to him in Thessaly in two months; adding that it would ill become them to leave those in captivity to whom they were indebted for their freedom. All the people replied with the highest applauses, and thanked Quintius in particular, for hinting to them so just and indispensable a duty. The number of these slaves was very considerable. They were taken by Hannibal in the Punic war; but the Romans refusing to redeem them, they had been sold. It cost the Achæans alone 100 talents, that is 100,000 crowns, to reimburse the masters the price they had paid for the slaves, at the rate of about 12½ 10s. a head; consequently the number here amounted to 1200. The reader may form a judgment, in proportion, of all the rest of Greece. Before the assembly broke up, the garrison was seen marching down from the citadel, and afterwards out of the city. Quintius followed it soon after, and withdrew in the midst of the acclamations of the people, who called him their saviour and deliverer, and implored heaven to bestow all possible blessings upon him.

He withdrew in the same manner the garrisons from Chalcis and Demetrias, and was received in those cities with the like acclamations. From thence he went into Thessaly, where he found every thing in need of reformation, so general was the disorder and confusion.

At last he embarked for Italy, and upon his arrival at Rome entered it in triumph. The ceremony lasted three days, during which he exhibited to the people (amidst the other pomp) the precious spoils he had taken in the wars against Philip and Nabis. Demetrius, son of the former, and Armenes, of the latter, were among the hostages, and graced the victor's triumph. But the noblest ornament of it was the Roman citizens, delivered from slavery, who followed the victor's car, with their heads shaved as a mark of the liberty to which they had been restored.

SECTION V.—UNIVERSAL PREPARATIONS FOR THE WAR BETWEEN ANTIOCHUS AND THE ROMANS. MUTUAL EMBASSIES AND INTERVIEWS ON BOTH SIDES, WHICH COME TO NOTHING. THE ROMANS SEND TROOPS AGAINST NABIS, WHO HAD INFERRED THE TREATY. PHILOPOMEN GAINS A VICTORY OVER HIM. THE ÆTOLIANS IMPORE THE ASSISTANCE OF ANTIOCHUS. NABIS IS KILLED. of all the Greeks, from a great part of Asia Minor, and from several kings. They were favourably received by the senate; but as the affairs of king Antiochus required a long examination, it was referred to Quintius and the commissioners who had been in Asia. The debates were carried on with great warmth on both sides. The ambassadors of the king were surprised, as their sovereign had sent them merely to conclude an alliance and friendship with the Romans, that the latter should pretend to prescribe laws to him as to a conquered monarch; and nominate those cities which he might keep, and such as he was to abandon. Quintius in concert with his colleagues, after a great many speeches and replies, declare to the king's ambassadors, that the Romans persisted in the resolution they had taken to deliver the Grecian cities of Asia, as they had done those of Europe; and that the ambassadors might see whether Antiochus would approve of that condition. They answered, that they could not enter into any engagement that tended to lessen the dominions of their sovereign. On the morrow, all the rest of the ambassadors were again introduced into the senate. Quintius reported what had been spoken and transacted in the conference, and entreated each of them in particular, to inform their respective cities, that the Romans were determined to defend their liberties against Antiochus, with the same ardour and courage as they had done against Philip. Antiochus's ambassadors conjured the senate not to form any rash resolution in an affair of so much importance; to allow the king time to reflect on matters; and to weigh and consider things maturely on their side, before they passed a decree, in which the tranquillity of the whole world would be involved. They did not yet come to a decision, but deputed to the king Sulpitius, Villius, and Elius, the same ambassadors who had already conferred with him at Lysimachia.

Scarce were they gone, when ambassadors from Carthage arrived at Rome, and acquainted the senate that Antiochus, the insignificant of Egypt, was certainly preparing to make war against the Romans.

1 Five hundred denarii.

I have observed before, that Hannibal had fled for refuge to this prince, and had arrived at his court at the very instant the king was deliberating whether he should embark in this war. The presence and counsels of such a general contributed very much to determine him to it. His opinion at that time, (and he always persisted in it,) was, that he ought to carry his arms into Italy: that by this means the enemy's country would furnish them with troops and provisions; that otherwise, no prince nor people could be superior to the Romans, and that Italy could never be conquered but in Italy. He demanded but 100 galleys, 10,000 foot, and 1000 horse. He declared that with this fleet he would first go into Africa, where he hoped to be able to persuade the Carthaginians to join him; but that, should he not succeed, he would sail directly for Italy, and there find effectual means to distress the Romans: that it was necessary that the king should go over into Europe with the rest of the forces, and halt in some part of Greece, and not go immediately into Italy, though he should always seem upon the point of doing it.

The king highly approving this project at first, Hannibal sent a Tyrian, in whom he could confide, to Carthage, to sound the citizens: for he did not dare to venture letters, lest they should be intercepted; not to mention that business is transacted much better by word of mouth than by writing. But the Tyrian was discovered, and escaped with great difficulty. The Carthaginian senate sent immediate advice of this to the Romans, who apprehended being engaged at the same time in a war with Antiochus and the Carthaginians.

No people, at this time, hated the Romans more than the Ætolians. Thoms, their general, was for ever incensing them; representing, in the most aggravating terms, the contempt the Romans had for them since their last victory, though it was chiefly owing to them. His remonstrances had the intended effect; and Damocritus was sent ambassador to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicearchus, Thoms's brother, to Antiochus, charged with particular instructions in regard to each of those princes.

The first represented to the tyrant of Sparta, that the Romans had entirely enervated his power, by dispossessing him of his maritime towns, as they furnished him with galleys, soldiers, and sailors; that, confined within his own walls, he had the mortification to see the Achæans reign over Peloponnesus: that he would never have so favourable an opportunity for recovering his ancient power as that which then presented itself: that the Romans had no army in Greece: that he might easily seize upon Gythium, which was situated very commodiously for him: and that the Romans would not think it worth while to send their legions again into Greece, on account of the capture of a city of so little consequence.

Nicander employed still stronger motives to rouse Philip, who had been thrown down from a much superior height of greatness, and deprived of abundantly more than the tyrant. Besides which he enlarged on the ancient glory of the kings of Macedonia, and the conquest of the whole world by their arms; that the proposal he made him would not expose him to any danger; that he did not desire him to declare war, till Antiochus should have passed into Greece with his army; and that if he, (Philip,) unassisted by Antiochus, had, with only his own forces, sustained so long a war against the Romans and the Ætolians united, how would it be possible for the Romans to resist him, when he should have both Antiochus and the Ætolians as allies? He did not forget to mention Hannibal, the sworn enemy to the Romans, of whose generals more had been defeated by him than were living at that time.

Dicearchus employed other arguments with Antiochus. He observed particularly, that in the war against Philip, the Romans had taken the spoils, but that the whole honour of the victory had been due to the Ætolians; that they alone had opened them an entrance into Greece, and had enabled them to overcome the enemy, by aiding them with their troops. He gave a long detail of the number of horse and foot with which they would furnish him; and the strong towns and sea-ports possessed by them. He did not scruple to affirm, though without foundation, that Philip and Nabis were determined to unite with him against the Romans.

These are the steps the Ætolians took, to raise up enemies against Rome on every side. However, the two kings did not comply with them at that time; and did not take their resolution till afterwards.

With regard to Nabis, he sent immediately to all the maritime towns, to excite the inhabitants of them to a rebellion. He bribed many of the principal citizens, and secretly despatched those who were inflexibly determined to adhere to the party of the Romans. Quintus, at his leaving Greece, had ordered the Achæans to be very vigilant in defending the maritime cities. They immediately sent deputies to the tyrant to put him in mind of the treaty he had concluded with the Romans; and to exhort him not to infringe a peace which he had so earnestly solicited. At the same time they sent troops to the relief of Gythium, which the tyrant had already besieged; and ambassadors to Rome, to inform the senate and people of what was doing.

Antiochus did not yet declare himself openly, but took secret measures for promoting the great design he meditated. He thought it advisable to strengthen himself by good alliances with his neighbours. In this view, he went to Raphia, a frontier city of Palestine towards Egypt. He there gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to Ptolemy Epiphanes; and resigned to that prince, as her dowry, the provinces of Coele-syria and Palestine, but upon condition, as had been before stipulated, that he should himself receive half the revenues.

At his return to Antioch, he gave another daughter Antiochia by name, in marriage to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. He would have been very glad to have bestowed the third on Eumenes king of Pergamus; but that prince refused her, contrary to the advice of his three brothers, who believed that an alliance with so great a monarch would be a great support to their house. However, Eumenes soon convinced them, by the reasons he gave, that he had examined that affair more deliberately than they. He represented, that should he marry Antiochus's daughter, he would be under a necessity of espousing his interest against the Romans, with whom he plainly saw this monarch would soon be at variance: that should the Romans get the better (as it was highly probable they would,) he should be involved in the same ruin with the vanquished king, which would infallibly prove his destruction: that, on the other side, should Antiochus have the advantage in this war, the only benefit that he (Eumenes) could reap by it, would be, that having the honour to be his son-in-law, he should be one of the first to become his slave. For they might be assured that should Antiochus get the better of the Romans in this war, he would subject all Asia, and oblige all princes to do him homage: that they should have much better terms from the Romans: and therefore he was resolved to continue attached to their interests. The event showed that Eumenes was not mistaken.

After these marriages, Antiochus went with great diligence into Asia Minor, and arrived at Ephesus in the depth of winter. He set out from thence again in the beginning of the spring to punish the Pisidians, who were inclined to revolt; after having sent his son into Syria, for the security of the provinces in the East.

I have said above, that the Romans had deputed Sulpitius, Ælius, and Villius, on an embassy to Antiochus. They had been ordered to go first to the court of Eumenes, and accordingly they went to Pergamus, the capital of his kingdom. That prince told them, that he desired nothing so much as that war should be declared against Antiochus. In times of peace, the having so powerful a king in his neighbourhood gave him very just alarm. In case of a war, he did not doubt but Antiochus would experience the same fate as Philip, and thereby either be entirely ruined, or, should the Romans grant him a peace, Eumenes assured himself that part of his spoils and fortresses would be given him, which would enable him to defend himself, without any foreign aid, against his attacks: that, after all, should things take a different turn, he had rather run the worst hazard in concert with the Romans, than to be exposed, by breaking with them, to submit either voluntarily, or through force, to Antiochus.

Sulpitius being left sick in Pergamus, Villius, who had received advice that Antiochus was engaged in the war of Pisidia, went to Ephesus, where he found Hannibal. He had several conferences with him, in which he endeavoured, but in vain, to persuade him, that he had no reason to be under any apprehensions from the Romans. He had better success in the design he proposed, by treating Hannibal with great courtesy, and making him frequent visits; which was, by such conduct, to render him suspected to the king; which accordingly happened, as we shall soon see.

Livy, on the authority of some historians, relates that Scipio was on this embassy, and that it was at this time that Hannibal made him the celebrated answer I have related elsewhere,¹ when speaking of the most illustrious generals, he gave the first place to Alexander, the second to Pyrrhus, and the third to himself. Some authors look upon this embassy of Scipio as improbable, and the answer of Hannibal to be more so.

Villius went from Ephesus to Apamea, whither Antiochus repaired, after having ended the war against the Pisidians. In their interview they spoke on much the same topics as those on which the king's ambassadors had debated with Quintus in Rome. Their conferences broke off, on that prince's receiving advice of the death of Antiochus, his eldest son. He returned to Ephesus to lament his loss. But notwithstanding these specious appearances of affliction, it was generally believed that his show of grief was merely political; and that he himself had sacrificed him to his ambition. He was a young prince of the greatest hopes, and had already given such shining proofs of wisdom, goodness, and other royal virtues, as had secured to him the love and esteem of all who knew him. It was pretended that the old king, growing jealous of him, had sent him from Ephesus into Syria, under the pretext of having an eye to the security of the provinces of the East; and that he had caused some eunuchs to poison him there, to rid himself of his fears. A king, and at the same time a father, ought not to be suspected of so horrid a crime, without the strongest and most evident proofs.

Villius, that he might not be importunate at a time of mourning and sorrow, was returned to Pergamus, where he found Sulpitius perfectly recovered. The king sent for them soon after. They had a conference with his minister, which ended in complaints on both sides; after which, they returned to Rome, without having concluded any thing.

The instant they were gone, Antiochus held a great council on the present affairs; in which every one exclaimed against the Romans, knowing that to be the best method of making their court to the king. They aggravated the haughtiness of their demands, and said it was strange, that they should attempt to prescribe laws to the greatest monarch of Asia, as if they were treating with a conquered Nabis. Alexander of Acarnania, who had great influence with the king, as if the matter in deliberation were, not whether they should make war, but how and in what manner they should carry it on, assured the king, that he would be infallibly victorious, in case he should cross into Europe, and settle in some part of Greece: that the Ætolians, who were in the centre of it, would be the first to declare against the Romans; that at the two extremities of this country, Nabis, on one side, to recover what he had lost, would raise all Peloponnesus against them; and that on the other, Philip, who was still more disgusted, would not fail at the first signal of war to take up arms also: that they had no time to lose: and that the decisive point was, to seize upon the most advantageous posts, and to make sure of allies. He added, that Hannibal ought to be sent immediately to Carthage, to perplex and employ the Romans.

Hannibal, whom his conferences with Villius had rendered suspected to the king, was not summoned to this council. He had perceived on several other occasions, that the king's friendship for him was very much cooled, and that he no longer reposed the same confidence in him. However, he had a private conference with him, in which he unbosomed himself without the least disguise. Speaking of his infant years, in which he had sworn on the altar to be the eternal enemy of the Romans: "It is this oath," says he, "it is this hatred, that prompted me to keep the sword drawn during thirty-six years; it was the same animosity that occasioned my being banished from my country in a time of peace, and forced me to seek an asylum in your dominions. If you defeat my hopes, guided by the same hatred, which can never expire but with my life, I will fly to every part of the world where there are soldiers and arms, to raise up enemies against the Romans. I hate them, and am hated by them. As long as you shall resolve to make war against them, you may consider Hannibal as the first of your friends; but if there are any motives which incline you to peace, take counsel of others, not of me." Antiochus, struck with these words, seemed to restore him his confidence and friendship.

The ambassadors being returned to Rome, it appeared evident from their report, that a war with Antiochus was inevitable, but they did not think it yet time to proclaim it against him. They did not act so cautiously with regard to Nabis, who had been the first to violate the treaty, and was then actually besieging Gythium, and laying waste the territories of the Achæans. Acilius, the pretor, was sent with a fleet into Greece, to protect the allies.

Philopemen was general of the Achæans that year.² He was not inferior to any captain with respect to land service, but had no skill in naval affairs. Notwithstanding this, he took upon himself the command of the Achæan fleet,³ flattering himself that he should be as successful by sea as he had been by land: but he learned, to his cost, not to depend so much upon his own judgment, and found how greatly useful experience is on all occasions; for Nabis, who had fitted out some vessels with expedition, defeated Philopemen, and he narrowly escaped being taken prisoner. This disaster however did not discourage him, but only made him more prudent and circumspect for the future. Such is the use judicious men ought to make of their errors, which, by that means, are frequently more advantageous to them than the greatest successes. Nabis triumphed now, but Philopemen trusted to make his joy of short duration. Accordingly, a few days after, having surprised him when he least expected him, he set fire to his camp, and made a great slaughter of his troops. In the mean time Gythium surrendered, which very much augmented the pride and haughtiness of the tyrant.

Philopemen saw plainly that it was necessary to come to a battle. In this lay his chief talent, and no general equalled him in drawing up an army, in making choice of fit posts, in taking all advantages, and profiting by all the errors of an enemy. On this oc-passion, fired by jealousy, and animated with revenge against Nabis, he employed all his ability in the art of war. The battle was fought not far from Sparta. In the first attack, the auxiliary forces of Nabis, which formed his greatest strength, broke the Achæans, threw them into disorder, and forced them to give way. It was by Philopœmen's order that they fled, to draw the enemy into ambuscades he had laid for them. Accordingly they fell headlong into them; and whilst they were shouting as victorious, those who fled faced about, and the Achæans charged them on a sudden from their ambuscades, and made a great slaughter. As the country was full of thickets, and very difficult for the cavalry to act in, from the rivulets and morasses with which it was intersected, the general would not suffer his troops to abandon themselves to their ardour, in pursuing the enemy; but causing a retreat to be sounded, he encamped on that very spot, though long before it was dark. As he was fully persuaded, that as soon as it should be night, the enemy would return from their flight, and retire towards the city in small parties, he posted ambuscades on all the passes round, on the rivulets and hills, who killed or took great numbers of them; so that Nabis hardly saved a fourth of his army. Philopœmen, having blocked him up in Sparta, ravaged Laconia for a month; and after having considerably weakened the forces of the tyrant, he returned home, laden with spoils and glory.

² The great prince of Condé thought and spoke much more wisely. In a conversation upon a sea-fight, the prince said, he should be very glad to see one, purely for his own instruction. A sea-officer who was present, replied, "Sir, were your highness in a sea-fight, there is no admiral but would be proud of obeying your orders." "My orders!" interrupted the prince, "I should not presume even to give my advice; but should stand quietly on the deck, and observe all the motions and operations of the battle, for my own instruction."

This victory did Philopœmen great honour, because it was manifestly owing solely to his prudence and ability. A circumstance is related of him, which is perhaps peculiar to him; and which young officers should propose to themselves as a model. Whenever he was upon a march, whether in times of peace or war, and came to any difficult pass, he halted, and asked himself (in case he were alone,) or else inquired of those who were with him, in what manner it would be necessary to act, in case the enemy should come suddenly upon them; if he charged them in front, flank, or rear; if he came on in order of battle; or in less order, as when an army is on its march; what post would it be proper for him to take? In what places to dispose of his baggage, and how many troops would be necessary to guard it? Whether it would be convenient for him to march forward, or to return back the way he came? Where to pitch his camp? Of what extent it ought to be? By what method he could best secure his forage, and provide water? What route he should take the next day, after he should decamp, and in what order it were best to march? He had accustomed himself so early, and exercised himself so much, in all these parts of military knowledge, that nothing was new to him; and he never was disconcerted by any unforeseen accident, but resolved and acted immediately as if he had foreseen every thing that happened. These things form the great captain; but the only method to be such, is to love one's profession, to think it an honour to succeed in it, to study it seriously, and to despise the common topics of discourse of the indolent and insignificant part of an army, who have neither elevation of mind, nor views of honour and glory.

During this expedition of the Achæans against Nabis, the Ætolians had sent ambassadors to Antiochus, to exhort him to cross into Greece. They not only promised to join him with all their forces, and to act in concert with him, but also assured him, that he might depend upon Philip king of Macedonia, on Nabis king of Lacedæmonia, and on several other Grecian powers, who hated the Romans in their hearts, and only awaited his arrival to declare against them. Thoas, the first of the ambassadors, expatiated upon all these advantages in the strongest and most pompous terms. He observed to him, that the Romans, by drawing their army out of Greece, had left it in a defenceless condition; that this would be the finest opportunity for him to possess himself of it; that all the Greeks would receive him with open arms; and that the instant he came among them, he would be master of the country. This flattering description of the state of the Grecian affairs made so deep an impression on him, that he could scarce give himself time to deliberate in what manner it would be most proper for him to act.

The Romans, on the other side, who were not ignorant of the measures taken by the Ætolians to disengage their allies from their interest, and increase their enemies on all sides, had sent ambassadors into Greece, among whom was Quintus. At his arrival he found all the nations very well disposed with regard to the Romans, except the Magnesians, who had been alienated from them, by the report which was spread of their intending to restore to Philip his son, who had been given to them as a hostage; and to deliver up to that monarch the city of Demetrias, which belonged to the Magnesians. It was necessary to undeceive them, but in so dexterous a manner as not to disgust Philip, whom it was much more their interest to oblige. This Quintus effected with great address. The author of these false reports was Eurylochus, at that time chief magistrate. As he let drop some harsh and injurious expressions against the Romans, which gave Quintus an opportunity of severely reproaching the Magnesians with their ingratitude; Zeno, one of the oldest among them, directed himself to Quintus and the rest of the ambassadors, with tears conjured them not to impute to a whole people the rancour of one man, who, he said, ought alone to be answerable for it: that the Magnesians were obliged to Quintus and the Romans, not only for their liberty, but for whatever else is most dear and valuable among men: that as for themselves, they would sooner part with their lives than renounce the friendship of the Romans, and forget the obligations they owed to them. The whole assembly applauded this speech, and Eurylochus, perceiving plainly that there was no longer any safety for him in the city, took refuge among the Ætolians.

Thoas, the chief man of that people, was returned from Antiochus's court, from whence he had brought Menippus, whom the king had sent as his ambassador to the Ætolians. Before the general assembly was convened, these two had endeavoured, in concert, to prepare and prepossess the people, by exaggerating the king's forces by sea and land; his numerous bodies of horse and foot; the elephants he had caused to be brought from India; and above all (which was the strongest motive with regard to the populace) the immense treasures which the king would bring with him, sufficient to buy even the Romans themselves.

Quintus had regular notice sent him of whatever was said or done in Ætolia. Though he looked upon all things as lost on that side, yet, that he might have nothing to reproach himself with, and to lay the blame still more on the side of the Ætolians, he thought proper to depute to their assembly some ambassadors from the confederates, to put them in mind of their alliance with the Romans, and to be ready to reply freely to whatever Antiochus's ambassador might advance. He gave this commission to the Athenians; the dignity of their city, and their former alliance with the Ætolians, making them more proper to execute it than any other people.

Thoas opened the assembly, by announcing that an ambassador was arrived from Antiochus. Being introduced, he began with saying, that it would have been happy for the Greeks, as well as Asiatics, had Antiochus concerned himself sooner in their affairs, and before Philip had been reduced; that then every people would have preserved their rights, and all would not have been subjected to the Roman power. "But still," says he, "If you execute the designs you have formed, Antiochus may, by the assistance of the gods and your aid, restore the affairs of Greece to their ancient splendour, how desperate soever their condition may be."

The Athenians, who were next admitted to audience, contented themselves (without saying a word of the king) with putting the Ætolians in mind of the alliance they had concluded with the Romans; and the service Quintus had done to all Greece; conjuring them not to form any rash resolution in an affair of so much importance as that in question: that bold resolutions, adopted with heat and viracity might have a pleasing prospect at first, but that the difficulty of putting them in execution appeared afterwards, and that they were very rarely successful: that the Roman ambassadors, among whom was Quintus, were not far off: that as things were still undecided, it would show more wisdom to weigh and examine deliberately, in peaceable interviews, their several claims and pretensions, than to involve precipitately Europe and Asia in a war, of which the consequences could not but be deplorable.

The populace, who are ever greedy of novelty, were entirely for Antiochus, and were even against admitting the Romans into the assembly; so that the oldest and wisest among them were forced to employ all their influence, before they could prevail to have them called in. Accordingly Quintus came thither not so much from any hopes he entertained of being able to make the least impression on minds so prejudiced, as to prove to all mankind, that the Ætoliens were the sole cause of the war which was going to break out; and that the Romans would be forced to engage in it against their will, and merely through necessity. He began, by recalling to their memories the time in which the Ætoliens had concluded an alliance with the Romans; he made a transient mention of the many points in which they had infringed it; and after saying very little with regard to the cities which were the pretext of their quarrel, he only observed, that if they imagined themselves aggrieved, it would appear much more reasonable to make their remonstrances to the senate, who were always ready to hear their complaints, than out of mere wantonness to kindle a war between the Romans and Antiochus, which would disturb the peace of the universe, and infallibly terminate in the ruin of those who promoted it.

The event proved the truth of his representations, which however were disregarded at that time. Thoa, and those of his faction, were heard with great attention; and obtained without delay, and even in the presence of the Romans, that a decree should be made, to invite Antiochus to come and deliver Greece, and be the arbiter of the differences between the Ætoliens and Romans. Quintus desiring a copy of this decree, Damocritus (then in office) was so inconsiderate as to answer in the most insolent tone, that he had business of much greater consequence upon his hands at that time; but that he himself would soon carry this decree into Italy, and encamp on the banks of the Tiber: so violent and furious a spirit had seized all the Ætoliens, and even their principal magistrates. Quintus and the rest of the ambassadors returned to Corinth.

The Ætoliens, in a private council, formed in one day three very astonishing resolutions; to seize, by a treacherous stratagem, Demetrias, Chalcis, and Lacedæmon; and three of the principal citizens were charged with the execution of these three expeditions.

Diocles set out for Demetrias, where, being assisted by the faction of Eurylochus, who was an exile, but appeared then at the head of the forces which Diocles had brought, he made himself master of the city.

But Thoa was not so successful in Chalcis, which he had imagined he should be able to seize by the help of an exile: for the magistrates, who were strongly attached to the Romans, having received advice of the attempt that was meditating against their city, put it in a good posture of defence, and secured it against all attacks. Thus Thoa, failing in his design, returned back in the utmost confusion.

The enterprise against Sparta was much more delicate, and of greater importance. No access could be had to it, but under the mask of friendship. Nabis had long solicited the aid of the Ætoliens. Alexamenes was therefore ordered to march 1000 foot thither. To these were added thirty young men, the flower of the cavalry, who were strictly enjoined by the magistrates to execute punctually their leader's orders, of what nature soever they might be. The tyrant received Alexamenes with great joy. Both used to march out their troops every day, and exercise them in the plain on the side of the Eurotas. One day Alexamenes, having given the word to his troopers, attacks Nabis, whom he had purposely drawn into a solitary place, and throws him from his horse. Immediately all the troopers fall on, and cover him with wounds. Alexamenes, without losing time, returns to the city to seize on Nabis's palace. Had he convened the assembly that instant and made a speech suitable to the occasion, his business would have been done, and Sparta had declared for the Ætoliens: but he spent the remainder of the day, and the whole night, in searching after the tyrant's treasures, and his troops, by his example, began to plunder the city. The Spartans taking up arms, make a great slaughter of the Ætoliens dispersed in quest of booty, and march directly to the palace, where they kill Alexamenes, whom they found with little or no guard, and solely intent upon securing his rich spoils. Such was the result of the enterprise against Sparta.

Philopœmen, general of the Achæans, no sooner heard of Nabis's death, than he marched a considerable body of troops towards Sparta, where he found all things in the utmost disorder. He assembled the principal citizens, made a speech to them, as Alexamenes ought to have done, and prevailed so far between arguments and compulsion, that he engaged that city to join in the Achæan league.

This success greatly increased the reputation of Philopœmen with those states; his having brought over to the league a city of so great power and authority as Sparta, being justly esteemed a service of no small importance. By this means he also gained the friendship and confidence of the worthiest men in Lacedæmonia, who hoped he would prove their guarantee, and the defender of their liberty. For this reason, after the palace and furniture of Nabis had been sold, they resolved, by a public decree, to make him a present of the moneys arising from that sale, amounting to 120 talents; and sent him a deputation to desire his acceptance of them.

On this occasion, says Plutarch, it was very evident, that the virtue of this great personage was of the purest and most perfect kind; and that he not only appeared a good and virtuous man, but was really such: for not one of the Spartans would undertake the commission of offering him that present. Struck with veneration and fear, they all excused themselves; and therefore it was at last resolved to send Timolaus, who had formerly been his guest.

When he arrived at Megalopolis, he lodged at the house of Philopœmen, who gave him the kindest reception. Here he had an opportunity of considering the gravity of his whole conduct, the greatness of his sentiments, the frugality of his life, and the regularity of his manners, that rendered him invincible and incorruptible by money. Timolaus was so astonished at all he saw, that he did not dare so much as to mention to Philopœmen the present he was come to offer him; so that, giving some other pretence to his journey, he returned as he came. Timolaus was sent again, but was not more successful than before. At last, going a third time, he ventured (but with great reluctance) to acquaint Philopœmen with the good will of the Spartans.

Philopœmen heard him with great tranquillity; but the instant he had done speaking, he went to Sparta; where, after expressing the highest gratitude to the Spartans, he advised them not to lay out their money in bribing and corrupting such of their friends as were men of probity, because they might always enjoy the benefit of their virtue and wisdom without expence to themselves; but to keep their gold to purchase and corrupt the wicked, and those who, in councils, perplexed and divided the city by their seditious discourses; in order that, being paid for their silence, they might not occasion so many distractions in the government. "For it is much more advisable," added he, "to stop an enemy's mouth, than that of a friend." Such was the disinterestedness of Philopœmen. Let the reader compare these great and noble sentiments with the baseness of those grovelling wretches whose whole study is to heap up riches.

Thoas had repaired to the court of Antiochus, and by the mighty promises he made that prince, by all he told him concerning the present state of Greece, and especially of the resolutions which had been taken in the general assembly of the Ætolians, he engaged him to set out immediately for that country. He went with such precipitation, that he did not give himself time to concert the necessary measures for so important a war, nor carry with him a sufficient number of troops. He left behind him Lampsacus, Tross, and Smyrna, three powerful cities, which he ought to have reduced before he declared war; but Antiochus, without waiting for the troops that were marching to join him from Syria and the East, brought only 10,000 foot and 500 horse. These troops would hardly have sufficed, had he been to possess himself only of a naked and defenceless country, without having so formidable an enemy as the Romans to oppose.

He arrived first at Demetrias; and from thence, after receiving the decree which had been sent by the Ætolians and their ambassador, he went to Lania, where their assembly was held. He was received there with the highest demonstrations of joy. He began with apologizing for his being come with much fewer troops than they expected; insinuating that his expedition was a proof of the zeal he had for their interest, since, at the first signal they gave him, he was come, notwithstanding the inclemency of the season, and without waiting till all things were ready; but that their expectations should soon be answered: that as soon as the season for navigation should arrive, they should see all Greece filled with arms, men, and horses, and all the sea-coasts covered with galleys: that he would spare neither expense, pains, nor danger, for the deliverance of Greece, and to acquire for the Ætolians the first rank in it: that, with his numerous armies, there would arrive from Asia convoys of every kind: that all he desired of them was, only to provide his troops with whatever might be necessary for their present subsistence. Having ended his speech, he withdrew.

The most judicious in the assembly saw plainly that Antiochus, instead of an effectual and present succour, as he had promised, gave them little more than hopes and promises. They could have wished that they had chosen him only as an arbiter and mediator between them and the Romans, and not leader of the war. However, Thoas having gained a majority, caused Antiochus to be nominated generalissimo. Thirty of their principal men were appointed for his council whenever he should think proper to deliberate with them.

SECTION VI.—ANTIOCHUS ENDEAVOURS TO BRING OVER THE ACHEANS TO HIS INTEREST, BUT IN VAIN. HE POSSESSES HIMSELF OF CHALCIS AND ALL EUBÆA. THE ROMANS PROCLAIM WAR AGAINST HIM, AND SEND MANIUS ACILIUS THE CONSUL INTO GREECE. ANTIOCHUS MAKES AN ILL USE OF HANNIBAL'S COUNSEL.—HE IS DEFEATED NEAR THERMOPYLÆ. THE ÆTOLIANS SUBMIT TO THE ROMANS.

THE first subject on which the Ant. J. C. 191. king and the Ætolians deliberated was, with what enterprise they should begin. It was thought advisable to make a second attempt on Chalcis; and thereupon the troops set out for that city without loss of time. When they were near it, the king permitted the principal Ætolians to have a conference with such citizens of Chalcis as were come out of it on their arrival. The Ætolians urged them in the strongest terms to conclude an alliance with Antiochus, but without breaking their treaty with the Romans. They declared, that this prince was come into Greece, not to make it the seat of war, but actually to deliver it, and not merely in words as the Romans had done: that nothing could be of greater advantage to the cities of Greece, than to live in amity with both those powers, because that the one would always defend them against the other, and that by these means they would hold both in respect: that they would do well to consider, in case they should not agree to the proposal now made them, the great danger to which they would expose themselves, as the aid they might expect from the Romans was at a great distance, whereas the king was present and at their gates.

Miction, one of the principal citizens of Chalcis, replied, that he could not guess what people it was that Antiochus came to deliver, and for whose sake he had left his kingdom, and was come into Greece: that he knew of no city garrisoned by Roman soldiers, nor that paid the least tribute to the Romans, or complained of being oppressed by them: that as for the inhabitants of Chalcis, they had no occasion for a deliverer, as they were free; nor of a defender, as they enjoyed the sweets of peace, under the protection, and with the amity, of the Romans: that they did not refuse the amity, either of the king or of the Ætolians; but that, if they would show themselves friends, the first thing they were desired to do was, to leave their island; that they were fully determined, neither to admit them into their city, nor to make any alliance with them, but in concert with the Romans.

When this answer was reported to the king, as he had brought but few troops, and was not able to force the city, he resolved to return to Demetrias. So imprudent and ill-concerted a first step did him no honour, and was no good omen with regard to the future.

They now addressed themselves to another quarter, and endeavoured to bring over the Achæans and Athamanians. The former gave audience to the ambassadors of Antiochus and those of the Ætolians, at Æge, where their assembly was held, in presence of Quintus the Roman general.

Antiochus's ambassador spoke first. He was a vain man (as those generally are who live in the courts and at the expense of princes;)¹ and fancying himself a great orator, he spoke with an imposing and emphatical tone of voice. He told them, that an innumerable body of cavalry was passing the Hellespont into Europe, consisting partly of cuirassiers, and partly of bowmen, who even when they were flying on horseback, turned about, and discharged their arrows with the surest aim. To this cavalry, which, according to him, was able by itself to overwhelm the united forces of Europe, he added a more numerous infantry; the Dahæ, the Medes, the Elymæans, the Cadusians, and many other terrible unknown nations. With regard to the fleet, he affirmed that it would be so large, that no harbour of Greece could contain it; the right wing was to be composed of Tyrians and Sidonians; the left of Aradians and the Sidetes of Pamphylia; nations who were allowed universally to be the best and most experienced mariners in the world: that it would be to no purpose to enumerate the immense sums which Antiochus was bringing with him, every one knowing that the kingdoms of Asia had always abounded in gold: that they were to judge, in proportion, of the rest of the military preparations: that consequently the Romans would not now have to do with a Philip or a Hannibal; the latter being only a citizen of Carthage, and the former confined within the narrow limits of Macedonia; but with a prince who was sovereign of all Asia and part of Europe; that nevertheless, though he was come from the most remote parts of the East, purely to restore the liberty of Greece, he did not require any article from the Achæans, that should interfere with the fidelity they might imagine they owed the Romans, their first friends and allies: that he did not desire them to unite their arms with his against that people, but only to stand neuter, and not declare for either party.

Archidamus, the Ætolian ambassador, spoke to the same effect; adding, that the safest and wisest course the Achæans could take, would be, to remain mere spectators of the war, and to wait in peace for the event, without sharing in it, or incurring any hazard. Then growing warmer as he went on, he threw out invectives and reproaches against the Romans in general, and against Quintius in particular. He called them an ungrateful people, who had forgotten that they owed to the bravery of the Ætolians not only the victory they had gained over Philip, but their general's life, and the safety of their army. For what, continued he, did Quintius do in this battle, worthy a great captain? He declared, that he himself had observed him during the engagement wholly employed in consulting the auspices, in sacrificing victims, and offering up vows, like an augur, or a priest, whilst himself was exposing his person and life to the enemy's darts, for his defence and preservation.

To this Quintius answered, that it was plain which party Archidamus had studied to please by this speech; that knowing the Achæans were perfectly acquainted with the disposition and character of the Ætolians, whose courage consisted solely in words, not in actions, he had not endeavoured to conciliate their esteem, but had studied to ingratiate himself with the king's ambassadors, and, by their means, with the king himself; that if the world had not known till now, what it was that had formed the alliance between Antiochus and the Ætolians, the speeches made by the ambassadors showed it visibly enough, that on both sides, nothing but boasting and falsehood had been employed: that by vaunting of troops which they did not possess, they seduced and puffed up the vanity of each other by false promises and vain hopes; the Ætolians asserting boldly on one side (as you have just now heard) that they had defeated Philip, and preserved the Romans; and that all the cities of Greece were ready to declare for Ætolia; and the king, on the other side, affirming, that he was going to bring into the field innumerable bodies of horse and foot, and to cover the sea with his fleet. "This," says he, "puts me in mind of an entertainment given me in Chalcis, by a friend of mine, a very worthy man, who treats his guests in the best manner. Surprised at the prodigious quantity and variety of dishes that were served up, we asked him how it was possible for him, in the month of June, to get together so great a quantity of game. My friend, who was not vain-glorious like these people, only fell a laughing, and owned sincerely, that what we took for game was nothing but swine's flesh, seasoned several ways, and cooked up with different sauces. The same thing may be said of the king's troop which have been so highly extolled, and whose number has been vainly multiplied in mighty names. For these Dahse, Medes, Cadusians and Elymeans, are all but one nation, and a nation of slaves rather than of soldiers. Why may not I, Achæans, represent to you all the movements and expeditions of this great king, who one moment hurries to the assembly of the Ætoli-ans, there to beg for provisions and money; and the next goes in person to the very gates of Chalcis, from which he is obliged to retire with ignominy. Antiochus has very injudiciously given credit to the Ætoli-ans, and they, with as little judgment, have believed Antiochus. This ought to teach you not to suffer yourselves to be imposed upon, but to rely upon the good faith of the Romans, which you have so often experienced. I am surprised they can venture to tell you, that it will be safest for you to stand neuter, and to remain only spectators of the war. That would, indeed, be a sure method; I mean, to become the prey of the victor."

The Achæans were neither long nor divided in their deliberations, and the result was, that they should declare war against Antiochus and the Ætoli-ans. Immediately, at the request of Quintius, they sent 500 men to the aid of Chalcis, and the like number to Athens.

Antiochus received no greater satisfaction from the Bœotians, who answered, that they would deliberate upon what was to be done, when that prince should come into Bœotia.

In the mean time, Antiochus made a new attempt, and advanced to Chalcis with a much greater body of troops than before. And now the faction against the Romans prevailed, and the city opened its gates to him. The rest of the cities soon following their example, he made himself master of all Eubœa. He fancied he had made a great acquisition, in having reduced so considerable an island in his first campaign. But can that be called a conquest, where there are no enemies to make opposition?

But terrible ones were making preparations against that prince. A. M. 3813
The Romans, after consulting the Ant. J. C. 191.
will of the gods by omens and auspices, proclaimed war against Antiochus and his adherents. Processions were appointed during two days, to implore the aid and protection of the gods. They made a vow to solemnize the great games for ten days, in case they should be successful in the war, and to make offerings in all the temples of the gods. What a reproach should so religious, though blind a paganism, reflect on Christian generals, who should be ashamed of piety and religion!

At the same time they omitted no human means to their success. The senators and inferior magistrates were forbidden to remove to any distance from Rome, from which they could not return the same day; and five senators were not allowed to be absent from it at the same time. The love of their country took place of every thing. Acilius the consul, to whom Greece had fallen by lot, ordered his troops to assemble at Brundisium on the 15th of May; and set out from Rome himself some days before.

About the same time ambassadors from Ptolemy, Philip, the Carthaginians, and Masinissa, arrived there, to offer the Romans money, corn, men, and ships. The senate said, that the people of Rome thanked them, but would accept of nothing except the corn, and that upon condition of paying for it. They only desired Philip to assist the consul.

In the mean time Antiochus, after having solicited many cities, either by his envoys or in person, to enter into an alliance with him, went to Demetrias, and there held a council of war with the chief commanders of his army, on the operations of the campaign that was going to open. Hannibal, who was now restored to favour, was present at it, and his opinion was first asked. He began, by insisting on the paramount necessity of using the utmost endeavours to engage Philip in Antiochus's interest; which, he said, was so important a step, that if it succeeded, they might assure themselves of the success of the war. "And indeed," says he, "as Philip alone sustained so long the whole weight of the Roman power, what may not be expected from a war in which the two greatest kings of Europe and Asia will unite their forces; especially as the Romans will have those against them in it, who gave them the superiority before; I mean the Ætoli-ans and Athamanians, to whom alone, as is well known, they were indebted for victory. Now, who can doubt but Philip may easily be brought over from the Roman interest, if what Thoas has so often repeated to the king, in order to induce him to cross into Greece, be true, that this prince, highly incensed to see himself reduced to a shameful servitude under the name of peace waits only an opportunity to declare himself? And could he ever hope one more favourable than that which now offers itself?" If Philip should refuse to join Antiochus, Hannibal advised him to send his son Seleucus, at the head of the army he had in Thrace, to lay waste the frontiers of Macedonia, and by that means to render Philip incapable of assisting the Romans.

He insisted on a still more important point, and asserted, as he had always done, that it would be impossible to reduce the Romans, except in Italy; which had been his reason for always advising Antiochus to begin the war there: that since another course had been taken, and the king was at that time in Greece it was his opinion, in the present state of affairs, that the king ought to send immediately for all his troops out of Asia; and not rely on the Ætoli-ans, or his other allies of Greece, who possibly might fail him on a sudden: that the instant those forces should arrive, it would be proper to march towards those coasts of Greece which are opposite to Italy, and order his fleet to set sail thither also; that he should employ half of it to alarm and ravage the coast of Italy; and keep the other half in some neighbouring harbour, in order to seem upon the point of crossing into Italy; and actually to keep himself in readiness to do so, in case a favourable opportunity should present itself. By this means, said he, the Romans will be kept at home from the necessity of defending their own coast; and, at the same time, it will be the best method for carrying the war into Italy, the only place (in his opinion) where the Romans could be conquered. "These," concluded Hannibal, "are my thoughts, and if I am not so well qualified for presiding in another war, I ought at least to have learned, by my good and ill successes, how to act in the field against the Romans. My zeal and fidelity may be depended upon. As to the rest, I beseech the gods to prosper all your undertakings, whatsoever they may be."

The council could not but approve at that time of what Hannibal had said, and indeed it was the only good advice that could be given Antiochus in the present posture of his affairs. However, he complied only with the article which related to the troops of Asia; and immediately sent orders to Polyxenides, his admiral, to bring them over into Greece. With regard to all the rest of Hannibal's plan, his courtiers and flatterers diverted him from putting it in execution, by assuring him that he could not fail of being victorious; that should he follow Hannibal's plan, all the honour would be ascribed to Hannibal, because he had formed it: that the king ought to have all the glory of the war, and for that reason it was necessary for him to draw up another plan, without regarding that of the Carthaginian. In this manner are the best counsels frustrated, and the most powerful empires ruined.

The king, having joined the troops of the allies to his own, made himself master of several cities of Thessaly; he was however obliged to raise the siege of Larissa, Bebicus, the Roman prætor, having sent it a speedy aid, after which he retired to Demetrias.

From thence he went to Chalcis, where he fell distractedly in love with the daughter of the person at whose house he lodged. Though he was upwards of fifty, he was so passionately fond of that girl, who was not twenty, that he resolved to marry her. Forgetting the two great enterprises he had formed, the war against the Romans and the deliverance of Greece, he spent the rest of the winter in feasts and diversions on the occasion of his nuptials. This taste for pleasure soon communicated itself from the king to the whole court, and occasioned a universal neglect of military discipline.

He did not wake out of the lethargy into which this effeminate life had thrown him, till news was brought, that Acilius the consul was advancing towards him in Thessaly with the utmost diligence. Immediately the king set out; and finding at the place appointed for the rendezvous but a very small number of the confederate troops, whose officers told him, that it was impossible for them, though they had used their utmost endeavours, to bring more forces into the field; he then found, but too late, how much he had been imposed upon by the splendid promises of Thomas; and the truth of Hannibal's words, that it would not be safe for him to rely on the troops of such allies. All he could do at that time was, to seize the pass of Thermopylæ, and to send to the Ætolians for a reinforcement. Either the inclemency of the weather, or contrary winds, had prevented the arrival of the Asiatic forces, which Polyxenides was bringing, and the king had only those troops which he had brought the year before, which scarce exceeded 10,000 men.

Antiochus imagined he had provided sufficiently for his security against the Romans, who were advancing against him, by having seized the pass of Thermopylæ, and strengthening the natural fortifications of that place with intrenchments and walls. The consul came forward, determined to attack him.

Most of his officers and soldiers had been employed in the war against Philip. These he animated, by putting them in mind of the famous victory they had gained over that king, who was a much braver prince and infinitely more practised in military affairs, than Antiochus; who, being newly married, and enervated by pleasures and revelling, vainly fancied that war was to be carried on in the same manner as nuptials are solemnized. Acilius had despatched Cato, who acted under him as lieutenant, with a large detachment, in quest of some by-path that led to the hill above the enemy. Cato, after inexpressible fatigues, went over the mountains through the same path where Xerxes and Brennus afterwards opened themselves a passage; when falling suddenly on some soldiers, whom he met there, he soon put them to flight. Immediately he orders the trumpets to sound, and advances at the head of his detachment sword in hand, and with great shouts. A body of 600 Ætolians, who guarded some of the eminences, seeing him come down the mountains, take to flight, and retire towards their army, where they spread universal terror.

At the same instant the consul attacks Antiochus's intrenchments with all his troops, and forces them. The king, having his teeth shattered by a stone, was in such excessive pain, that he was forced to leave the field. After his retreat, no part of his army dared to stand their ground, and wait the coming up of the Romans. The rout now became general in a place where there were scarcely any outlets to escape through; for on one side they were stopped by deep fens, and on the other by craggy rocks; so that there was no getting off either on the right or left. The soldiers, however, crowding and pushing forward, to avoid the enemy's swords, threw one another into the morasses and down the precipices, in which manner a greater number of them perished.

After the battle was over, the consul embraced Cato a long time in his arms, who was still hot and out of breath; and cried out aloud, in the transports of his joy, that neither himself nor the Romans could ever reward his services as they deserved. Cato, who was now lieutenant-general under Acilius, had been consul, and had commanded the armies in Spain: but he did not think that the accepting of a subaltern employment for the service of his country, was any disgrace to him; and this was a frequent practice among the Romans. In the mean time the victorious army continued the pursuit, and cut to pieces all Antiochus's forces, 500 excepted, with whom he escaped to Chalcis.

Acilius sent Cato to Rome, with the news of this victory, and related in his letters how greatly his lieutenant had contributed to it. It is noble in a general to do justice in this manner to the merit of another, and not to suffer so mean a passion as jealousy to harbour in his heart. The arrival of Cato at Rome filled the citizens with a joy so much the greater, as they had been very apprehensive of the success of the war against so powerful and renowned a prince. Orders were thereupon given for public prayers and sacrifices to be offered up to the gods, by way of thanksgiving, for three days together.

The reader has doubtless often observed, with admiration, how careful the heathens were to begin and end all their wars with solemn acts of religion; endeavoured in the first place, by vows and sacrifices, to acquire the favour of those whom they honoured as gods, and afterwards returning them public and solemn thanks for the success of their arms. This was a double testimony which they paid to an important and capital truth, the tradition which (of equal antiquity with the world) has been preserved by all nations; that there is a Supreme Being and a Providence, which presides over all human events. This laudable custom is observed regularly among us, and it is only among Christians, in strictness of speech, that it may be called a religious custom. I only wish that one practice were added to it, which certainly corresponds with the intention of our superiors, as well ecclesiastical as political, I mean, that prayers were offered up at the same time for those brave officers and soldiers who have shed their blood in the defence of their country.

The victory gained over Antiochus was followed by the surrender of all the cities and fortresses which that prince had taken, and especially of Chalcis and all Eubœa. The consul, after his victory, discovered such a moderation on all occasions, as reflected a greater honour on him than the victory itself.

Though the Ætolians, by their injurious and insolent conduct, had rendered themselves unworthy of the least regard, Acilius, however, endeavoured to bring them over by gentle methods. He represented, that experience ought to teach them, how little they could depend on Antiochus; that it was not yet too late for them to have recourse to the clemency of the Romans; that, to give an unexceptionable proof of the sincerity of their repentance, they must surrender to him Heraclea, their capital city. These remonstrances being all to no purpose, he saw plainly that he should be obliged to employ force, and accordingly he besieged that place with all his troops. Heraclea was a very strong city, of great extent, and able to make a long and vigorous defence. The consul having employed the balista, catapultæ, and all the other engines of war, attacked the city in four places at the same time. The besieged defended themselves with inexpressible courage, or rather fury. They immediately repaired such parts of the wall as were beaten down. In their frequent sallies, they charged with a violence it was scarce possible to support, for they fought in the highest despair. They burned in an instant the greatest part of the machines employed against them. The attack was continued in this manner for four-and-twenty days, without the least intermission either by day or night.

It was plain, as the garrison did not consist of near so many forces as the Roman army, it must necessarily be greatly weakened by such violent and continued exertions. And now the consul formed a new plan. He discontinued the attack at twelve every night, and did not renew it till about nine the next morning. The Ætolians, not doubting that this proceeded from the excessive fatigue of the besiegers, and persuaded that they were as much exhausted as themselves, took advantage of the repose allowed them, and retired at the same time with the Romans. They continued this practice for some time; but the consul having drawn off his troops at midnight, as usual, at three in the morning assaulted the city in three places only; placing at the fourth a body of troops, who were commanded not to move till a signal should be given. Such Ætolians as were asleep, being very drowsy and heavy from fatigue, were waked with the utmost difficulty; and those who were awake ran up and down at random wherever the noise called them. At day-break, the signal being given by the consul, the assault was made on that part of the city which had not yet been attacked, and from whence the besieged, on that account, had drawn off their people. The city was taken in an instant, and the Ætolians fled with the utmost precipitation into the citadel. The general suffered the city to be plundered, not so much from a spirit of hatred and revenge, as to reward the soldiers, who, till now, had not been allowed to plunder any of the cities they had taken. As the citadel was in want of provisions, it could not hold out long; and accordingly, at the first assault, the garrison surrendered. Among the prisoners was Damocritus, a person of the greatest distinction among the Ætolians, who in the beginning of the war, had answered Quintus, "That he would bring to him in Italy the decree by which he had just before called in Antiochus."

At the same time Philip was besieging Lamia,² which was but seven miles from Heraclea. It did not hold out long after the latter was taken.

Some days before the surrender of Heraclea, the Ætolians had deputed ambassadors, with Thoas at their head, to Antiochus. The king promised them a speedy succour, gave them immediately a considerable sum of money, and kept Thoas, who stayed very willingly with him, to hasten the execution of his promises.

The Ætolians, who were exceedingly discouraged by the taking of Heraclea, considered how they might best put an end to a war, which had already been attended with very unhappy effects, and might have been much worse. But the populace not approving the conditions of peace which were prescribed, the negotiation came to nothing.

In the mean time, the consul laid siege to Naupactus, in which the Ætolians had shut themselves up with all their forces. The siege had already been carried on two months, when Quintus, who during this time had been employed in Greece, in various concerns, came thither and joined the consul. The destruction of that city would involve almost the whole nation in the same fate. The usage which Quintus had met with from the Ætolians, had given him the greatest reason to be dissatisfied with them. However, he was moved with compassion, when he saw them on the brink of destruction; and therefore he advanced so near the walls, as to be known by the besieged. The city was reduced to the last extremities. A rumour being spread that Quintus was approaching, immediately the citizens ran from all quarters to the walls. Those unfortunate people, stretching forth their hands towards Quintus, and calling him by his name, all burst into tears, and implored his assistance with the most mournful cries. Quintus, moved with their condition even to shedding of tears, expressed by his gestures that he could do nothing for them, and returned to the consul. In their conversation he represented, that as he had overcome Antiochus, it was but lost time to continue the siege of those two cities, and that the year of his command was near expiring. Acilius agreed with him; but being ashamed to raise the siege, he left Quintus at liberty to act as he pleased. The latter advancing near the walls a second time, the mournful cries were again heard, and the citizens besought him to take compassion on them. Quintus, by a sign with his hand, bid them send deputies to him; when immediately Phœneas and the principal citizens came out, and threw themselves at his feet. Seeing them in that humble posture; "Your calamity," says he, "banishes from my mind all thoughts of resentment and revenge. You now find that all things have happened as I foretold you they would; and you have not the consolation of being able to say, that none of these misfortunes were owing to yourselves. But destined as I am, by Providence, to preserve Greece, your ingratitude shall not cancel my inclination to do good. Depute therefore some persons to the consul, and beg a truce for as much time as may suffice for sending ambassadors to Rome, in order to make your submissions to the senate. I will be your mediator and advocate with the consul." They followed Quintus's advice in every thing. The consul granted them a truce, broke up the siege, and marched back his army to Phocis.

King Philip sent ambassadors to Rome, to congratulate the Romans on the happy success of this campaign, and to offer presents and sacrifices to the gods in the Capitol. They were received there with the highest marks of distinction, and the Romans gave up to them Demetrius, the son of Philip, who had been a hostage in their city. Thus ended the war which the Romans carried on against Antiochus in Greece.

FUMENES AND THE RHODIANS, IN PRESENCE OF THE ROMAN SENATE, RELATING TO THE GRECIAN CITIES OF ASIA

A. M. 3813. Whilst the affairs I have just related were passing in Greece,¹ Ant. J. C. 191. Antiochus lived easy and undisturbed in Ephesus, relying on the assurance of his flatterers and courtiers, that he had no reason to be under any apprehensions from the Romans, who (they declared) did not intend to cross into Asia. Hannibal was the only person capable of rousing him from this lethargy. He told the king plainly, that instead of entertaining vain hopes, and suffering himself to be lulled asleep by irrational and improbable discourse, he might be assured, that he would soon be forced to fight the Romans both by sea and land, in Asia, and for Asia; and that he must resolve, either to renounce the empire of it, or to defend it sword in hand, against enemies, who aspired at no less than the conquest of the whole world.

The king then became sensible of the great danger he was in, and immediately sent orders to hasten the march of the troops from the East which were not yet arrived. He also fitted out a fleet, embarked, and sailed to the Chersonesus. He there fortified Lysimachia, Sestos, Abydos, and other cities in that neighbourhood, to prevent the Romans from crossing into Asia by the Hellespont; and this being done, he returned to Ephesus.

Here it was resolved, in a great council, to venture a naval engagement. Polyxenides, admiral of the fleet, was ordered to go in search of C. Livius, who commanded that of the Romans, which was just before arrived in the Ægean sea, and to attack it. They met near mount Corychus in Ionia. The battle was fought with great bravery on both sides; but at last Polyxenides was beaten, and obliged to fly. Ten of his ships were sunk, thirteen taken, and he escaped with the rest to Ephesus. The Romans sailed into the harbour of Cane, in Æolis, drew their ships ashore, and fortified with a strong intrenchment and rampart the place where they laid them up for the whole winter.

Antiochus,² at the time this happened, was in Magnesia, assembling his land forces. News being brought that his fleet was defeated, he marched towards the coast, and resolved to equip another so powerful, as might be able to preserve the empire of those seas. For this purpose, he refitted such ships as had been brought off, reinforced them with new ones, and sent Hannibal into Syria, to fetch those of Syria and Phœnicia. He also gave part of the army to Seleucus his son, whom he sent into Æolis, to watch the Roman fleet, and awe all the country round, and marched in person with the rest into winter quarters in Phrygia.

During these transactions,³ the Ætolian ambassadors arrived at Rome, where they pressed to be admitted to an audience, because the truce was near expiring. Quintius, who was returned from Greece, employed all his influence in their favour. But he found the senate very much exasperated against the Ætolians. They were considered, not as common enemies, but as a people so very uncivilized and unsocial that it would be to no purpose to conclude an alliance with them. After several days' debate, in which they were neither allowed nor refused peace, two proposals were made to them, and left to their option; these were, either to submit entirely to the will of the senate, or to pay 1000 talents,⁴ and to acknowledge all those for their friends or enemies, who were such to the Romans. As the Ætolians desired to know particularly how far they were to submit to the will of the senate, no express answer was made to them. They therefore withdrew, without obtaining any thing, and were ordered to leave Rome that very day, and Italy in a fortnight.

The next year the Romans gave the command of the land armies A. M. 3814.
which Acilius had before, to L. Cornelius Scipio, the new consul, under whom Scipio Africanus, his brother, had offered to serve as lieutenant. The senate and people of Rome were very desirous of trying, whether of the two, Scipio or Hannibal, the conqueror or the conquered, would be of the greater service to the army in which he should fight. The command of the fleet, which Livius had before, was given to L. Æmilius Regillus.

The consul being arrived in Ætolia, did not trifle away his time in besieging one town after another, but, wholly attentive to his principal view, after granting the Ætolians a six months' truce, in order that they might have full time for sending a second embassy to Rome, he resolved to march his army through Thessaly, Macedonia, and Thrace, and from thence to cross over into Asia. However, he thought it advisable previously to inform himself how Philip might stand affected. This prince gave the army such a reception as might be expected from the most faithful and most zealous ally. At its arrival, as well as departure, he furnished it with all necessary refreshments and supplies, with a truly loyal munificence. In the entertainments which he made for the consul, his brother, and the chief officers of the Romans, he discovered an easy, graceful air; and such a politeness as was very pleasing to Scipio Africanus. For this great man, who excelled in every thing, was not an enemy to a certain elegance of manners and noble generosity, provided they did not degenerate into luxury.

The praise which Livy gives Scipio in this place, is also very honourable to Philip. He had at that time for his guests the most illustrious personages in the world, a Roman consul, and at the same time general of the armies of that republic; and what was still more, Scipio Africanus, that consul's brother. Profusion is usual, and in some measure pardonable, on these occasions; and yet nothing of that kind appeared in the reception which Philip gave to his guests. He regaled them in such a manner as became a great prince; and with a magnificence that suited their dignity and his own, which, however, at the same time, was far from discovering the least pomp or ostentation, and was much heightened by his engaging demeanour, and by the care he took to set before his guests with taste and decorum whatever might be most agreeable to them. Multa in eo dexteritas et humanitas visa. These personal qualities, in the opinion of Scipio, did Philip greater honour, and gave his guests a more advantageous idea of him, than the most sumptuous profusion could have done. This excellent taste on both sides, so uncommon in princes and great men, is a fine model for persons of their high rank.

The consul and his brother, in return for the noble and generous reception which Philip had given the army, remitted him in the name of the Roman people, who had invested them with full powers for that purpose, the remainder of the sum he was to pay them.

Philip seemed to make it his duty, as well as pleasure, to accompany the Roman army; and to supply it with necessities of every kind, not only in Macedonia but as far as Thrace. His experience how much the Roman forces were superior to his own, and his inability to shake off the yoke of obedience and submission, always grating to kings, obliged him to cultivate the good opinion of a people on whom his future fate depended; and it was wise in him to do that with a good grace, which he would otherwise in some measure have been obliged to do. For in reality it was scarce possible for him not to retain a very strong resentment against the Romans, on account of the condition to which they had reduced him: for kings are never able to accustom themselves to depend on and submit to others.

In the mean time the Roman fleet advanced towards Thrace, to favour the passage of the consul's troops into Asia. Polyxenides, Antiochus's admiral, who was a Rhodian exile, by a stratagem, defeated Pausistratus, who commanded the Rhodian fleet, which had been sent to the assistance of the Romans. He attacked him by surprise in the harbour of Samos, and burned or sunk nine-and-twenty of his ships; and Pausistratus himself lost his life in this engagement. The Rhodians, so far from being discouraged by this great loss, meditated only how to revenge it. Accordingly, with incredible diligence, they fitted out a more powerful fleet than the former. It joined that of Æmilius, and both fleets sailed toward Elea, to aid Eumenes, whom Seleucus was besieging in his capital. This succour arrived very seasonably, Eumenes being just on the point of being reduced by the enemy. Diophanes the Achæan, who had formed himself under the famous Philopæmen, obliged the enemy to raise the siege. He had entered the city with 1000 foot and 100 horse. At the head of his own troops only, and in sight of the inhabitants, who did not dare to follow him, he performed actions of such extraordinary bravery, as obliged Seleucus at length to raise the siege, and quit the country.

The Rhodian fleet being afterwards detached in quest of Hannibal,¹ who was bringing to the king that of Syria and Phœnicia, the Rhodians singly fought him on the coast of Pamphylia. By the goodness of their ships, and the dexterity of their seamen, they defeated that great captain, drove him into the port of Megiste, near Patara; and there blocked him up so close, that it was impossible for him to act, or be of any service to the king.

The news of this defeat came to Antiochus, much about the time that advice was brought, that the Roman consul was advancing by hasty marches into Macedonia, and was preparing to pass the Hellespont and enter Asia. Antiochus then saw the imminent danger he was in, and made haste to take all possible methods for preventing it.

He sent ambassadors to Prusias,² king of Bithynia, to inform him of the design which the Romans had of entering Asia. They were ordered to display in the strongest terms the fatal consequences of that enterprise: that they were coming with a design to destroy all the kingly governments in the world, and leave no other empire than that of the Romans: that after having subdued Philip and Nabis, they were now preparing to attack him: that should he have the ill-fortune to be overcome, the conflagration spreading, would soon reach Bithynia: that as to Eumenes, no aid could be expected from him, as he had voluntarily submitted himself, and put on the chains of the Romans with his own hands.

These motives had made a great impression on Prusias, but the letters which he had received at the same time from Scipio the consul and his brother, contributed very much to remove his fears and suspicions. The latter represented to him that it was the constant practice of the Romans, to bestow the greatest honours on such kings as sought their alliance; and he mentioned several examples of that kind, in which he himself had been concerned. He said that in Spain, several princes, who, before they were favoured with the protection of the Romans, had made a very inconsiderable figure, were since become great kings: that Masinissa had not only been restored to his kingdom, but that the dominions of Syphax had been added to it, whereby he was become one of the most powerful potentates of the universe: that Philip and Nabis, though vanquished by Quintus, had nevertheless been suffered to sit peaceably on their thrones: that in the preceding year the tribute which Philip had agreed to pay was remitted, and his son, who was a hostage in Rome sent back to him; that as to Nabis, he would have been on the throne at that time, had he not lost his life by the treachery of the Ætolians.

The arrival of Livius, who had commanded the fleet, and whom the Romans had sent as their ambassador to Prusias, fully determined him. He made it clear to him, which party might naturally be expected to be victorious: and how much safer it would be for him to rely on the friendship of the Romans, than on that of Antiochus.

The king being disappointed of the hopes he had entertained of bringing over Prusias to his interest now meditated only how he might best oppose the passage of the Romans into Asia, and prevent its being made the seat of war. He imagined that the most effectual way to do this, would be, to recover the empire of the seas, of which he had been almost dispossessed by the loss of the two battles related above; that then he might employ his fleets against whom, and in what manner he pleased: and that it would be impossible for the enemy to transport an army into Asia by the Hellespont, or by any other way, when his fleets should be wholly employed to prevent it. Antiochus therefore resolved to hazard a second battle, and for that purpose went to Ephesus, where his fleet lay. He there reviewed it, put it in the best condition he was able, furnished it abundantly with all things necessary to another engagement, and sent it once more, under the command of Polyxenides, in quest of the enemy, with orders to fight them. What determined his resolution was, his having received advice that a great part of the Rhodian fleet continued near Patara; and that king Eumenes had sailed with his whole fleet to the Chersonesus to join the consul.

Polyxenides came up with Æmilius and the Romans near Myonnesus, a maritime city of Ionia, and attacked their fleet with as little success as before. Æmilius obtained a complete victory, and obliged him to retire to Ephesus, after having sunk or burnt twenty-nine of his ships, and taken thirteen.

Antiochus was so struck with the news of this defeat,³ that he seemed entirely disconcerted; and, as if he had been on a sudden deprived of his senses, he took such measures as were evidently contrary to his interest. In his consternation, he sent orders for withdrawing his forces out of Lysimachia, and the other cities of the Hellespont, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, who were marching towards those parts, with a design of crossing into Asia: whereas, the only means that remained to hinder this, would have been to leave those troops in the places where they were. For Lysimachia, being very strongly fortified, might have held out a long siege, perhaps till the winter was very far advanced, which would have greatly incommoded the enemy, by the want of provisions and forage; and during that interval, he might have taken measures for an accommodation with the Romans.

He had not only committed a great error in drawing his forces out of those places at a time when they were most necessary in them, but did it in so precipitate a manner, that his troops left all the ammunition and provisions (of both of which he had laid up very considerable quantities) behind them in those cities. By this means, when the Romans entered them, they found ammunition and provisions in such great plenty, that they seemed to have been prepared expressly for the use of their army; and at the same time, the passage of the Hellespont was so open, that they carried over their army without the least opposition, at that very part where the enemy might have disputed it with them to the greatest advantage.

We have here an evident instance of what is so often mentioned in the Scriptures, that when God is determined to punish and destroy a kingdom, he deprives either the king, his commanders, or ministers, of counsel, prudence, and courage. With this he makes the prophet Isaiah threaten his people. "For,

The mighty man, and the man of war, the judge, and the prophet, and the prudent, and the ancient. The captain of fifty, and the honourable man, and the counsellor, and the cunning artificer, and the eloquent orator."—But a very remarkable circumstance is, that the Pagan historian says here expressly, and repeats it twice, that "God took away the king's judgment,¹ and overthrew his reason: a punishment," says he, "that always happens, when men are upon the point of falling into some great calamity." The expression is very strong; "God overthrew the king's reason." He took from him, that is he refused him, sound sense, prudence, and judgment: he banished from his mind every salutary thought: he confused him, and made him even averse to all the good counsel that could be given him. This is what David besought God to do with regard to Ahitophel,² Absalom's minister: "O Lord, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahitophel into foolishness." The word in the Latin version is very strong, infatus: the import of which is, how prudent soever his counsels may be, make them appear foolish and stupid to Absalom; and they accordingly did appear so. "And Absalom and all the men of Israel said, The counsel of Hushai, the Archite, is better than the counsel of Ahitophel: for the Lord had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahitophel, to the intent that the Lord might bring evil upon Absalom."

The Romans,³ being come into Asia, halted some time at Troy, which they considered as the cradle whence they had sprung, and as their primitive country, from whence Æneas had set out to settle in Italy. The consul offered up sacrifices to Minerva, who presided over the citadel. Both parties were overjoyed, much after the same manner as fathers and children, who meet after a long separation. The inhabitants of this city seeing their posterity conquerors of the West and of Africa, and laying claim to Asia, as a kingdom that had been possessed by their ancestors, imagined they saw Troy rise out of its ashes in greater splendour than ever. On the other side, the Romans were infinitely delighted to see themselves in the ancient abode of their forefathers, who had given birth to Rome; and to contemplate the temples and statues of the deities which they had in common with that city.⁴

When advice was brought to Antiochus that the Romans had passed the Hellespont,⁵ he began to think himself undone. He would now have been very glad to deliver himself from a war in which he had engaged rashly, and without examining seriously all its consequences. This made him resolve to send an embassy to the Romans, to propose conditions of peace. A religious ceremony had retarded the march of their army, it having halted for several days that were festivals at Rome, in which the sacred shields called Ancilia were carried in solemn procession with great pomp. Scipio Africanus, who was one of the Salii, or priests of Mars, whose office was to keep these shields, had not crossed the sea yet; for being one of the Salii, he could not leave the place where the festival was solemnizing, so that the army was obliged to wait for him. What a pity it was, that persons of so much religion were no better illuminated, and did not direct their worship to more proper objects! This delay gave the king some hopes; for he had imagined that the Romans, immediately upon their arrival in Asia, would have attacked him on a sudden. Besides, the character he had heard of Scipio Africanus, of his greatness of soul, his generosity and clemency to those he had conquered both in Spain and Africa, gave him hopes that this great man, now satiated with glory, would not be averse to an accommodation; especially as he had a present to make him, which could not but be infinitely agreeable. This was his own son, a child, who had been taken at sea, as he was going in a boat from Chalcis to Orenum, according to Livy.

Heraclides, of Byzantium, who was the spokesman in this embassy, opened his speech with saying, that the very circumstance which had frustrated all the rest of the negotiations for peace between his master and the Romans, now made him hope for success in the present; because all the difficulties which had hitherto prevented their taking effect, were entirely removed: that the king, to put a stop to the complaints of his still keeping possession of any city in Europe, had abandoned Lysimachia: that as to Smyrna, Lampascus, and Alexandria in the Troad, he was ready to give them up to the Romans, and any other city belonging to their allies which they should demand of him: that he would consent to pay to the Romans half the expenses of this war. He concluded with exhorting them to call to mind the uncertainty and vicissitude of human affairs, and not lay too great a stress on their present prosperity: that they ought to rest satisfied with making Europe, whose extent was so immense, the boundaries of their empire: that if they were ambitious of joining some part of Asia to it, the king would acquiesce with their desire, provided that the limits of it were clearly settled.

The ambassador imagined that these proposals, which seemed so advantageous, could not be rejected; but the Romans judged differently. With regard to the expenses of the war, as the king had very unjustly been the occasion of it, they were of opinion that he ought to defray the whole: they were not satisfied with his withdrawing the garrisons he had in Ionia and Ætolia; but pretended to restore liberty to all Asia, in the same manner as they had done to Greece, which could not be effected unless the king abandoned all Asia on this side mount Taurus.

Heraclides, not being able to obtain any thing in the public audience, endeavoured, pursuant to his instructions, to conciliate in private Scipio Africanus. He began by assuring him, that the king would restore him his son without ransom. Afterwards, being very little acquainted with Scipio's greatness of soul, and the character of the Romans, he promised him a large sum of money, and assured him that he might entirely dispose of all things in the king's power if he could mediate a peace for him. To these overtures, Scipio made the following answer: "I am not surprised to find you ignorant both of my character and that of the Romans, as you are unacquainted even with the condition of the prince who sent you hither. If, as you assert, the uncertainty of the fate of arms should prompt us to grant you peace upon easier terms, your sovereign ought to have kept possession of Lysimachia, in order to have shut us out of the Chersonesus; or else he ought to have met us in the Hellespont to have disputed our passage into Asia. But, by abandoning them to us, he put the yoke on his own neck; so that all he now has to do, is to submit to whatever conditions we shall think fit to prescribe. Among the several offers he makes me, I cannot but be strongly affected with that which relates to the giving me back my son; I hope the rest will never have the power to tempt me. As a private man I can, promise to preserve eternally the deepest sense of gratitude, for so precious a gift as he offers me in my son; but as a public one, he must expect nothing from me. Go, therefore, and tell him, in my name, that the best counsel I can give him, is to lay down his arms, and not reject any articles of peace which may be

But, by abandoning them to us, he put the yoke on his own neck; so that all he now has to do, is to submit to whatever conditions we shall think fit to prescribe. Among the several offers he makes me, I cannot but be strongly affected with that which relates to the giving me back my son; I hope the rest will never have the power to tempt me. As a private man I can, promise to preserve eternally the deepest sense of gratitude, for so precious a gift as he offers me in my son; but as a public one, he must expect nothing from me. Go, therefore, and tell him, in my name, that the best counsel I can give him, is to lay down his arms, and not reject any articles of peace which may be therefore demand that Hannibal be delivered up to them, as also Thoas the Ætolian, who was the chief agent in fomenting this war." All these conditions were accepted.

L. Cotta was sent to Rome with the ambassadors of Antiochus, to acquaint the senate with the particulars of this negotiation, and to obtain the ratification of it. Eumenes set out at the same time for Rome, whither the ambassadors of the cities of Asia went also. Soon after the 500 talents were paid the consul at Ephesus, hostages were given for the remainder of the payment, and to secure the other articles of the treaty. Antiochus, one of the king's sons, was included among the hostages.—He afterwards ascended the throne, and was surnamed Epiphanes. The instant Hannibal and Thoas received advice that a treaty was negotiating, concluding that they should be the victims, they provided for their own safety by retiring before it was concluded.

The Ætolians had before sent ambassadors to Rome, to solicit an accommodation. To succeed the better, they had the assurance to spread a report in Rome, by a knavish artifice unworthy the character they bore, that the two Scipios had been seized and carried off at an interview, and that Antiochus had defeated their army. Afterwards, as if this report had been true, (and they impudently declared that it was so,) they assumed a haughty tone in the senate, and seemed to demand a peace rather than sue for it. This showed they were not acquainted with the genius and character of the Romans, who had reason to be offended with them on other accounts. They therefore were commanded to leave Rome that very day, and Italy in a fortnight. The Romans received letters from the consul soon after, by which it appeared that this report was entirely groundless.

The Romans¹ had just before

Ætolia fell by lot to Fulvius, and Asia to Manlius.

The arrival of Cotta at Rome, who brought the particulars of the victory and treaty of peace, filled the whole city with joy. Prayers and sacrifices were appointed, by way of thanksgiving, for three days.

After this religious solemnity was over, the senate immediately gave audience, first to Eumenes, and afterwards to the ambassadors. At this audience, one of the most important affairs that had ever been brought before the senate, and which concerned all the Grecian cities of Asia, was to be considered. It is well known how precious and dear liberty in general is to all men. But the Greeks in particular were inexpressibly jealous of theirs. They considered it as an inheritance, which had devolved to them from their ancestors; and as a peculiar privilege that distinguished them from all other nations. And, indeed, the least attention to the Grecian history will show that liberty was the great motive and principle of all their enterprises and wars; and in a manner the soul of their laws, customs, and whole frame of government. Philip, and Alexander his son, gave the first blow to it, and their successors had exceedingly abridged, and almost extirpated it. The Romans had a little before restored it to all the cities of Greece, after the victory they had gained over Philip king of Macedonia. The cities of Asia, after the defeat of Antiochus, were in hopes of the same indulgence. The Rhodians had sent ambassadors to Rome, principally to solicit that favour for the Greeks of Asia; and it was the peculiar interest of king Eumenes to oppose it. This was the subject on which the senate were now to debate, the decision of which held all Europe and Asia in suspense.

Eumenes being first admitted to audience, opened his speech with a short compliment to the senate, for the glorious protection they had granted him, in freeing himself and his brother, when besieged in Pergamus (the capital of his kingdom) by Antiochus, and in securing his dominions against the unjust enterprises of that prince. He afterwards congratulated the Romans on the happy success of their arms, both by sea and land; and on the famous victory they had lately gained, by which they had driven Antiochus out of Europe, as well as of all Asia situated on this side of mount Taurus. He added, that as to himself and the service he had endeavoured to do the Romans, he chose rather to have those things related by their generals than by himself. The modesty of his behaviour was universally applauded, but he was desired to specify the particulars in which the senate and people of Rome could oblige him, and what he had to ask of them; assuring him that he might rely on their good inclinations towards him. He replied, that if the choice of a recompense was proposed to him by others, and he were permitted to consult the senate, he then would be so free as to ask that venerable body, what answer it would be proper for him to make, in order that he might not insist upon immoderate and unreasonable demands; but that, as it was from the senate that he expected whatsoever he could hope for, he thought it most advisable to depend entirely on their generosity. He was again desired to explain himself clearly, and without ambiguity. In this mutual contest between politeness and respect, Eumenes, not being able to prevail upon himself to be outdone, quitted the assembly. The senate still persisted in their first resolution. And the reason they gave for it was, that the king knew what it best suited his interest to ask. He therefore was again introduced, and obliged to explain himself.

He then made the following speech: "I should have still continued silent, did I not know that the Rhodian ambassadors, whom you will soon admit to audience, will make such demands as are directly contrary to my interest. They will plead, in your presence, the cause of all the Grecian cities of Asia, and pretend that they ought to be declared free. Now, can it be doubted that their intention in this is, to deprive me, not only of those cities, which will be set free, but even of such as were anciently tributaries to me; and that their view is, by so signal a service, to subject them effectually to themselves, under the specious title of confederate cities? They will not fail to expatiate on their own disinterestedness; and to say, that they do not speak for themselves, but merely for your glory and reputation. You therefore will certainly not suffer yourselves to be imposed upon by such discourse; and are far from designing, either to discover an affected inequality towards your allies, by humbling some and raising others in an immoderate degree; nor to allow better conditions to those who bore arms against you, than to such as have always been your friends and allies. With regard to my particular pretensions, and my personal interest, these I can easily give up; but as to your kindness, and the marks of friendship with which you have been pleased to honour me, I must confess that I cannot, without pain, see others triumph over me in that particular. This is the most precious part of the inheritance I received from my father, who was the first potentate in all Greece and Asia that had the advantage of concluding an alliance, and of joining in friendship with you; and who cultivated it with an inviolable constancy and fidelity to his latest breath. He was far from confining himself in those points to mere protestations of kindness and good will. In all the wars you made in Greece, whether by sea or land, he constantly followed your standards, and aided you with all his forces, with such a zeal as none of your allies can boast. It may even be said, that his attachment to your interest, in the last and strongest proof he gave of his fidelity, was the cause of his death: for the fire and vigour with which he exhorted the Boeotians to engage in an alliance with you, occasioned the fatal accident that brought him to his end in a few days. I have always thought it my glory and duty to tread in his steps. It had not, indeed, been possible for me to exceed him in zeal and attachment for your service: but then the posture of affairs, and the war against Antiochus, have furnished me with more opportunities than my father had, of giving you proofs of this. That prince, so powerful in Europe as well as Asia, offered me his daughter in marriage: he engaged himself to recover all those cities which had revolted from me: he promised to enlarge my dominions considerably, upon condition that I should join with him against you. I will not assume any honour to myself from not accepting of offers which tended to alienate me from your friendship; and, indeed, how would it have been possible for me to do this? I will only take notice of what I thought myself bound to do in your favour, as one who was your ancient friend and ally. I assisted your generals both by sea and land, and with a far greater number of troops, as well as a much larger quantity of provisions, than any of your allies. I was present in all your engagements, and these were many; and have spared myself no toils nor dangers. I suffered the hardships of a siege (the most grievous calamity of war,) and was blocked up in Pergamus, exposed every moment to the loss of my crown and life. Having disengaged myself from this siege, whilst Antiochus on one side, and Seleucus his son on the other, were still encamped in my dominions; neglecting entirely my own interest, I sailed with my whole fleet to the Hellespont, to meet Scipio your consul, purposely to assist him in passing it. I never quitted the consul from the time of his arrival in Asia: not a soldier in your camp has exercised himself more than my brother and myself. No expedition, no battle of cavalry, has taken place without me. In the last engagement, I defended the post which the consul assigned me. I will not ask whether in this particular any of your allies deserved to be compared with me. One thing I will be so confident as to assert, that I may put myself in parallel with any of those kings or states, on whom you have bestowed the highest marks of your favour. Masiussa had been your enemy before he became your ally. He did not come over to you with powerful aids, and at a time when he enjoyed the full possession of his kingdom; but an exile, driven from his kingdom; plundered of all his possessions, and deprived of all his forces, he fled to your camp, with a squadron of horse, in order to seek an asylum and a refuge in his misfortunes. Nevertheless, because he has since served you faithfully against Syphax and the Carthaginians, you have not only restored him to the throne of his ancestors, but, by bestowing on him great part of Syphax's kingdom, you have made him one of the most powerful monarchs of Africa. What, therefore, may we not expect from your liberality, we, who have ever been your allies, and never your enemies? My father, my brothers, and myself, have, on all occasions, drawn our swords in your cause, both by sea and land; not only in Asia, but at a great distance from our native country, in Peloponnesus, Bœotia, and Ætolia, during the wars against Philip, Antiochus, and the Ætolians. Perhaps some one may ask, what then are your pretensions? Since you force me to explain myself, they are as follows: If, in repulsing Antiochus beyond mount Taurus, your intention was to seize upon that country, in order to unite it to your empire, I could not wish for better neighbours, none being more able to secure my dominions. But if you are resolved to resign it, and to recall your armies from thence, I dare presume to say, that none of your allies deserve to derive advantage from your requests better than myself. Yet (some may observe) it is great and glorious to deliver cities from slavery, and to restore them their liberty. I grant it, provided they had never exercised hostilities against you. But if they have been warmly attached to Antiochus's interest, will it not be much more worthy of your wisdom and justice, to bestow your favours on allies, who have served you faithfully, than on enemies who have used their endeavours to destroy you?"

The senate were exceedingly pleased with the king's harangue; and showed evidently, that they were determined to do every thing for him in their power.

The Rhodians were afterwards admitted to audience. The person who spoke in their name, after retracing the origin of their animity with the Romans, and the services they had done them, first in the war against Philip, and afterwards in that against Antiochus: "Nothing," says he, directing himself to the senators, "grieves us so much at this time, as to find ourselves obliged to engage in a dispute with Eumenes, that prince for whom, of all princes, both our republic and ourselves have the most faithful and cordial respect. The circumstance which divides and separates us on this occasion, does not proceed from a difference of inclinations, but of conditions. We are free, and Eumenes is a king. It is natural that we, being a free people, should plead for the liberty of others; and that kings should endeavour to make all things pay homage to their sovereign sway. However this be, the circumstance which perplexes us on this occasion, is not so much the affair in itself, which seems to be of such a nature that you cannot be very much divided in opinion about it, as the regalia and deference which we ought to show to so august a prince as Eumenes. If there were no other way of acknowledging the important services of a king, your confederate and ally, but in subjecting free cities to his power, you then might be doubtful from the fear you might be under, either of not discovering gratitude enough towards a prince who is your friend, or of renouncing your principles, and the glory you have acquired in the war against Philip, by restoring all the Grecian cities to their liberty. But fortune has put you in such a condition, as not to fear either of these inconveniences. The immortal gods be praised, the victory you have so lately gained, by which you acquire no less riches than glory, enables you to acquit yourselves easily of what you call a debt. Lycæonia, the two Phrygias, and Pisidia, the Chersonesus, and the country contiguous to it, are all in your hands. One of these provinces is alone capable of enlarging considerably the dominions of Eumenes; but all of them together, will equal him to the most powerful kings. You therefore may, at one and the same time, recompense very largely your allies, and not depart from the maxims which form the glory of your empire. The same motive prompted you to march against Philip and Antiochus. As the cause is the same, the like issue is expected; not only because you yourselves have already set the example, but because your honour requires it. Others engage in war, merely to dispossess their neighbours of some country, some city, fortress, or sea-port; but you, O Romans, never draw the sword from such motives: when you fight, it is for glory; and it is this circumstance which inspires all nations with a reverence and awe for your name and empire, almost equal to that which is paid the gods. Your business is to preserve that glory. You have undertaken to rescue from the bondage of kings, and to restore to its ancient liberty, a nation famous for its antiquity; and still more renowned for its glorious actions, and its exquisite taste for the polite arts and sciences. It is the whole nation whom you have taken under your protection, and you have promised it them to the end of time. The cities, situated in Greece itself, are not more Grecian than the colonies they settled in Asia. A change of country has not wrought any alteration in our origin or manners. We, as Grecian cities in Asia, have endeavoured to rival our ancestors and founders in virtue and knowledge. Many persons in this assembly have seen the cities of Greece and those of Asia: the only difference is, that we are situated at a farther distance from Rome. If a difference in climate could change the nature and disposition of men, the inhabitants of Marseilles, surrounded as they are with ignorant and barbarous nations, should necessarily have long since degenerated; and yet we are informed that you have as great a regard for them, as if they lived in the centre of Greece. And, indeed, they have retained, not only the sound of the language, the dress, and the whole exterior of the Greeks, but have also preserved still more their manners, laws, and genius, and all these pure and uncorrupted by their intercourse with the neighbouring nations. Mount Taurus is now the boundary of your empire. Every country on this side of it ought not to appear remote for you. When ever you have carried your arms, convey thither also the genius and form of your government. Let the Barbarians, who are accustomed to slavery, continue under the empire of kings, since it is grateful to them. The Greeks, in the mediocrity of their present condition, think it glorious to imitate your exalted sentiments. Born and nurtured in liberty, they know you will not deem it a crime in them to be jealous of it, as you yourselves are so. Formerly, their own strength was sufficient to secure empire to them; but now they implore the gods that it may be enjoyed for ever by those people with whom they have placed it. All they desire is, that you will be pleased to protect, by the power of your arms, their liberties, as they are now no longer able to defend them by their own. But, says somebody, some of those cities have favoured Antiochus. Had not the others favoured Philip also; and the Tarentines Pyrrhus? To cite but one people, Carthage, your enemy as well as rival, enjoys its liberties and laws. Consider, Fathers, the engagements which this example lays you under. Will you concede to Eumenes's ambition (I beg his pardon for the expression) what you refused to your own just indignation? As for us Rhodians, in this, as well as in all the wars which you have carried on in our countries, we have endeavoured to behave as good and faithful allies; and you are to judge whether we have really been such. Now that we enjoy peace, we are so free as to give you advice which must necessarily tend to your glory. If you follow it, it will demonstrate to the universe, that however nobly you obtain victories, you yet know how to make a nobler use of them."

It was impossible to forbear applauding this speech, and it was thought worthy of the Roman grandeur. The senate found itself on this occasion divided and opposed by different sentiments and duties, of whose importance and justice they were sensible, but which at the same time, it was difficult to reconcile on this occasion. On one side, gratitude for the services of a king, who had adhered to them with inviolable zeal and fidelity, made a strong impression on their minds: on the other, they earnestly wished to have it thought that the sole view of their undertaking this war was to restore the Grecian cities to their liberty. It must be confessed, that the motives on both sides were exceedingly strong. The restoring of every part of Greece to its liberties and laws after Philip's defeat, had acquired the Romans a reputation infinitely superior to all other triumphs. But then it would be dangerous to displease so powerful a prince as Eumenes; and it was the interest of the Romans to bring over other kings to their side by the attractive charms of advantage. However, the wisdom of the senate knew how to reconcile these different duties.

Antiochus's ambassadors were brought in after those of Rhodes, and all they requested of the senate was, to confirm the peace which L. Scipio had granted them. They complied with their desire, and accordingly, some days after, it was also ratified in the assembly of the people.

The ambassadors of the Asiatic cities were likewise heard, and the answer made to them was, that the senate would despatch, pursuant to their usual custom, ten commissioners to inquire into and settle the affairs of Asia. It was told them in general, that Lycæonia, the two Phrygias, and Mysia, should thenceforward be subject to king Eumenes. To the Rhodians were allotted Lycia, and that part of Caria which lies nearest to Rhodes, and part of Pisidia. In both these distributions, such cities were excepted as enjoyed their freedom before the battle fought against Antiochus. It was enacted that the rest of the cities of Asia, which had paid tribute to Attalus, should also pay it to Eumenes; and that such as had been tributaries to Antiochus, should be free and exempt from contributions of every kind.

Eumenes and the Rhodians seemed very well satisfied with this prudent regulation. The latter requested as a favour, that the inhabitants of Soli, a city of Cilicia, descended originally, as well as themselves, from the people of Argos, might be restored to their liberty. The senate, after consulting Antio-chus's ambassadors on that head, informed the Rhodians of the violent opposition which those ambassadors had made to their request; because Soli, as situated beyond mount Taurus, was not included in the treaty. However, that if they imagined the honour of Rhodes was concerned in this demand, they would again attempt to overcome their reluctance. The Rhodians returning the most hearty thanks once more to the Romans, for the great favours they vouchsafed them, answered, that it was far from their intention to interrupt the peace in any manner, and retired highly satisfied.

The Romans decreed a triumph to Æmilius Regillus, who had gained a victory at sea over the admiral of Antiochus's fleet; and still more justly to L. Scipio, who had conquered the king in person. He assumed the surname of Asiaticus, that his titles might not be inferior to those of his brother, upon whom that of Africanus had been conferred.

Thus ended the war against Antiochus, which was not of long duration, cost the Romans but little blood, and yet contributed very much to the aggrandizing of their empire. But, at the same time, this victory contributed also, in another manner, to the decay and ruin of that very empire, by introducing into Rome, by the wealth it brought into it, a taste and love for luxury and effeminate pleasures; and it is from this victory over Antiochus, and the conquest of Asia, that Pliny dates the depravity and corruption of manners in the Republic of Rome, and the fatal changes which took place there. Asia, vanquished by the Roman arms, in its turn vanquished Rome by its vices. Foreign wealth extinguished in that city a love for the ancient poverty and simplicity in which its strength and honour had consisted. Luxury, which in a manner entered Rome in triumph with the superb spoils of Asia, brought with her in her train irregularities and crimes of every kind, made greater havoc in the cities than the mightiest armies could have done, and in that manner conquered the globe.

Reflections on the conduct of the Romans with regard to the Grecian states, and the kings both of Europe and Asia.

The reader begins to discover, in the events before related, one of the principal characteristics of the Romans, which will soon determine the fate of all the states of Greece, and produce an almost general change in the universe, I mean a spirit of sovereignty and dominion. This characteristic does not display itself at first in its full extent; it reveals itself only by degrees; and it is only by insensible progressions, which at the same time are rapid enough, that it is carried at last to its greatest height.

It must be confessed, that this people, on certain occasions, show such a moderation and disinterestedness, as (judging of them only by their outside) exceed every thing we meet with in history, and to which it seems inconsistent to refuse praise. Was there ever a more delightful or more glorious day than that in which the Romans, after having carried on a long and dangerous war; after crossing seas, and exhausting their treasures, caused a herald to proclaim, in a general assembly, that the Roman people restored all the cities to their liberty; and desired to reap no other fruit from their victory, than the noble pleasure of doing good to nations, the bare remembrance of whose ancient glory sufficed to endear them to the Romans? The description of what passed on that immortal day can hardly be read without tears, and without being affected with a kind of enthusiasm of esteem and admiration.

Had this deliverance of the Grecian states proceed ed merely from a principle of generosity, void of all interested motives; had the whole tenor of the conduct of the Romans never belied such exalted sentiments, nothing could possibly have been more august, or more capable of doing honour to a nation. But, if we penetrate ever so little beyond this glaring outside, we soon perceive, that this specious moderation of the Romans was entirely founded upon a profound policy: wise indeed, and prudent, according to the ordinary rules of government, but at the same time very remote from that noble disinterestedness, which has been so highly extolled on the present occasion. It may be affirmed, that the Grecians then abandoned themselves to a stupid joy; fondly imagining that they were really free, because the Romans declared them so.

Greece, in the times I am now speaking of, was divided between two powers; I mean the Grecian republics and Macedonia; and they were always engaged in war; the former to preserve the remains of their ancient liberty; and the latter to complete their subjection. The Romans, being perfectly well acquainted with this state of Greece, were sensible, that they needed not be under any apprehensions from those little republics, which were grown weak through length of years, intestine feuds, mutual jealousies, and the wars they had been forced to support against foreign powers. But Macedonia, which was possessed of well-disciplined troops, inured to all the toils of wars, which had continually in view the glory of its former monarchs; which had formerly extended its conquests to the extremities of the globe; which still harboured an ardent though chimerical desire of attaining universal empire; and which had a kind of natural alliance with the kings of Egypt and Syria, sprung from the same origin, and united by the common interests of monarchy; Macedonia, I say, gave just alarms to Rome, which, from the time of the ruin of Carthage, had no obstacles to her ambitious designs, but those powerful kingdoms that shared the rest of the world between them, and especially Macedonia, as it lay nearer to Italy than the rest.

To balance, therefore, the power of Macedon, and to dispossess Philip of the aid which he flattered himself he should receive from the Greeks, which, indeed, had they united all their forces with his, in order to oppose this common enemy, would perhaps have made him invincible with regard to the Romans; in this view, I say, this latter people declared loudly in favour of those republics; made it their glory to take them under their protection, and that with no other design, in outward appearance, than to defend them against their oppressors; and, farther to attach them by a still stronger tie, they hung out to them a specious bait (as a reward for their fidelity.) I mean liberty, of which all the republics in question were inexpressibly jealous; and which the Macedonian monarchs had perpetually disputed with them.

The bait was artfully prepared, and swallowed very greedily by the generality of the Greeks, whose views penetrated no farther. But the most judicious and most clear-sighted among them discovered the danger that lay concealed beneath this charming bait; and accordingly they exhorted the people from time to time in their public assemblies, to beware of this cloud that was gathering in the West; and which, changing on a sudden into a dreadful tempest, would break like thunder over their heads, to their utter destruction.

Nothing could be more gentle and equitable than the conduct of the Romans in the beginning. They acted with the utmost moderation towards such states and nations as addressed them for protection; they succoured them against their enemies; took the utmost pains in terminating their differences, and in suppressing all commotions which arose amongst them; and did not demand the least recompense from their allies for all these services. By this means their authority gained strength daily, and prepared the nations for entire subjection.

And indeed, under pretence of offering them their good offices, of entering into their interests, and of reconciling them, they rendered themselves the sovereign arbiters of those whom they had restored to liberty, and whom they now considered, in some measure, as their freedmen. They used to depute commissioners to them, to inquire into their complaints, to weigh and examine the reasons on both sides, and to decide their quarrels; but when the articles were of such a nature, that there was no possibility of reconciling them on the spot, they invited them to send their deputies to Rome. Afterwards, they used, with plenary authority, to summon those who refused to come to an agreement; obliged them to plead their cause before the senate, and even to appear in person there. From arbiters and mediators being become supreme judges, they soon assumed a magisterial tone, looked upon their decrees as irrevocable decisions, were greatly offended when the most implicit obedience was not paid to them, and gave the name of rebellion to a second resistance: thus there arose, in the Roman senate, a tribunal which judged all nations and kings, from which there was no appeal. This tribunal, at the end of every war, determined the rewards and punishments due to all parties. They dispossessed the vanquished nations of part of their territories in order to bestow them on their allies, by which they did two things, from which they reaped a double advantage; for they thereby engaged in the interest of Rome, such kings as were no ways formidable to them, and from whom they had something to hope; and weakened others, whose friendship the Romans could not expect, and whose arms they had reason to dread.

We shall hear one of the chief magistrates in the republic of the Achæans inveigh strongly in a public assembly against this unjust usurpation, and ask by what title the Romans are empowered to assume so haughty an ascendancy over them; whether their republic was not as free and independent as that of Rome; by what right the latter pretended to force the Achæans to account for their conduct; whether they would be pleased, should the Achæans, in their turn, officiously pretend to inquire into their affairs; and whether matters ought not to be on the same footing, on both sides? All these reflections were very reasonable, just, and unanswerable; and the Romans had no advantage in the question but force.

They acted in the same manner, and their politics were the same, with regard to their treatment of kings. They first won over to their interest such among them as were the weakest, and consequently the least formidable; they gave them the title of allies, whereby their persons were rendered in some measure sacred and inviolable; and which was a kind of safeguard against other kings more powerful than themselves: they increased their revenues, and enlarged their territories, to let them see what they might expect from their protection. It was this which raised the kingdom of Pergamus to so exalted a pitch of grandeur.

In the sequel the Romans invaded, upon different pretences, those great potentates who divided Europe and Asia. And how haughtily did they treat them, even before they had conquered! A powerful king confined within a narrow circle by a private man of Rome, was obliged to make his answer before he quitted it: how imperious was this! But then, how did they treat vanquished kings? They command them to deliver up their children, and the heirs to their crown, as hostages and pledges of their fidelity and good behaviour; obliged them to lay down their arms; forbid them to declare war, or conclude any alliance, without first obtaining their leave; banish them to the other side of the mountains; and leave them, in strictness of speech, only an empty title, and a vain shadow of royalty, divested of all its rights and advantages.

We cannot doubt, but that providence had decreed to the Romans the sovereignty of the world, and the Scriptures had prophesied their future grandeur: but they were strangers to those divine oracles; and besides, the bare prediction of their conquests was no justification of their conduct. Although it be difficult to affirm, and still more so to prove, that this people had, from their first rise, formed a plan, in order to conquer and subject all nations; it cannot be denied but that, if we examine their whole conduct attentively, it will appear that they acted as if they had a foreknowledge of this; and that a kind of instinct had determined them to conform to it in all things.

But be this as it will, we see, by the event, in what this so much boasted lenity and moderation of the Romans terminated. Enemies to the liberty of all nations; having the utmost contempt for kings and monarchy; looking upon the whole universe as their prey, they grasped, with insatiable ambition, the conquest of the whole world; they seized indiscriminately all provinces and kingdoms, and extended their empire over all nations; in a word, they prescribed no other limits to their vast projects, than those which deserts and seas made it impossible to pass.

ANTIOCHUS, IN ORDER TO PAY THE TRIBUTE DUE TO THE ROMANS, PLUNDERS A TEMPLE IN ELYMIAS. THAT MONARCH IS KILLED. EXPLICATION OF DANIEL'S PROPHECY CONCERNING ANTIOCHUS.

DURING the expedition of the Romans in Asia, some commotions had Ant. J. C. 189. happened in Greece. Amynder, by the aid of the Ætolians, had re-established himself in his kingdom of Athamania, after having driven out of his cities the Macedonian garrisons that held them for king Philip. He deputed some ambassadors to the senate of Rome; and others into Asia to the two Scipios, who were then at Ephesus, after their signal victory over Antiochus, to excuse his having employed the arms of the Ætolians against Philip, and also to make his complaints against that prince.

The Ætolians had likewise undertaken some enterprises against Philip, in which they had met with tolerable success: but when they heard of Antiochus's defeat, and found that the ambassadors they had sent to Rome were returning from thence, without being able to obtain any of their demands, and that Fulvius the consul was actually marching against them, they were seized with real alarms. Finding it would be impossible for them to resist the Romans by force of arms, they again had recourse to entreaties; and in order to render them more effectual, they engaged the Athenians and Rhodians to join their ambassadors to those whom they were going to send to Rome, in order to sue for peace.

The consul being arrived in Greece, had, in conjunction with the Epirots, laid siege to Ambracia, in which the Ætolians had a strong garrison, who made a vigorous defence. However, being at last persuaded that it would be impossible for them to hold out long against the Roman arms, they sent new ambassadors to the consul, investing them with full powers to conclude a treaty on any conditions. Those which were proposed to them appearing exceeding severe, the ambassadors, notwithstanding their full power, desired that leave might be granted them to consult the assembly once more: but the members of it were displeased with them for it, and therefore sent them back, with orders to terminate the affair. During this interval the Athenian and Rhodian ambassadors, whom the senate had sent back to the consul, were arrived, and Amynder had also come to him. The latter having great influence in the city of Ambracia, where he had spent many years during his banishment, prevailed with the inhabitants to surrender themselves at last to the consul. A peace was also granted to the Ætolians. The chief conditions of the treaty were as follows: that they should first deliver up their arms and horses to the Romans; should pay them 1000 talents of silver, (about 150,000*l.*) half to be paid down directly; should restore to both the Romans and their allies all the deserters and prisoners; should look upon as their enemies and friends all those who were such to the Romans; and lastly, should give up forty hostages, to be chosen by the consul. Their ambassadors being arrived at Rome, to procure the ratification of the treaty there, found the people highly exasperated against the Ætolians, as well on account of their past conduct, as the complaints made against them by Philip in the letters which he had written on that subject. At last, however, the senate were moved by their entreaties, and those of the ambassadors of Athens and Rhodes who accompanied them, and therefore they ratified the treaty conformably to the conditions which the consul had prescribed. The Ætolians were permitted to pay in gold the sum imposed on them, in such a manner, as that every piece of gold should be estimated at the value of ten pieces of silver of the same weight, which shows the proportion between gold and silver at that time.

Fulvius the consul, after he had terminated the war with the Ætolians, crossed into the island of Cephalenia, in order to subdue it. All the cities, at the first summons, surrendered readily. The inhabitants of Same only, after submitting to the conqueror, were sorry for what they had done, and accordingly shut their gates against the Romans, which obliged them to besiege it in fort. Same made a very vigorous defence, inasmuch that it was four months before the consul could take it.

From thence he went to Peloponnesus, whither he was called by the people of Ægium and Sparta, to decide the differences which interrupted their tranquillity.

The general assembly of the Achæans had from time immemorial been held at Ægium; but Philopæmen, who was then in office, resolved to change that custom, and to cause the assembly to be held successively in all the cities which formed the Achæan league; and that very year he summoned it to Argos. The consul would not oppose this motion; and though his inclination led him to favour the inhabitants of Ægium, because he thought their cause the most just; yet, seeing that the other party would certainly prevail, he withdrew from the assembly without declaring his opinion.

But the affair relating to Sparta was still more intricate, and, at the same time, of greater importance. Those who had been banished from that city by Nabis the tyrant, had fortified themselves in towns and castles along the coast, and from thence infested the Spartans. The latter had attacked, in the night, one of those towns, called Las, and carried it, but were soon after driven out of it. This enterprise alarmed the exiles, and obliged them to have recourse to the Achæans. Philopæmen, who at that time was in office, secretly favoured the exiles; and endeavoured on all occasions to lessen the influence and authority of Sparta. On his motion, a decree was enacted, the purport of which was, that Quintus and the Romans, having put the towns and castles of the sea-coast of Laconia under the protection of the Achæans, and having forbidden the Lacedæmonians access to it; and the latter having, however, attacked the town called Las, and killed some of the inhabitants; the Achæan assembly demanded that the contrivers of that enterprise should be delivered up to them; and that otherwise they should be declared violators of the treaty. Ambassadors were deputed to give them notice of this decree. A demand made in so haughty a tone exceedingly exasperated the Lacedæmonians. They immediately put to death thirty of those who had held a correspondence with Philopæmen and the exiles; dissolved their alliance with the Achæans, and sent ambassadors to Fulvius the consul, who was then in Cephalenia, in order to put Sparta under the protection of the Romans; and to entreat him to come and take possession of it. When the Achæans received advice of what had been transacted in Sparta, they unanimously declared war against that city, which began by some slight incursions both by sea and land, the season being too far advanced for undertaking any thing considerable.

The consul being arrived in Peloponnesus, heard both parties in a public assembly. The debates were exceedingly warm, and the altercation carried to a great height on both sides. Without coming to any immediate determination, he commanded them to lay down their arms, and to send their respective ambassadors to Rome: and accordingly they repaired thither immediately, and were admitted to audience. The Achaean league was greatly respected at Rome; but, at the same time, the Romans were unwilling to disgust the Lacedæmonians entirely. The senate therefore returned an obscure and ambiguous answer, (which has not come down to us), whereby the Achæans might flatter themselves, that they were allowed full power to infest Sparta; and the Spartans, that such power was very much limited and restrained.

The Achæans extended it as they thought proper. Philopemen had been continued in his employment of first magistrate. He marched the army to a small distance from Sparta without loss of time; and again demanded to have those persons surrendered to him, who had concerted the enterprise against the town of Las; declaring that they should not be condemned nor punished till after being heard. Upon this promise, those who had been expressly nominated, set out, accompanied by several of the most illustrious citizens, who looked upon their cause as their own, or rather as that of the public. Being arrived at the camp of the Achæans, they were greatly surprised to see the exiles at the head of the army. The latter, advancing out of the camp, came to meet them with an insulting air, and began to overwhelm them with reproaches and invectives: after this the quarrel growing warmer, they fell upon them with great violence, and treated them very ignominiously. In vain did the Spartans implore both gods and men, and claim the right of nations; the rabble of the Achæans, animated by the seditious cries of the exiles, joined with them, notwithstanding the protection due to ambassadors, and in spite of the prohibition of the supreme magistrate. Seventeen were immediately stoned to death, and seventy-three rescued by the magistrate out of the hands of those furious wretches. It was not that he intended to pardon them; but he would not have it said, that they had been put to death without being heard. The next day they were brought before that enraged multitude, who, almost without so much as hearing them, condemned and executed them all.

The reader will naturally suppose that so unjust and cruel a treatment threw the Spartans into the deepest affliction, and filled them with alarms. The Achæans imposed the same conditions on them, as they would have done on a city that had been taken by storm. They gave orders that the walls should be demolished; that all such mercenaries as the tyrants had kept in their service should leave Laconia; that the slaves whom those tyrants had set at liberty (and there were a great number of them) should also be obliged to depart the country in a certain limited time, upon pain of being seized by the Achæans, and sold or carried whithersoever they thought proper; that the laws and institutions of Lycurgus should be annulled; and, in fine, that the Spartans should be associated in the Achaean league, with whom they should thenceforth form but one body, and follow the same customs and usages.

The Lacedæmonians were not much afflicted at the demolition of their walls, with which they began the execution of the orders prescribed them, and indeed it was no great misfortune to them. Sparta had long subsisted without any other walls or defence than the bravery of its citizens.¹ Pausanias informs us² that the walls of Sparta were begun to be built in the time of the inroads of Demetrius,³ and afterwards of Phyrus; but they had been completed by Nabis. Livy relates also, that the tyrants, for their own security, had fortified with walls all such parts of the city as were most open and accessible. The demolition of these walls, therefore, was not a subject of much grief to the inhabitants of Sparta. But it was with inexpressible regret they saw the exiles, who had caused its destruction, returning into it, and who might justly be considered as its most cruel enemies. Sparta, enervated by this last blow, lost all its pristine vigour, and was for many years dependent on, and subjected to, the Achæans. The most fatal circumstance with regard to Sparta was, the abolition of the laws of Lycurgus, which had continued in force 700 years, and had been the source of all its grandeur and glory.

This cruel treatment of so renowned a city as Sparta does Philopemen no honour; but, on the contrary, seems to be a great blot in his reputation. Plutarch, who justly ranks him among the greatest captains of Greece, does but just glance at this action, and says only a word or two of it. It must, indeed, be confessed, that the cause of the exiles was favourable in itself. They had Agesipolis at their head, to whom the kingdom of Sparta rightfully belonged; and they had been all expelled their country by the tyrants: but so open a violation of the law of nations (to which Philopemen gave at least occasion, if he did not consent to it) cannot be excused in any manner.

It appears, from a fragment of Polybius, that the Lacedæmonians made complaints at Rome against Philopemen, as having by this action, equally unjust and cruel, defied the power of the republic of Rome, and insulted its majesty. It was a long time before they could obtain leave to be heard.

At last, Lepidus the consul wrote a letter to the Achaean confederacy, to A. M. 3817. complain of the treatment which the Lacedæmonians had met with. Philopemen and the Achæans sent an ambassador, Nicodemus of Ellis, to Rome, to justify their conduct.

In the same campaign,⁴ and almost at the same time that Fulvius the consul terminated the war with the Ætolians, Manlius, the other consul, terminated that with the Gauls. I have taken notice elsewhere of the inroads these nations had made into different countries of Europe and Asia, under Brennus. The Gauls in question had settled in that part of Asia Minor called, from their name, Gallo-Græcia, or Galatia, and formed three bodies, three different states; the Tolistobogi, the Troceni, and Tectosages. They had made themselves formidable to all the nations round, and spread terrors and alarms on all sides. The pretence for declaring war against them was, their having aided Antiochus with troops. Immediately after L. Scipio had resigned the command of his army to Manlius, the latter set out from Ephesus, and marched against the Gauls. If Eumenes had not been at Rome, he would have been of great service to him in his march; however, his brother Attalus supplied his place, and was the consul's guide. The Gauls had acquired great reputation in every part of this country, which they had subdued by the power of their arms, and had not met with the least opposition. Manlius judged that it would be necessary to harangue his forces on this occasion, before they engaged the enemy. "I am no ways surprised," says he, "that the Gauls should have made their name formidable, and spread terror in the minds of nations so soft and effeminate as the Asiatics. Their tall stature, their fair flowing hair, which descends to their waists: their enormous bucklers, their long swords; add to this, their songs, their cries, and howlings at the first onset; the dreadful clashing of their arms and shields; all this may, indeed, be dreadful to men not accustomed to them; but not to you, O Romans, whose victorious arms have so often triumphed over that nation. Besides, experience has taught you, that after the Gauls have spent their first fire, an obstinate resistance blunts the edge of their courage, as well as their bodily strength; and that then, quite incapable of supporting the heat of the sun, fatigue, dust, and thirst, their arms fall from their hands, and they sink down quite tired and exhausted. Do not imagine these to be the ancient Gauls, inured to fatigues and dangers. The luxurious plenty of the country they have invaded, the soft temperature of the air they breathe, the effeminacy and luxury of the people among whom they dwell, have entirely enervated them. They are now no more than Phrygians in Gallic armour; and the only circumstance I fear is, that you will not reap much honour by the defeat of enemies so unworthy of disputing victory with Romans."

It was a general opinion with regard to the ancient Gauls, that a sure way to conquer them was to let them exhaust their first fire, which was quickly deadened by opposition; and that when once this edge of their vivacity was blunted, they had lost all strength and vigour; and their bodies were even incapable of sustaining the slightest fatigues long, or of withstanding the sunbeams, when they darted with ever so little violence: that, as they were more than men in the beginning of an action, they were less than women at the conclusion of it. Gallus primo impetu ferociter esse, quos sustinere satis sit—Gallorum quidem etiam corpora intolerantissima laboris atque vigiliarum; primaque eorum prælia plus quam virorum, postrema minus quam feminarum esse.

Those who were not acquainted with the genius and character of the modern French, entertained very near the same idea of them. However, the late transactions in Italy, and especially on the Rhine, must have undeceived them. However prepossessed I may be in favour of the Greeks and Romans, I question whether they ever discovered greater patience, resolution, and bravery, than the French displayed at the siege of Philipsburg. I do not speak merely of the generals and officers, courage being natural to and in a manner inherent in them; but even the common soldiers showed such an ardour, intrepidity, and greatness of soul, as amazed the generals. The sight of a hostile army, formidable by its numbers, and still more so by the fame and abilities of the prince who commanded it, served only to animate them the more. During the whole course of this long and laborious siege, in which they suffered so much by the fire of the besieged and the heat of the sun, by the violence of the rains and inundations of the Rhine; they never once breathed the least murmur or complaint. They were seen wading through great floods, where they were up to the shoulders in water, carrying their clothes and arms over their head, and afterwards marching, quite uncovered, on the outside of the trenches full of water, exposed to the whole fire of the enemy; and then advancing with intrepidity to the front of the attack, demanding with the loudest shouts, that the enemy should not be allowed capitulation of any kind; and appearing to dread no other circumstance than their being denied the opportunity of signaling their courage and zeal still more, by storming the city. What I now relate is universally known. The most noble sentiments of honour, bravery, and intrepidity, must necessarily have taken deep root in the minds of our countrymen; otherwise they could not have burst forth at once so gloriously in a first campaign, after having been in a manner asleep during a twenty years' peace.

The testimony which Lewis XV. thought it incumbent on him to give them, is so glorious to the nation, and even reflects so bright a lustre on the king himself, that I am persuaded none of my readers will be displeased to find it inserted here entire. If this digression is not allowable in a history like this, methinks it is pardonable, and even laudable, in a true Frenchman, fired with zeal for his king and country

THE KING'S Letter to the Marshal D'ASFELDT.

"COUSIN,

"I am fully sensible of the important service you have done me in taking Philipsburg. Nothing less than your courage and resolution could have surmounted the obstacles to that enterprise, occasioned by the inundations of the Rhine. You have had the satisfaction to see your example inspire the officers and soldiers with the same sentiments. I caused an account to be sent me daily, of all the transactions of that siege; and always observed, that the ardour and patience of my troops increased in proportion to the difficulties that arose, either from the swelling of the floods, the presence of the enemy, or the fire of the place. Every kind of success may be expected from so valiant a nation: and I enjoin you to inform the general officers and others, and even the whole army, that I am highly satisfied with them. You need not doubt my having the same sentiments with regard to you; to assure you of which is the sole motive of this letter; and, Cousin, I beseech the Almighty to have you in his holy keeping."

Versailles, July 23, 1734.

I now return to the history. After Manlius had ended the speech repeated above, the army discovered by their shouts how impatiently they desired to be led against the enemy; and accordingly the consul entered their territories. The Gauls had not once suspected that the Romans would invade them, as their country lay so remote from them, and therefore were not prepared to oppose them. But notwithstanding this, they made a long and vigorous resistance. They laid in wait for Manlius in dæles; disputed the passes with him; shut themselves up in their strongest fortresses, and retired to such eminences as they thought inaccessible. However, the consul, so far from being discouraged, followed, and forced them wherever he came. He attacked them separately, stormed their cities, and defeated them in several engagements. I shall not descend to particulars, which were of little importance, and consequently would only tire the reader. The Gauls were obliged at last to submit, and to confine themselves within the limits prescribed them.

By this victory, the Romans delivered the whole country from the perpetual terrors it was under from those barbarians, who hitherto had done nothing but harass and plunder their neighbours. Tranquillity was so fully restored in this quarter, that the empire of the Romans was established there, from the river Halys to mount Taurus; and the kings of Syria were for ever excluded from all Asia Minor. We are told that Antiochus³ said, on this occasion, that he was highly obliged to the Romans, for having freed him from the cares and troubles which the government of so vast an extent of country must necessarily have brought upon him.

Fulvius, one of the consuls, returned to Rome, in order to preside A. M. 3816.
in the assembly. The consulate was Ant. J. C. 188.
given to M. Valerius Messala and C. Livius Salinator. The instant the assembly broke up, Fulvius returned to his own province. Himself and Manlius his colleague were continued in the command of the armies for a year, in quality of proconsuls.

Manlius had repaired to Ephesus, to settle, with the ten commissioners who had been appointed by the senate, the most important articles of their commission. The treaty of peace with Antiochus was confirmed, as also that which Manlius had concluded with the Gauls. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, had been sentenced to pay the Romans 600 talents (600,000 crowns,) for having assisted Antiochus: however, half this sum was abated at the request of Eumenes, who was to marry his daughter. Manlius made a present to Eumenes of all the elephants which Antiochus, according to the treaty, had delivered up to the Romans. He repassed into Europe with his forces, after having admitted the deputies of the several cities to audience, and settled the chief difficulties among them.

Antiochus¹ was very much puzzled

A. M. 3817. how to raise the sum he was to pay Ant. J. C. 187. the Romans. He made a progress through the provinces of the east, in order to levy the tribute which they owed him; and left the regency of Syria, during his absence, to Seleucus his son, whom he had declared his presumptive heir. Being arrived in the province of Elymais, he was informed that there was a very considerable treasure in the temple of Jupiter Belus. This was a strong temptation to a prince who had little regard for religion, and was in extreme want of money. Accordingly, upon a false pretence that the inhabitants of that province had rebelled against him, he entered the temple in the dead of night, and carried off all the riches which had been kept there very religiously during a long series of years. However, the people, exasperated by this sacrilege, rebelled against him, and murdered him with all his followers. Aurelius Victor² says that he was killed by some of his own officers, whom he had beaten one day when he was heated with liquor.

This prince was highly worthy of praise, for his humanity, clemency, and liberality. A decree, which we are told he enacted, whereby he gave his subjects permission, and even commanded them, not to obey his ordinances, in case they should be found to interfere with the laws, shows that he had a high regard for justice. Till the age of fifty he had behaved on all occasions with such bravery, prudence, and application, as had given success to all his enterprises, and acquired him the title of the Great. But from that time his wisdom, as well as application, had declined very much, and his affairs in proportion. His conduct in the war against the Romans; the little advantage he reaped by, or rather his contempt for, the wise counsels of Hannibal; the ignominious peace he was obliged to accept; these circumstances sullied the glory of his former successes; and his death, occasioned by a wicked and sacrilegious enterprise, threw an indelible blot upon his name and memory.

The prophecies of the eleventh chapter of Daniel, from the 10th to the 19th verse, relate to the actions of this prince, and were fully accomplished.

"But his sons (of the king of the North) shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces: and one (Antiochus the Great) shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass through: then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress."³ This king of the North⁴ was Seleucus Callinicus, who left behind him two sons, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus, afterwards surnamed the Great. The former reigned but three years, and was succeeded by Antiochus his brother. The latter, after having pacified the troubles of his kingdom, made war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of the South, that is of Egypt; dispossessed him of Coele-syria, which was delivered to him by Theodotus, governor of that province; defeated Ptolemy's generals in the narrow passes near Berytus, and made himself master of part of Phœnicia. Ptolemy then endeavoured to amuse him by overtures of peace. The Hebrew is still more expressive. "He (meaning Antiochus) shall come. He shall overflow" the enemy's country. "He shall pass" over mount Libanus. "He shall halt," whilst overtures of peace are making to him. "He shall advance with ardour as far as the fortresses," that is, to the frontiers of Egypt. Ptolemy's victory is clearly pointed out in the following verses.

"And the king of the South shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even the king of the North: and he shall set forth a great multitude, but the multitude shall be given into his hand."⁵ Ptolemy Philopator was an indolent, effeminate prince. It was necessary to excite and drag him, in a manner, out of his lethargy, in order to prevail with him to take up arms and repulse the enemy, who were preparing to march into his country; provocatus. At last he put himself at the head of his troops; and by the valour and good conduct of his generals obtained a signal victory over Antiochus at Raphia.

"And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up, and he shall cast down many ten thousands; but he shall not be strengthened by it."⁶ Antiochus lost upwards of 10,000 foot and 300 horse, and 4000 of his men were taken prisoners. Philopator, having marched after his victory to Jerusalem, was so audacious as to attempt to enter the sanctuary. "His heart shall be lifted up;" and being returned to his kingdom, he behaved with the utmost pride toward the Jews, and treated them very cruelly. He might have dispossessed Antiochus of his dominions, had he taken a proper advantage of his glorious victory; but he contented himself with recovering Coele-syria and Phœnicia, and again plunged into his former excesses; "but he shall not be strengthened by it."

"For the king of the North shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come (after certain years) with a great army and with much riches."⁷ Antiochus, after he had ended the war beyond the Euphrates, raised a great army in those provinces. Finding, fourteen years after the conclusion of the first war, that Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was then but five or six years of age, had succeeded Philopator his father, he united with Philip, king of Macedon, in order to deprive the infant king of his throne. Having defeated Scopas at Panium, near the source of the river Jordan, he subjected the whole country which Philopator had conquered, by the victory he had gained at Raphia.

"And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the South."⁸ This prophecy was fulfilled by the league between the kings of Macedonia and Syria against the infant monarch of Egypt; by the conspiracy of Agathocles and Agathoclea for the regency; and by that of Scopas, to dispossess him of his crown and life. "Also, the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision, but they shall fall."⁹ Several apostate Jews, to ingratiate themselves with the king of Egypt, complied with every thing he required of them, even in opposition to the sacred ordinances of the law, by which means they were in great favour with him; but their influence was not long-lived; for when Antiochus regained possession of Judea and Jerusalem, he either extirpated or drove out of the country all the partisans of Ptolemy. This subjection of the Jews to the sovereignty of the kings of Syria, prepared the way for the accomplishment of the prophecy, which denounced the calamities that Antiochus Epiphanes, son of Antiochus the Great, was to bring upon this people; which occasioned a great number of them to "fall" into apostasy.

"So the king of the North shall come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities; and the arms of the South shall not withstand, neither his chosen people, neither shall there be any strength to withstand."¹⁰ But he that cometh against him, shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him: and he shall stand in the glorious land, which by this hand shall be consumed."¹¹ Antiochus, after having defeated the Egyptian army at Panium, besieged and took, first, Sidon, then Gaza, and afterwards all the cities of those provinces, notwithstanding the opposition made by the chosen troops which the king of Egypt had sent against him. "He did according to his own will," in Coele-syria and Palestine, and nothing was able to withstand him. Pursuing his conquests in Palestine, he entered Judea, "that glorious," or, according to the Hebrew, "that desirable land." He there established his authority, and strengthened it, by repulsing from the castle of Jerusalem the garrison which Scopas had thrown into it. This garrison having defended itself so well, that Antiochus was obliged to send for all his troops in order to force it; and the siege continuing a long time; the country was ruined and "consumed" by the stay the army was obliged to make in it.

"He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him; thus shall he do: and he shall give him the daughter of women, corrupting her: but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him."¹ Antiochus, seeing that the Romans undertook the defence of young Ptolemy Epiphanes, thought it would best suit his interest to lull the king asleep, by giving him his daughter in marriage, in order to "corrupt her," and to excite her to betray her husband: but he was not successful in his design: for as soon as she was married to Ptolemy, she renounced her father's interests, and embraced those of her husband. It was on this account that we see her² joined with him in the embassy which was sent from Egypt to Rome, to congratulate the Romans on the victory which Acilius had gained over her father at Thermopylae.

"After this he shall turn his face unto the Isles, and shall take many: but a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach offered by him," Antiochus "to cease; without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him."³ Antiochus, having put an end to the war of Coele-syria and Palestine, sent his two sons at the head of the land army to Sardis, whilst himself embarked on board the fleet, and sailed to the Ægean sea, where he took several islands, and extended his empire exceedingly on that side. However, "the prince" of the people, whom he had insulted by making this invasion, that is, L. Scipio the Roman consul, "caused the reproach to turn upon him;" by defeating him at mount Sipylus, and repulsing him from every part of Asia Minor.

"Then he shall turn his face towards the fort of his own land; but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found."⁴ Antiochus, after his defeat, returned to Antioch, the capital of his kingdom, and the strongest fortress in it. He went soon after into the provinces of the east, in order to levy money to pay the Romans; but, having plundered the temple of Elymais, he there lost his life in a miserable manner.

Such is the prophecy of Daniel relating to Antiochus, which I have explained, in most places, according to the Hebrew text. I confess there may be some doubtful and obscure terms which may be difficult to explain, and are variously interpreted by commentators; but is it possible for the substance of the prophecy to appear obscure and doubtful? Can any reasonable man, who makes use of his understanding, ascribe such a prediction, either to mere chance, or to the conjectures of human prudence and sagacity? Can any light, but that which proceeds from God himself, penetrate, in this manner, into the darkness of futurity, and point out the events of it in so exact and circumstantial a manner? Not to mention what is here said concerning Egypt, Seleucus Callinicus, king of Syria, leaves two children behind him. The eldest reigns but three years, and does not perform any exploit worthy of being recorded; and, accordingly, the prophet does not take any notice of him. The youngest is Antiochus, surnamed the Great, from his great actions; and, accordingly, the same prophet gives an abstract of the principal circumstances of his life, his most important enterprises, and even the manner of his death. In it we see his expeditions into Coele-syria and Phœnicia, several cities of which are besieged and taken by that monarch; his entrance into Jerusalem, which is laid waste by the stay his troops make in it; his conquest of a great many islands; the marriage of his daughter with the king of Egypt, which does not answer the design he had in view; his overthrow by the Roman consul, his retreat to Antioch; and, lastly, his unfortunate end. These are, in a manner, the outlines of Antiochus's picture, which can be made to resemble none but himself. Is it to be supposed that the prophet drew these features without design and at random, in the picture he has left us of him? The facts, which denote the accomplishment of the prophecy, are all told by heathen authors, who lived many centuries after the prophet, and whose fidelity cannot be suspected. It appears to me, that we must renounce, not only religion, but reason, if we refuse to acknowledge, in such prophecies as these, the intervention of a Supreme Being, to whom all ages are present, and who governs the world with absolute power.

SECTION IX.—SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR SUCCEEDS TO THE THRONE OF ANTIOCHUS HIS FATHER. THE FIRST OCCURRENCES OF THE REIGN OF PTOLEMY EPIPHANES IN EGYPT. VARIOUS EMBASSIES SENT TO THE ACHÆANS AND ROMANS. COMPLAINTS MADE AGAINST PHILIP. COMMISSIONERS ARE SENT FROM ROME TO INQUIRE INTO THOSE COMPLAINTS; AND AT THE SAME TIME TO TAKE COGNIZANCE OF THE ILL TREATMENT OF SPARTA BY THE ACHÆANS. SEQUEL OF THAT AFFAIR.

ANTIOCHUS the Great dying,⁵ Seleucus Philopator, his eldest son, A. M. 3817. Ant. J. C. 187. whom he had left in Antioch when he set out for the eastern provinces, succeeded him. But his reign was obscure and contemptible, occasioned by the misery to which the Romans had reduced that crown; and the exorbitant sum⁶ (1000 talents annually) he was obliged to pay, during the whole of his reign, by virtue of the treaty of peace concluded between the king his father and that people.

Ptolemy Epiphanes at that time reigned in Egypt.⁷ Immediately upon his accession to the throne, he had sent an ambassador into Achaia, to renew the alliance which the king his father had formerly concluded with the Achæans. The latter accepted of this office with joy; and accordingly sent as deputies to the king, Lycortas, father of Polybius the historian, and two other ambassadors. The alliance being renewed, Philopemen, who was at that time in office, inviting Ptolemy's ambassador to a banquet, the conversation turned upon that prince. In the praise which the ambassador bestowed upon him, he expatiated very much on his dexterity in the chase, his address in riding, and his vigour and activity in the exercise of his arms; and to give an example of what he asserted, he declared, that this prince, when hunting, had killed, on horseback, a wild bull with one stroke of his javelin.

The same year that Antiochus died, Cleopatra la daughter, queen of Egypt, had a son, who reigned after Epiphanes his father, and was called Ptolemy Philometor. The whole realm expressed great joy upon the birth of this prince.⁸ Coele-syria and Palestine distinguished themselves above all the provinces, and the most considerable persons of those countries went to Alexandria upon that occasion with the most splendid equipages. Josephus, of whom I have spoken elsewhere, who was receiver-general of those provinces, being too late to take such a journey, sent his youngest son, Hyrcanus, in his stead, who was a young man of abundance of wit, and very engaging manners. The king and queen gave him a very favourable reception, and did him the honour of a place at their table. At one of these entertainments, the guests, who looked upon him with contempt, as a mere youth, without capacity or experience, placed before him the bones from which they had eaten the flesh. A buffoon, who used to divert the king with his jests, said to him: "Do but behold, Sir, the quantity of bones before Hyrcanus, and your majesty may judge from thence in what manner his father gnaws your provinces." Those words made the king laugh; and he asked Hyrcanus how he came to have so great a number of bones before him. "Your majesty need not wonder at that," replied he; "for dogs eat both flesh and bones, as you see the rest of the persons at your table have done," pointing to them; "but men are contented to eat the flesh, and leave the bones as I have done." The mockers were mocked by that retort, and continued mute and confused. When the day for making the presents arrived, as Hyrcanus had given out that he had only five talents to present,¹ it was expected that he would be very ill received by the king; and people diverted themselves with the thoughts of it beforehand. The greatest presents made by the rest did not exceed twenty talents.² But Hyrcanus presented to the king 100 boys, well shaped and finely dressed, whom he had bought, each of them bringing a talent as an offering; and to the queen as many girls in magnificent habits, each with a like present, for that princess. The whole court was amazed at such uncommon and surprising magnificence; and the king and queen dismissed Hyrcanus with the highest marks of their favour and esteem.

Ptolemy,³ in the first year of his reign, governed in so auspicious a manner, as gained him universal approbation and applause; because he followed, in all things, the advice of Aristomenes, who was another father to him; but, in process of time, the flattery of courtiers (that deadly poison to kings) prevailed over the wise counsels of that able minister. The young prince shunned him, and began to give in to all the vices and failings of his father. Not being able to endure the liberty which Aristomenes frequently took of advising him to act more worthy of his high station, he despatched him by poison. Having thus got rid of a troublesome censor, whose sight alone was importunate, from the tacit reproaches it seemed to make him, he abandoned himself entirely to his vicious inclinations; plunged into excesses and disorders of every kind; followed no other guides in the administration of affairs than his unbridled passions; and treated his subjects with the cruelty of a tyrant.

The Egyptians, unable at length to endure the oppressions and injustice to which they were daily exposed, began to cabal together, and to form associations against a king who oppressed them so grievously. Some persons of the highest quality having engaged in this conspiracy, they had already formed designs for deposing him, and were upon the point of putting them in execution.

To extricate himself from the difficulties in which he was now involved,⁴ he chose Polycrates for his prime minister, a man of great bravery as well as abilities, and who had the most consummate experience in affairs both of peace and war; for he had risen to the command of the army under his father, and had served in that quality in the battle of Raphia, on which occasion he had contributed very much to the victory. He was afterwards governor of the island of Cyprus; and happening to be in Alexandria when Scopas's conspiracy was discovered, the expedients he employed on that occasion conducted very much to the preservation of the state.

Ptolemy, by the assistance of this able minister, overcame the rebels. Ant. J. C. 183. He obliged their chiefs, who were the principal lords of the country, to capitulate and submit on certain conditions. But, having seized their persons, he violated his promise; and after having exercised various cruelties upon them, put them all to death. This perfidious conduct brought new troubles upon him, from which the abilities of Polycrates again extricated him.

The Achæan league, at the time we are now speaking of, seems to have been very powerful, and in great consideration. We have seen that Ptolemy, a little after his accession to the throne, had been very solicitous to renew the ancient alliance with them. This he was also very desirous of in the latter end of his reign; and accordingly offered that republic 6000 shields and 200 talents of brass. His offer was accepted, and, in consequence of it, Lycortas and two other Achæans were deputed to him, to thank him for the presents, and to renew the alliance; and these returned soon after with Ptolemy's ambassador, in order to ratify the A. M. 3818. treaty. King Eumenes also sent an Ant. J. C. 186. embassy for the same purpose,⁵ and offered 120 talents (about 21,000*l.* sterling,) the interest of which was to be applied for the support of the members of the public council. Others came likewise from Seleucus, who, in the name of their sovereign, offered ten ships of war completely equipped; and, at the same time, desired to have the ancient alliance with that prince renewed. The ambassador whom Philopœmen had sent to Rome to justify his conduct, was returned from thence, and desired to give an account of his commission.

For these several reasons a great assembly was held. The first man that entered it was Nicodemus of Elea. He gave an account of what he had said in the senate of Rome, with regard to the affair of Sparta, and the answer which had been made him. It was judged by the replies, that the senate, in reality, were not pleased with the subversion of the government of Sparta, with the demolition of the walls of that city, nor with the massacre of the Spartans; but at the same time, that they did not annul any thing which had been enacted. And as no person happened to speak for or against the answers of the senate, no farther mention was made of it at that time. But the same affair will be the subject of much debate in the sequel.

The ambassadors of Eumenes were next admitted to audience. After having renewed the alliance which had been formerly made with Attalus, that king's father, and proposed in Eumenes's name the offer of 120 talents, they expatiated largely on the great friendship and tender regard which their sovereign had always showed for the Achæans. When they had ended, Apollonius of Sicyon, rose up, and observed, that the present which the king of Pergamus offered, considered in itself, was worthy of the Achæans; but if regard was had to the end which Eumenes proposed to himself by it, and the advantage he hoped to reap by his munificence, in that case, the republic could not accept of this present without bringing upon itself everlasting infamy, and being guilty of the greatest prevarications. "For, in a word," continued he, "as the law forbids every individual, whether of the people or of the magistrates, to receive any gift from a king upon any pretence whatsoever, the crime would be much greater, should the commonwealth, collectively, accept of Eumenes's offers. That with regard to the infamy, it was self-evident and glaring; for," says Apollonius, "what could reflect greater ignominy on a council, than to receive, annually, from a king, money for its subsistence; and to assemble, in order to deliberate on public affairs, only as so many of his pensioners, and in a manner rising from his table, after having swallowed the bait⁶ that concealed the hook? But what dreadful consequences might not be expected from such a custom, should it be established? Afterwards Prusias, excited by the example of Eumenes, would also be liberal of his benefactions, and after him Selencus: that, as the interest of kings differed widely from those of republics, and as, in the latter, their most important deliberations generally related to their differences with crowned heads, one of these two things would inevitably happen: either the Achæans would transact all things to the advantage of those princes, and to the prejudice of their own country; or else they must be guilty of the blackest ingratitude towards their benefactors." He concluded his speech with exhorting the Achæans to refuse the present which was offered; and added, "That it was their duty to be displeased with Eumenes, for attempting to bribe their fidelity by such an offer." The whole assembly with shouts rejected unanimously the proposal of the king of Pergamus, however dazzling the offer of so large a sum of money might be.

² Polybius by this expression would denote, that such a pension was a kind of bait that covered the hook; that is, the design which Eumenes had of making all those who composed the council his dependants. Καταπαύειν τὸν ὄψον.

After this, Lycortas and the rest of the ambassadors who had been sent to Ptolemy, were called in; and the decree made by that prince for renewing the alliance was read. Aristenes, who presided in the assembly, having asked what treaty the king of Egypt desired to renew (several having been concluded with Ptolemy upon very different conditions,) and nobody being able to answer that question, the decision of that affair was referred to another time.

At last the ambassadors of Seleucus were admitted to audience. The Achæans renewed the alliance which had been concluded with him; but it was not judged expedient to accept, at that juncture, of the ships he offered.

Greece was far from enjoying a

A. M. 3819. calm at this time; and complaints Ant. J. C. 185. were carried from all quarters to Rome against Philip. The senate thereupon nominated three commissioners, of whom Q. Cecilius was the chief, to go and take cognizance of those affairs upon the spot.

Philip still retained the strongest resentment against the Romans, with whom he believed he had just reason to be dissatisfied on many accounts; but particularly, because by the articles of peace, he had not been allowed the liberty of taking vengeance on such of his subjects as had abandoned him during the war. The Romans, however, had endeavoured to console him, by permitting him to invade Athamania, and Amynder the king of that country; by giving up to him some cities of Thessaly, which the Ætolians had seized; by leaving him the possession of Demetrias and all Magnesia; and by not opposing him in his attempts to make himself master of many cities in Thrace; all which circumstances had somewhat appeased his anger. He continually meditated, however, to take advantage of the repose which the peace afforded him, in order to prepare for war whenever a proper opportunity should present itself. But the complaints that were made against him at Rome having been listened to there, revived all his former disgusts.

The three commissioners being arrived at Tempe in Thessaly, an assembly was called there, to which came on one side the ambassadors of the Thessalians, of the Perrhæbians and Athamanians; and, on the other, Philip king of Macedon, a circumstance that could not but greatly mortify the pride of so powerful a prince. The ambassadors urged their various complaints against Philip, with greater or less force, according to their different characters and abilities. Some, after excusing themselves for being obliged to plead against him in favour of their liberty, entreated him to act in regard to them rather as a friend than a master, and to imitate the Romans in that particular, who endeavoured to win over their allies rather by friendship than fear. The rest of the ambassadors, with less reserve and moderation, reproached him to his face for his injustice, oppression, and usurpation; assuring the commissioners, that in case they did not apply a speedy remedy, the triumphs they had obtained over Philip, and their restoration of liberty to the Grecians inhabiting the countries near Macedonia, would all be rendered ineffectual: that this prince, like a fiery courser, would never be kept in and restrained without a very tight rein and a sharp curb. Philip, that he might assume the air of an accuser rather than of one accused, inveighed heavily against those who had harangued on this occasion, and particularly against the Thessalians. He said, that, like slaves, who being made free on a sudden, contrary to their expectations, break into the most injurious exclamations against their masters and benefactors, so they abused with the utmost insolence the indulgence of the Romans; being incapable, after enduring a long servitude, of making a prudent and moderate use of the liberty which had been granted them. The commissioners, after hearing the accusations and answers, the circumstances of which I have thought proper to omit, as little important, and making some particular regulations, did not judge proper at that time to pronounce definitively upon their respective demands.

From thence they went to Thessalonica, to inquire into the affairs relating to the cities of Thrace; and the king, who was very much disgusted, followed them thither. Eumenes's ambassadors said to the commissioners, that if the Romans were resolved to restore the cities of Ænus and Maronea to their liberty, their sovereign was far from having a design to oppose it; but that, if they did not concern themselves in regard to the condition of the cities which had been conquered from Antiochus; in that case, the service which Eumenes and Attalus his father had done Rome seemed to require that they should rather be given up to their master than to Philip, who had no manner of right to them, but had usurped them by open force; that, besides, these cities had been given to Eumenes by a decree of the ten commissioners whom the Romans had appointed to determine these differences. The Maroneans, who were afterwards heard, inveighed in the strongest terms against the injustice and oppression which Philip's garrison exercised in their city.

Here Philip delivered himself in quite different terms from what he had done before; and directing himself personally to the Romans, declared, that he had long perceived they were fully determined never to do him justice on any occasion. He made a long enumeration of the grievous injuries he pretended to have received from them; the services he had done the Romans on different occasions; and laid great stress on the zeal with which he had always adhered to their interest, so far as to refuse 3000 talents, fifty ships of war completely equipped, and a great number of cities, which Antiochus offered him, upon condition that he would conclude an alliance with him. That, notwithstanding this, he had the mortification to see Eumenes preferred on all occasions, with whom he disdained to compare himself; and that the Romans, so far from enlarging his dominions, as he thought his services merited, had even dispossessed him, as well of those cities to which he had a lawful claim, as of such as they had bestowed upon him. "You, O Romans," says he, concluding his speech, "are to consider upon what terms you intend to have me be with you. If you are determined to treat me as an enemy, and to urge me to extremities, in that case you need only use me as you have hitherto done; but, if you still revere in my person the title and quality of king, ally, and friend, spare me, I beseech you, the shame of being treated any longer with so much indignity."

The commissioners were moved with this speech of the king. For this reason, they thought it incumbent on them to leave this affair in suspense, by making no decisive answer; and accordingly they decreed, that if the cities in question had been given to Eumenes, by the decree of the ten commissioners, as he pretended they were, in that case it was not in their power to reverse it; that if Philip had acquired them by right of conquest, it was but just that he should be suffered to continue in possession of them; that if neither of these things should be proved, then the cognizance of this affair should be left to the judgment of the senate; and, in the mean time the garrisons be drawn out of the cities, each party retaining his pretensions as before.

This regulation, by which Philip was commanded, provisionally, to withdraw his garrisons out of the respective cities, far from satisfying that prince, so entirely discontented and enraged him, that the consequence would certainly have been an open war, if he had lived long enough to prepare for it.

The commissioners,¹ at their leaving Macedonia, went to Achaia. Aristenes, who was the chief magistrate, assembled immediately all the chiefs of the republic in Argos. Cecilius coming into this council, after having applauded the zeal of the Achæans, and the wisdom of their government on all other occasions, added, that he could not forbear telling them, that their injurious treatment of the Lacedæmonians had been very much censured at Rome; and therefore, he exhorted them to amend, as much as lay in their power, what had been done imprudently against them on that occasion. The silence of Aristenes, who did not reply a single word, showed that he was of the same opinion with Cecilius, and that they acted in concert. Diophanes of Megalopolis, a man better skilled in war than politics, and who hated Philopœmen, without mentioning the affair of Sparta, made other complaints against him. Upon this Philopœmen, Lycortas, and Archon, began to speak with the utmost vigour in defence of the republic. They showed, that the whole transaction with respect to Sparta had been conducted with prudence, and even to the advantage of the Lacedæmonians: and that no alteration could take place, without violating human laws, as well as the reverence due to the gods. When Cecilius quitted the assembly, the members of it, moved with Philopœmen's discourse, came to a resolution, that nothing should be changed in what had been decreed, and that this answer should be made the Roman ambassador.

When it was told Cecilius, he desired that the general assembly of the country might be convened. To this the magistrates replied, that he must produce a letter from the senate of Rome, by which the Achæans should be desired to meet. As Cecilius had no such letter, they told him plainly that they would not assemble; which exasperated him to such a degree, that he left Achaia, and would not hear what the magistrates had to say. It was believed that this ambassador (and before him Marcus Fulvius) would not have delivered themselves with so much freedom, had they not been sure that Aristenes and Diophanes were in their interest. And, indeed, they were accused of having invited those Romans into that country, purely out of hatred to Philopœmen; and accordingly were greatly suspected by the populace.

Cecilius,² at his return to Rome, acquainted the senate with whatever had been transacted by him in Greece. After this, the ambassadors of Macedonia and Peloponnesus were brought in. Those of Philip and Eumenes were introduced first, and then the exiles of Ænus and Maronea; who all repeated what they had before said in the presence of Cecilius in Thessalonica. The senate, after hearing them, sent to Philip other ambassadors, of whom Appius Claudius was the principal, to examine on the spot whether he was withdrawn (as he had promised Cecilius) from the cities of Perrhæbia; to command him, at the same time, to evacuate Ænus and Maronea; and to draw off his troops from all the castles, territories, and cities, which he possessed on the sea-coast of Thrace.

They next admitted to audience Apollonidas, the ambassador whom the Achæans had sent to justify their having refused to give an answer to Cecilius; and to inform the senate of all that had been transacted with regard to the Spartans, who on their side had deputed to Rome, Areus and Alcibiades, who were both of the number of the first exiles, whom Philopœmen and the Achæans had restored to their country. The circumstance which most exasperated the Achæans was, to see that, notwithstanding the valuable and recent obligation conferred upon them, they had, however, taken upon themselves the odious commission of accusing those who had saved them so unexpectedly and had procured them the happiness of returning to their houses and families. Apollonidas endeavoured to prove, that it would be impossible to settle the affairs of Sparta with greater prudence than Philopœmen and the rest of the Achæans had done; and they likewise exculpated themselves for having refused to call a general assembly. On the other side, Areus and Alcibiades represented, in the most affecting manner, the lamentable condition to which Sparta was reduced; its walls demolished; its citizens dragged into Achaia,³ and reduced to a state of captivity; the sacred laws of Lycurgus, which had made it subsist during so long a series of years, and with so much glory, entirely abolished.

The senate, after weighing and comparing the reasons on both sides, ordered the same ambassadors to inquire into this affair as had been nominated to inspect those of Macedonia; and desired the Achæans to convene their general assembly, whenever the Roman ambassadors should require it: as the senate admitted them to audience in Rome as often as they asked it.

When Philip was informed by his ambassadors,⁴ who had been sent back to him from Rome, that he must absolutely evacuate all the cities of Thrace; in the highest degree of rage, to see his dominions contracted on every side, he vented his fury on the inhabitants of Maronea. Ononastes, who was governor of Thrace, employed Cassander, who was very well known in the city, to execute the barbarous command of the prince. Accordingly, in the dead of night, he led a body of Thracians into it, who fell on the citizens, and cut a great number of them to pieces. Philip having thus wreaked his vengeance on those who were not of his faction, waited calmly for the commissioners, being firmly persuaded that no one would dare to impeach him.

Some time after Appius arrives; who, upon being informed of the barbarous treatment which the Maroneans had met with, reproached the king of Macedonia, in the strongest terms, on that account. The latter resolutely asserted, that he had not been in any manner concerned in the massacre, but that it was wholly occasioned by an insurrection of the populace. "Some," says he, "declaring for Eumenes, and others for me, a great quarrel arose, and they butchered one another." He went so far as to challenge them to produce any person who pretended to have any articles to lay to his charge. But who would have dared to impeach him? His punishment would have been immediate; and the aid he might have expected from the Romans was too far off. "It is to no purpose," says Appius to him, "for you to apologize for yourself; I know what things have been done as well as the author of them." These words gave Philip the greatest anxiety. However, matters were not carried farther at this first interview.

But Appius, the next day, commanded him to send immediately Ononastes and Cassander to Rome, to be examined by the senate on the affair in question, declaring, that there was no other way left for him to clear himself. Philip, upon receiving this order changed colour, wavered within himself, and hesitated a long time before he made answer. At last, he declared that he would send Cassander, whom the commissioners suspected to be the contriver of the massacre; but he was determined not to send Ononastes, who (he declared) so far from having been in Maronea at the time this bloody tragedy happened, was not even in the neighbourhood of it. The true reason was, that Philip was afraid lest Ononastes, in whom he reposed the utmost confidence, and had never concealed any thing from him, should betray him to the senate. As for Cassander, the instant the commissioners had left Macedonia, he put him on board a ship; but, at the same time, sent some persons in his company, who poisoned him in Epirus.

After the departure of the commissioners, who were fully persuaded that Philip had contrived the massacre of Maronea, and was upon the point of breaking with the Romans; the king of Macedon, reflecting in his own mind, and with his friends, that the hatred he bore the Romans, and the strong desire he had to wreak his vengeance on that people, must necessarily soon display itself, would have been very glad to take up arms immediately, and declare war against them; but, not being prepared, he conceived an expedient to gain time. He resolved to send his son Demetrius to Rome, whom, as having been many years a hostage, and having acquired great esteem in that city, he judged very well qualified either to defend him against the accusations with which he might be charged before the senate, or apologize for such faults as he really had committed.

He accordingly made all the preparations necessary for this embassy, and nominated several friends to attend the prince his son on that occasion.

He, at the same time, promised to succour the Byzantines; not that he was sincerely desirous of defending them, but because his barely advancing to aid that people would strike terror into the petty princes of Thrace, in the neighbourhood of the Propontis, and would prevent their opposing the resolution he had formed of engaging in a war against the Romans. And accordingly having defeated those petty sovereigns in a battle, and taken their chief prisoner, he hereby put it out of their power to annoy him, and returned into Macedon.

The arrival of the Roman commissioners,¹ who were commanded to go from Macedon into Achaia, was expected in Peloponnesus. Lycortas, in order that an answer might be ready for them, summoned a council, in which the affair of the Lacedæmonians was examined. He represented to the assembly, what they had to fear from them; the Romans seeming to favour their interest much more than that of the Achæans. He expatiated chiefly on the ingratitude of Areus and Alcibiades, who, though they owed their return to the Achæans, had however been so base as to undertake the embassy against them to the senate, where they acted and spoke like professed enemies; as if the Achæans had driven them from their country, whereas it was they who had restored them to it. Upon this, great shouts were heard in every part of the assembly, and the president was desired to bring the affair into immediate deliberation. Nothing prevailing but passion and a thirst of revenge, Areus and Alcibiades were condemned to die.

The Roman commissioners arrived a few days after, and the council met at Clitor in Arcadia. This filled the Achæans with the utmost terror; for seeing Areus and Alcibiades, whom they had just before condemned to die, arrive with the commissioners, they naturally supposed that the inquiry, which was going to be made, would be no way favourable to them.

Appius then told them that the senate had been deeply affected with the complaints of the Lacedæmonians, and could not but disapprove of every thing which had been done with respect to them: the murder of those who, on the promise which Philopœmen had made them, had come to plead their cause; the demolition of the walls of Sparta; the abolition of the laws and institutions of Lycurgus, which had spread the fame of that city throughout the world, and made it flourish for several ages.

Lycortas, both as president of the council, and as being of the same opinion with Philopœmen, the author of whatever had been transacted against Lacedæmon, undertook to answer Appius. He showed, first, that as the Lacedæmonians had attacked the exiles, contrary to the tenor of the treaty, which expressly forbade them to make any attempt against the maritime cities; those exiles, in the absence of the Romans, could have recourse only to the Achæan league, which could not be justly blamed for having assisted them to the utmost of their power, in so urgent a necessity. That with regard to the massacre which Appius laid to their charge, it ought not to be imputed to them, but to the exiles, who were then headed by Areus and Alcibiades; and who, by their own immediate impulse, and without being authorized by the Achæans, had fallen with the utmost fury and violence on those whom they considered the authors of their banishment, and of all the rest of the calamities they had suffered. "However," added Lycortas, "it is pretended that we cannot but own that we were the cause of the abolition of Lycurgus's laws, and the demolition of the walls of Sparta. This, indeed, is a real fact; but then how can this double objection be made to us at the same time? The walls in question were not built by Lycurgus, but by tyrants, who erected them some few years ago, not for the security of the city, but for their own safety, and to enable themselves to abolish, with impunity, the discipline and regulations so happily established by that wise legislator. Were it possible for him to rise now from the grave, he would be overjoyed to see those walls destroyed, and would say that he now recognizes his native country and ancient Sparta. You should not, O citizens of Sparta, have waited for Philopœmen or the Achæans; but ought yourselves to have pulled down those walls with your own hands, and destroyed even the slightest trace of tyranny. These were the ignominious scars of your slavery: and, after having maintained your liberties during almost 800 years, and been in former times the sovereigns of Greece, without the support and assistance of walls; they, for these hundred years, have become the instruments of your slavery, and, in a manner, your shackles and fetters. With respect to the ancient laws of Lycurgus, they were suppressed by the tyrants; and we have only substituted our own, by putting you upon a level with us in all things."

Addressing himself then to Appius, "I cannot forbear owning," says he, "that the words I have hitherto spoken, are not such as should be used from one ally to another, nor by a free nation, but slaves who speak to their master. For, in fine, if the voice of the herald, who proclaimed us, in the first place to be free, was not a vain and empty ceremony; if the treaty concluded at that time be real and solid, if you are desirous of sincerely preserving an alliance and friendship with us; on what can that infinite disparity which you suppose to be between you Romans and us Achæans be grounded? I do not inquire into the treatment which Capua met with, after you had taken that city: why then do you examine into our usage of the Lacedæmonians, after we had conquered them? Some of them were killed: and I will suppose that it was by us. But did not you strike off the heads of several Campanian senators? We levelled the walls of Sparta with the ground; but as for you, Romans, you not only dispossessed the Campanians of their walls, but of their city and lands. To this I know you will reply, that the equality expressed in the treaties between the Romans and Achæans is merely specious, and a bare form of words; that we really have but a precarious and transmitted liberty, but that the Romans are the primary source of authority and empire. Of this, Appius, I am but too sensible. However, since we must submit to this, I entreat you at least, how wide a difference soever you may set between yourselves and us, not to put your enemies and our own upon a level with us, who are your allies; especially not to show them better treatment than you do to us. They require us, by forswearing ourselves, to dissolve and annul all we have enacted by oath, and to revoke that, which by being written in our records, and engraved on marble, in order to preserve the remembrance of it forever, is become a sacred monument which it is not lawful for us to violate. We reverse you, O Romans; and, if you will have it so, we also fear you: but then we think it glorious to have a greater reverence and fear for the immortal gods."

The greatest part of the assembly applauded this speech, and all were unanimous in their opinion, that he had spoken like a true magistrate; it was therefore necessary for the Romans to act with vigour, or resolve to lose their authority. Appius, without descending to particulars, advised them, whilst they still enjoyed their freedom, and had not received any orders, to make a merit with the Romans, of enacting of their own accord what might afterwards be enjoined them. They were grieved at these words; but were instructed by them, not to persist obstinately in the refusal of what should be demanded. All they therefore desired was, that the Romans would decree whatever they pleased with regard to Sparta; but not oblige the Achæans to break their oath, by annulling their decree themselves. As to the sentence that was just before passed against Areus and Alcibiades, it was immediately repealed.

The Romans pronounced judgment the year following.¹ The chief articles of the ordinance were, that those persons who had been condemned by the Achæans should be recalled and restored; that all sentences relating to this affair should be repealed, and that Sparta should continue a member of the Achæan league. Pausanias adds an article not taken notice of by Livy,² that the walls which had been demolished should be rebuilt. Q. Marcius was appointed commissary to settle the affairs of Macedon, and those of Peloponnesus, where great feuds and disturbances subsisted, especially between the Achæans on one side, and the Messenians and Lacedæmonians on the other. They all had sent ambassadors to Rome;³ but it does not appear that the senate was in any great haste to put an end to their differences. The answer they made to the Lacedæmonians was, that the Romans were determined not to trouble themselves any farther about their affairs. The Achæans demanded aid of the Romans against the Messenians, pursuant to the treaty; or at least, not to suffer arms or provisions to be transported out of Italy to the latter people. It was answered them, that when any cities broke their alliance with the Achæans, the senate did not think itself obliged to enter into those disputes; for that this would open a door to raptures and divisions, and even, in some measure, give a sanction to them.

In these proceedings appears the artful and jealous policy of the Romans, which tended solely to weaken Philip and the Achæans, of whose power they were jealous; and who covered their ambitious designs with the specious pretence of succouring the weak and oppressed.

SECTION X.—PHILOPEMEN BESIEGES MESSENE. HE IS TAKEN PRISONER, AND PUT TO DEATH BY THE MESSENIANS. MESSENE SURRENDERED TO THE ACHÆANS. THE SPLENDID FUNERAL PROCESSION OF PHILOPEMEN, WHOSE ASHES ARE CARRIED TO MEGALOPOLIS. SEQUEL OF THE AFFAIR RELATING TO THE SPARTAN EXILES. THE DEATH OF PTOLEMY EPIPHANES, WHO IS SUCCEEDED BY PHILOMETOR HIS SON.

A. M. 3821. DINOCRATES the Messenian,⁴ who Ant. J. C. 183. had a particular enmity to Philopemen, had drawn off Messene from the Achæan league; and was meditating how he might best seize upon a considerable post, called Corone, near that city. Philopemen, then seventy years of age, and generalissimo of the Achæans for the eighth time, was then sick. However, the instant the news of this was brought him, he set out, notwithstanding his indisposition, made a forced march, and advanced towards Messene with a body of forces, not very numerous, but consisting of the flower of the Megalopolitan youth. Dinocrates, who had marched out against him, was soon put to flight; but 500 troopers, who guarded the open country of Messene, happening to come up and reinforce him, he faced about and routed Philopemen. This general, whose sole concern was to save the gallant youths who had followed him in this expedition, performed the most extraordinary acts of bravery; but happening to fall from his horse, and receiving a deep wound in his head, he was taken prisoner by the enemy, who carried him to Messene. Plutarch considers this ill fortune of Philopemen as the punishment for a rash and arrogant expression that had escaped him upon his hearing a certain general applauded: "Ought that man," says he, "to be valued, who suffers himself to be taken alive by the enemy, whilst he has arms to defend himself?"

As soon as the news was brought to Messene, that Philopemen was taken prisoner, and on his way to that city, the Messenians were in such transport of joy that they all ran to the gates of the city; not being able to persuade themselves of the truth of what they heard till they saw him themselves, so greatly improbable did such an event appear to them. To satisfy the violent curiosity of the inhabitants, many of whom had not yet been able to get a sight of him, they were forced to show the illustrious prisoner on the theatre, where multitudes flocked to see him. When they beheld Philopemen dragged along in chains, most of the spectators were so much moved to compassion that the tears trickled from their eyes. There even was heard a murmur among the people, which resulted from humanity and a very laudable gratitude: "That the Messenians ought to call to mind the great services done by Philopemen, and his having preserved the liberty of Achæia by the defeat of Nabis the tyrant." But the magistrates did not suffer him to be long exhibited in this manner, lest the pity of the people should be attended with ill consequences. They therefore took him away on a sudden, and, after consulting together, caused him to be conveyed to a place called the treasury. This was a subterraneous dungeon, whither neither light nor air entered from without; and which had no door to it, but was shut with a huge stone that was rolled over the entrance. In this dungeon they imprisoned Philopemen, and posted a guard round every part of it.

As soon as it was night, and all the people were withdrawn, Dinocrates caused the stone to be rolled away, and the executioner to descend into the dungeon with a dose of poison to Philopemen, commanding him not to stir till he had swallowed it. The moment the illustrious Megalopolitan perceived the light, and saw the man advance towards him, with a lamp in one hand and the bowl of poison in the other, he raised himself with the utmost difficulty, (for he was very weak,) sat down, and then taking the cup, inquired of the executioner, whether he could tell what was become of the young Megalopolitans his followers, and particularly of Lycortas? The executioner answering, that he heard that almost all of them had saved themselves by flight; Philopemen thanked him by a nod, and looking kindly to him, "You bring me," says he, "good news; and I find we are not entirely unfortunate:" after which, without breathing the least complaint, he swallowed the deadly dose, and laid himself again on his cloak. The poison was very speedy in its effects; for Philopemen being extremely weak and feeble, he expired in a moment.

When the news of his death was spread among the Achæans, all their cities were inexpressibly afflicted and dejected. Immediately all their young men who were of age to bear arms, and all their magistrates, came to Megalopolis. Here a grand council being summoned, it was unanimously resolved not to delay a moment taking vengeance for so horrid a deed; and accordingly, having elected on the spot Lycortas for their general, they advanced with the utmost fury into Messenia, and filled every part of it with blood and slaughter. The Messenians, having now no refuge left, and being unable to defend themselves by force of arms, sent a deputation to the Achæans, to desire that an end might be put to the war, and to beg pardon for their past faults. Lycortas, moved at their entreaties, did not think it advisable to treat them as their furious and insolent revolt seemed to deserve. He told them, that there was no other way for them to expect a peace than by delivering up the authors of the revolt, and of the death of Philopemen; by submitting all their affairs to the disposal of the Achæans.

ars, and receiving a garrison into their citadel. These conditions were accepted, and executed immediately. Dinocrates, to prevent the ignominy of dying by an executioner, laid violent hands on himself, in which he was imitated by all those who had advised the putting of Philopemen to death. Lycortas caused those to be delivered up who had advised the insulting of Philopemen. These were undoubtedly the persons who were stoned round his tomb, as we shall soon see.

The funeral obsequies of Philopemen were then solemnized. After the body had been consumed by the flames, his ashes collected, and deposited in an urn, the train set out for Megalopolis. This procession did not so much resemble a funeral as a triumph, or rather it was a mixture of both. First came the infantry, their brows adorned with crowns, and all shedding floods of tears. Then followed the Messenian prisoners bound in chains: afterwards the general's son, young Polybius, carrying the urn, adorned with ribands and crowns, and accompanied by the noblest and most illustrious Achæans. The urn was followed by all the cavalry, whose arms glittered magnificently, and whose horses were all richly caparisoned, who closed the march, and did not seem too much dejected at this mournful scene, nor too much elated from their victory. All the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns and villages flocked to meet the procession, as if they came in honour of a victory obtained. All possible honours were done to Philopemen at his interment, and the Messenian captives were stoned round his sepulchre. The cities in general, by decrees enacted for that purpose, ordered the greatest honours to be paid him, and erected many statues to him with magnificent inscriptions.

Several years after, at the time when Corinth was burned and destroyed by Mummius the proconsul, a false accuser (a Roman) as I observed elsewhere, used his utmost endeavours to get them broken to pieces; prosecuted him criminally, as if alive; charging him with having been an enemy to the Romans, and of discovering a hatred for them on all occasions. The cause was heard in council before Mummius. The slanderer exhibited all his articles of impeachment and produced his proofs. They were answered by Polybius, who refuted them with great solidity and eloquence. It is a great pity so interesting a piece should have been lost. Neither Mummius nor his council would permit the monuments of that great man's glory to be destroyed, though he had opposed, like a bulwark, the successes of the Romans; for the Romans of that age, says Plutarch, made the just and proper discrimination between virtue and interest: they distinguished the glorious and honourable from the profitable; and were persuaded, that worthy persons ought to honour and revere the memory of men who signalized themselves by their virtue, though they had been their enemies.

Livy tells us, that the Greek as well as Roman writers observe, that three illustrious men, Philopemen, Hannibal, and Scipio, happened to die in the same year, or thereabouts; thus putting Philopemen in parallel, and, as it were, upon a level, with the two most celebrated generals of the two most powerful nations in the world. I believe I have already given the reader a sufficient idea of his character, so shall only repeat what I before observed, that Philopemen was called the last of the Greeks, as Brutus was said to be the last of the Romans.

The Messenians, by their imprudent conduct, being reduced to the most deplorable condition, were, by the goodness and generosity of Lycortas and the Achæans, restored to the league from which they had withdrawn themselves. Several other cities, which, from the example they set them, had also renounced it, renewed their alliance with it. Such commonly is the happy effect which a seasonable act of clemency produces; whereas a violent and excessive severity, that breathes nothing but blood and vengeance, often hurries people to despair; and so far from proving a remedy to evils, only inflames and exasperates them the more.

When news came to Rome that the Achæans had happily terminated their war with the Messenians, the ambassadors were addressed in terms quite different from those which had been used to them before. The senate told them, that they had been particularly careful not to suffer either arms or provisions to be carried from Italy to Messene; an answer which manifestly discovers the insincerity of the Romans, and the little regard they had to good faith in their transactions with other nations. They seemed, at first, desirous of giving the signal to all the cities engaged in the Achæan league, to take up arms; and now, they endeavoured to flatter the Achæans into an opinion, that they had sought all opportunities to serve them.

It is manifest on this occasion, that the Roman senate consented to what had been transacted, because it was not in their power to oppose it; that they wanted to make a merit of this with the Achæans, who possessed almost the whole force of Peloponnesus: that they were very cautious of giving the least umbrage to this league, at a time when they could place no dependence on Philip; when the Ætolians were disgusted; and when Antiochus, by joining with that people, might engage in some enterprise which might have been of ill consequence to the Romans.

I have related Hannibal's death in the history of the Carthaginians.¹ After retiring from Antiochus's court, he had fled to Prusias, king of Bithynia, who was then at war with Eumenes, king of Pergamus. Hannibal did that prince great service. Both sides were preparing for a naval engagement, on which occasion Eumenes's fleet consisted of a much greater number of ships than that of Prusias. But Hannibal opposed stratagem to force. He had got together a great number of venomous serpents, and had filled several earthen vessels with them. The instant the signal for battle was given, he commanded the officers and sailors to fall upon Eumenes's galley only (informing them at the same time of a sign by which they should distinguish it from the rest); and to annoy the enemy no otherwise than by throwing the earthen vessels into the rest of the galleys. At first this was only laughed at; the sailors not imagining that these earthen vessels could be of the least service: but when the serpents were seen gliding over every part of the galleys, the soldiers and rowers now studious only of preserving themselves from those venomous creatures, did not once think of the enemy. In the mean time, the royal galley was so warmly attacked, that it was very near being taken; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the king made his escape. Prusias, by Hannibal's assistance, gained several victories by land. This prince being one day afraid to venture a battle, because the victims had not been propitious: "What,"² says Hannibal, "do you rely more upon the liver of a beast than upon the advice and experience of Hannibal?" To prevent his falling into the hands of the Romans who required Prusias to deliver him up, he took a dose of poison, which brought him to his end.³

³ [The obscure village of Libyssa was the place where Hannibal died. It has been generally supposed to be the modern Ghebze, or Ghebsa; a small dirty town, chiefly inhabited by Turks, at some distance from the northern shore of the Gulf of Nicomedia, and remarkable for a tumulus, or mound, supposed to be the monument of that celebrated commander. But a learned antiquary and classical geographer, Colonel Leake, has shown this to be a mistake. He says, that Ghebsa, pronounced Ghivizah by both Turks and Greeks, is more probably the successor of Daebizya, the word when written in Greek Κιβύζα, being probably the ancient Δαβύζα, with the loss of the first syllable. He farther remarks that the 36 or 39 Roman miles, placed in the itinerary between Chalcedonia and Libyssa, will not agree so well with the distance from Scutari to Ghebsa, as with

² Thirty seven years

A. M. 3822. I before observed,¹ that the Romans, among many other articles, had decreed, that Sparta should be admitted into the Achæan league.

The ambassadors being returned, and having reported the answer which had been received from the senate, Lycortas assembled the people at Sicyon, to deliberate whether Sparta should be admitted into the Achæan league. To incline the populace to acquiesce in this proposition, he represented that the Romans, to whose disposal that city had been abandoned, would no longer be burdened with it; that they had declared to the ambassadors that they were no wise concerned in this affair; that the Spartans who were engaged in the administration of public affairs were very desirous of that union, which (he observed) could not fail of being attended with great advantage to the Achæan league, as the first exiles, who had behaved with great ingratitude and impiety towards them, would not be included in it; but would be banished from the city, and other citizens substituted in their room. Diophanes and some other persons undertook to defend the cause of the exiles. However, notwithstanding their opposition, the council decreed that Sparta should be admitted into the league, and accordingly it was so. With regard to the first exiles, those only were pardoned, who could not be convicted of engaging in any attempt against the Achæan republic.

When the affair was ended, ambassadors were sent to Rome, in the name of all the parties concerned. The senate, after giving audience to those sent by Sparta and by the exiles, said nothing to the ambassadors, which tended to show that they were disgusted at what had passed. With respect to those who had been lately sent into banishment, the senate promised to write to the Achæans, to obtain leave for them to return into their native country. Some days after Bippus, the Achæan deputy, being arrived in Rome, was introduced into the senate; and there gave an account of the manner in which the Messenians had been restored to their former state; and the senators were not only satisfied with every thing he related to them, but treated him with abundant marks of honour and amity.

The Lacedæmonian exiles² were A. M. 3823. no sooner returned from Rome into Ant. J. C. 181. Peloponnesus, than they delivered to the Achæans the letters which the senate had sent by them, and by which they were desired to permit the exiles to settle again in their native country. It was answered, that the purport of those letters should be considered at the return of the Achæan ambassadors from Rome. Bippus arrived from thence a few days after, and declared that the senate had written in favour of the exiles, not so much out of affection for them, as to get rid of their importunities. The Achæans hearing this, thought it requisite not to make any change in what had been decreed.

that to Malsum; which small village he takes to correspond to the ancient Libyssa. This village of Malsum is three hours south of Ghebsa, on the northern shore of the Gulf of Nicomedie; where a long tongue of land, projecting from the opposite shore, affords a convenient ferry of two miles across, to the south side of the gulf. This ferry is called the ferry of the Dil, or Tongue; and, being much frequented, is well supplied with large boats and constant attendance, and the persons employed in it are lodged in tents by the water side. Plutarch also appears to confirm the supposition; for, in mentioning Libyssa, he speaks of a sandy place, which corresponds to the promontory of Dil, or the Tongue. Therefore, if Ghevizza be supposed a corruption, not of Libyssa, as commonly believed, but of Decibiza; and if the distance of the modern Malsum corresponds to that of 3 Roman miles, stated in the itinerary, between Chalcidonia (Scutari) and Libyssa; and to the remark of Plutarch above mentioned—then Malsum, and not Ghebsa, represents the ancient Libyssa.

In the Peutingerian Tables Libyssa is written Livissa. A tomb, however, has been lately discovered at Malta, with this plain inscription, "Hannibal, the Son of Hamilcar;" and if it could be established that there was no other Hannibal, son of Hamilcar, than this celebrated commander, it would overturn the general opinion, or rather universal opinion, that Hannibal died by a voluntary death at Libyssa.]

² Ibid. c. liv.

Hyperbates,³ having been elected general of the Achæans, again debated in the council, whether any notice should be taken of the letters which the senate had written, concerning the re-establishment of the exiles who had been banished from Sparta. Lycortas was of opinion, that the Achæans ought to adhere to what had been decreed. "When the Romans," says he, "listen favourably to such complaints and entreaties of unfortunate persons, as appear to them just and reasonable, they, in this, act a very becoming part. But when it is represented to them, that among the favours which are requested at their hands, some are not in their power to bestow, and others would reflect dishonour, and be very prejudicial to their allies, on these occasions they do not use to persist obstinately in their opinions, or exact from such allies an implicit obedience to their commands. This is exactly our case at present. Let us inform the Romans, that we cannot obey their orders without infringing the sacred oaths we have taken, without violating the laws on which our league is founded; and then they will undoubtedly waive their resolutions, and confess that it is with the greatest reason we refuse to obey their commands." Hyperbates and Callicrates were of a contrary opinion. They were for having implicit obedience paid to the Romans; and declared that all laws, oaths, and treaties, ought to be sacrificed to their will. In this contrariety of opinions, it was resolved that a deputation should be sent to the senate, in order to represent the reasons given by Lycortas in council. Callicrates, Lysiades, and Aratus were the ambassadors, to whom instructions were given in conformity to what had been deliberated.

When these ambassadors were arrived at Rome, Callicrates, being introduced into the senate, acted in direct opposition to his instructions. He not only had the assurance to censure those who differed in opinion from him, but took the liberty to tell the senate what they ought to do. "If the Greeks," says he, directing himself to the senators, "do not obey you; if they pay no regard either to the letters or orders which you send them, you must blame yourselves alone for it. In all the states of Greece, there are now two parties; one of which asserts, that all your orders ought to be obeyed, and that laws and treaties, in a word, that all things should pay homage to your will and pleasure; the other party pretends, that it is fitting that laws, treaties, and oaths, ought to take place of your will; and are forever exhorting the people to adhere inviolably to them. Of these two parties the last suits best with the genius and character of the Achæans, and has the greatest influence over the people. What is the consequence of this? That those who comply with your measures are detested by the common people, whilst such as oppose your decrees are honoured and applauded. Whereas, if the senate would show favour to such as espouse their interest cordially, the chief magistrates and officers of all the republics would instantly declare for the Romans; and the people, intimidated by this, would soon follow their example. But, whilst you show an indifference on this head, you must expect that all the chiefs will certainly oppose you, as the infallible means of acquiring the love and respect of the people. And accordingly we see, that many people, whose only merit consists in their making the strongest opposition to your orders, and a pretended zeal for the defence and preservation of the laws of their country, have been raised to the most exalted employments in their states. In case you do not much care whether the Greeks are, or are not, at your devotion, then indeed your present conduct suits exactly your sentiments. But if you would have them execute your orders, and receive your letters with respect, reflect seriously on this matter; otherwise be assured that they will, on all occasions, declare against your commands. You may judge of the truth of this from their present behaviour towards you. How long is it since you commanded them, by your letters, to recall the Lacedæmonian exiles? Nevertheless, so far from recalling them, they have published a quite contrary decree, and have bound themselves by oath never to reinstate them. This ought to be a lesson to you, and show how cautious you should be for the future."

Callicrates, after making this speech, withdrew. The exiles then came in, told their business in a few words, but in such as were well adapted to move compassion, and then retired.

A speech so well calculated to favour the interest of Rome as that of Callicrates, could not but be very agreeable to the senate. Thus it was that the Greeks began to throw themselves spontaneously into the arms of slavery, prostituted of their own accord the liberty of which their ancestors had been so jealous, and paid a submission and homage to the Romans, which they had always refused to the Great King of Persia. Some flatterers and ambitious traitors, regardless of every thing but their own interest, sold and sacrificed the independence and glory of Greece for ever; discovered the weak side of republics with regard to their internal constitution; pointed out the methods by which they might be weakened, and at last crushed; and furnished themselves the chains in which they were to be bound.

In consequence of this speech, it was soon concluded, that it would be proper to increase the power and credit of those who made it their business to defend the authority of the Romans, and to humble such as should presume to oppose it. Polybius observes, that this was the first time that the fatal resolution was taken, to humble and depress those who, in their respective countries, had the most noble way of thinking; and, on the contrary, to heap riches and honours on all such who, either right or wrong, should declare in favour of the Romans; a resolution which soon after increased the herd of flatterers in all the republics, and very much lessened the number of the true friends of liberty. From this period the Romans made it one of the constant maxims of their policy, to oppress by all possible methods whoever ventured to oppose their ambitious projects. This single maxim may serve as a key to the latent principles and motives of the government of this republic, and show us what idea we ought to entertain of the pretended equity and moderation they sometimes display, but which does not long support itself, and of which a just judgment cannot be formed but by the consequences.

To conclude, the senate, in order to get the exiles restored to their country, did not think it sufficient to write to the Achæans alone, but to the Ætolians, Epicrotes, Athenians, Boeotians, and Acarnanians, as if they intended to incense all Greece against the Achæans. And, in their answer to the ambassadors, they did not make the least mention of any one but Callicrates, whose example, the senate observed, it would be well for the magistrates of all other cities to follow.

That deputy, after receiving this answer, returned in triumph, without reflecting that he was the cause of all the calamities which Greece, and particularly Achaia, were upon the point of experiencing. For hitherto, a sort of equality had been observed between the Achæans and Romans, which the latter thought fit to permit, out of gratitude for the considerable services the Achæans had done them; and for the inviolable fidelity with which they had adhered to them in the most perilous junctures, as in the wars against Philip and Antiochus. The members of this league distinguished themselves at that time in a most conspicuous manner by their authority, their forces, their zeal for liberty; and, above all, by the shining merit and exalted reputation of their commanders. But Callicrates's treason (for we may justly bestow that name upon it) gave it a deadly wound. The Romans, says Polybius, noble in their sentiments, and full of humanity, are moved at the complaints of the wretched, and think it their duty to afford their aid to all who fly to them for protection; and this it was that inclined them to favour the cause of the Lacedæmonian exiles. But if any one, on whose fidelity they may safely depend, suggests to them the inconveniences they would bring upon themselves should they grant certain favours, they generally return to a just way of thinking, and correct, so far as lies in their power, what they may have done amiss. Here, on the contrary, Callicrates studies nothing but how he may best work upon their passions by flattery. He had been sent to Rome, to plead the cause of the Achæans, and, by a criminal and unparalleled prevarication, he declares against his clients; and becomes the advocate of their enemies, by whom he had suffered himself to be corrupted. At his return to Achaia, he spread so artfully the terror of the Roman name, and intimidated the people to such a degree that he got himself elected captain-general. He was no sooner invested with this command, than he restored the exiles of Lacedæmonia and Messene to their country.

Polybius, on this occasion, praises exceedingly the humanity of the Romans, the tenderness with which they listen to the complaints of the unfortunate, and the readiness to atone for such unjust actions as they may have committed, when they are once made acquainted with them. I know not whether the applauses he gives them will not admit of great abatement. The reader must call to mind that he wrote this in Rome, and under the eye of the Romans, after Greece had been reduced to a state of slavery. We are not to expect from an historian, in a state of submission and dependence, so much veracity as he very possibly would have observed in a state of freedom, and at a time when men were permitted to speak the truth: and we must not blindly believe every circumstance of this kind advanced by him; facts have more force, and speak in a clearer manner, than he does. The Romans were not eager to commit injustice themselves, whenever they had an opportunity of employing foreign means for that purpose, which procured them the same advantage, and served to conceal their unjust policy.

Eumenes, I in the mean time, was engaged in war against Pharnaces, A. M. 3822. king of Pontus. The latter took Sinope, a very strong city of Pontus, Ant. J. C. 182. of which his successors remained in possession ever afterwards. Several cities made complaints against this at Rome. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, who was united in interest with Eumenes, sent also ambassadors thither. The Romans several times employed their mediation and authority to put an end to their differences; but Pharnaces was insincere on these occasions, and always broke his engagements. Contrary to the faith of treaties, he took the field, and was opposed by the confederate kings. Several enterprises ensued; and after some years had been spent in this manner, a peace was concluded.

Never were more embassies sent than at the time we are now speaking of. A. M. 3824. Ambassadors were seen in Ant. J. C. 180. all places, either coming from the provinces to Rome, or going from Rome to the provinces, or from the allies and nations to one another. The Achæans deputed, in this quality (to Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt), Lycortas, Polybius his son, and the young Aratus, to return that monarch thanks for the presents he had already bestowed on their republic, and the new offers he had made them. However, these ambassadors did not leave Achaia, because, when they were preparing to set out, advice came that Ptolemy was dead.

This prince, after having overcome the rebels within his kingdom, A. M. 3824. as has been already mentioned, Ant. J. C. 180. resolved to attack Seleucus, king of Syria. When he began to form the plan for carrying on this war, one of his principal officers asked by what methods he would raise money for the execution of it. He replied that his friends were his treasure. The principal courtiers concluded from this answer, that as he considered their purses as the only fund he had to carry on this war, they were upon the point of being ruined by it. To prevent therefore that consequence, which had more weight with them than the allegiance they owed their sovereign, they caused him to be poisoned. This monarch was thus despatched in his twenty-ninth year, after he had sitten twenty-four years on the throne. Ptolemy Philometor, his son, who was but six years of age, succeeded him, and Cleopatra his mother was declared regent.

CHAPTER II.

SECTION I.—COMPLAINTS MADE AT ROME AGAINST PHILIP. DEMETRIUS, HIS SON, WHO WAS IN THAT CITY, IS SENT BACK TO HIS FATHER, ACCOMPANIED BY SOME AMBASSADORS. A SECRET CONSPIRACY OF PERSEUS AGAINST HIS BROTHER DEMETRIUS WITH REGARD TO THE SUCCESSION TO THE THRONE. HE ACCUSES HIM BEFORE PHILIP. SPEECHES OF BOTH THOSE PRINCES. PHILIP, UPON A NEW IMPEACHMENT, CAUSES DEMETRIUS TO BE PUT TO DEATH; BUT AFTERWARDS DISCOVERS HIS INNOCENCE AND PERSEUS'S GUILT. WHILST PHILIP IS MEDITATING TO PUNISH THE LATTER, HE DIES, AND PERSEUS SUCCEEDS HIM.

EVER since the spreading of a report among the states contiguous to Macedonia,¹ that such as went to Rome to complain against Philip were heard there, and that many of them had found their advantage in having so done; a great number of cities, and even private persons, made their complaints in that city, against a prince who was a very troublesome neighbour to them all; with the hopes either of having the injuries redressed which they pretended to have received; or, at least, to console themselves in some measure for them, by being allowed the liberty to deplore them. King Eumenes, among the rest, to whom, by order of the Roman commissioners and senate, the fortresses in Thrace, were to be given up, sent ambassadors, at whose head was Athenæus his brother, to inform the senate that Philip did not withdraw his garrisons in Thrace, as he had promised; and to complain of his sending succour into Bithynia to Prusias, who was then at war with Eumenes.

Demetrius, the son of Philip, king of Macedon, was at that time in Rome, whither, as has been already mentioned, he had been sent by his father, in order to watch over his interests in that city. It was naturally his business to answer the several accusations brought against his father: but the senate, imagining that this would be a very difficult task for so young a prince, who was not accustomed to speak in public; to spare him that trouble, sent to him to inquire, whether the king his father had not given him some memorials; and contented themselves with his reading them. Philip therein justified himself to the best of his power, with respect to most of the articles which were exhibited against him; but he especially showed how much he was displeased at the decrees which the Roman commissioners had enacted against him, and at the treatment he had met with from them. The senate saw plainly what all this tended to; and as the young prince endeavoured to apologize for certain particulars, and with respect to others, assured them that every thing should be done agreeably to the will of the Romans, the senate replied, that his father Philip could not have done more wisely, nor what was more agreeable to them, than in sending his son Demetrius to make his excuses; that, as to past transactions, the senate might dissemble, forget, and bear with a great many things: that, as to the future, they relied on the promise which Demetrius gave: that although he was going to leave Rome, in order to return to Macedon, he left there (as the hostage of his inclinations) his own good will and attachment for Rome, which he might retain inviolably, without infringing in any manner the duty he owed his father: that out of regard to him, ambassadors should be sent to Macedon, to rectify, peaceably and without noise, what ever might have been hitherto amiss: and that, as to the rest, the senate was well pleased to let Philip know, that he was obliged to his son Demetrius for the tenderness with which the Romans behaved towards him. These marks of distinction which the senate gave him with the view of exalting his credit in his father's court, only animated envy against him, and at length occasioned his destruction.

The return of Demetrius to Macedon,² and the arrival of the ambassadors, produced different effects, according to the various dispositions of men's minds. The people, who extremely feared the consequences of a rupture with the Romans, and the war that was preparing, were highly pleased with Demetrius, from the hopes that he would be the mediator and author of a peace; not to mention that they considered him as the successor to the throne of Macedon, after the demise of his father. For though he was the younger son, he had one great advantage over his brother, and that was, his being born of a mother who was Philip's lawful wife; whereas Perseus was the son of a concubine, and even reputed supposititious. Besides, it was not doubted but that the Romans would place Demetrius on his father's throne, Perseus not having any credit with them. And these were the common reports.

On one side also, Perseus was greatly uneasy; as he feared, that the advantage of being another brother would be but a very feeble title against a brother superior to him in all other respects: and on the other, Philip, imagining that it would not be in his power to dispose of the throne as he pleased, beheld with a jealous eye, and dreaded, the too great influence of his younger son. It was also a great mortification to him to see rising, in his lifetime, and before his eyes, a kind of second court in the concourse of Macedonians who crowded about Demetrius. The young prince himself did not take sufficient care to prevent or soothe the growing disaffection to his person. Instead of endeavouring to suppress envy by gentleness, modesty, and complaisance, he only inflamed and exasperated it, by a certain air of haughtiness which he had brought with him from Rome, valuing himself upon the marks of distinction with which he had been honoured in that city; and not scrupling to declare that the senate had granted him many things which they had before refused his father.

Philip's discontent was still more inflamed on the arrival of the new ambassadors, to whom his son paid his court more assiduously than to himself; and when he found he should be obliged to abandon Thrace, to withdraw his garrisons from that country, and to execute other things, either pursuant to the decrees of the first commissioners, or to the fresh orders he had received from Rome; orders and decrees with which he complied very much against his will, and with the highest secret resentment; but with which he was forced to comply, to prevent his being involved in a war for which he was not sufficiently prepared. To remove all suspicion of his harbouring the least design that way, he carried his arms into the very heart of Thrace, against people with whom the Romans did not concern themselves in any manner.

However,³ his inclinations were not unknown at Rome. Marcus, one of the commissioners, who had communicated the orders of the senate to Philip, wrote to Rome to inform them, that all the king's discourses, and the several steps he took, visibly threatened an approaching war. To make himself the more secure of the maritime cities, he forced all the inhabitants, with their families, to leave them; and settled them in the most northern part of Macedon; and substituted in their places Thracians, and other barbarous nations, on whom he believed he might more securely depend. These changes occasioned a general murmur in every part of Macedon; and all the provinces echoed with the cries and complaints of these poor unhappy people, who were forced away in unknown countries. Nothing was heard on all sides but imprecations and curses against the king who was the author of these innovations.

He had put to death a great number of persons, upon suspicion that they favoured the Romans. He thought his own life could not be safe, but by retaining their children in his own power, and he imprisoned them under a strong guard, in order to have them all destroyed one after another. Nothing could be more horrid in itself than such a design; but the sad catastrophe of one of the most powerful and most illustrious families in Thessaly, made it still more execrable.

He had put to death, many years before, Herodiscus, one of the principal persons of the country, and, some time after, his two sons-in-law. Theoxena and Archo, his two daughters, had continued widows, each of them having a son, both very young. Theoxena, who was sought for in marriage by the richest and most powerful noblemen in Thessaly, preferred widowhood to the nuptial state; but Archo married a nobleman of the Ænean nation, called Poris, and brought him several children, whom Archo, dying early, left infants. Theoxena, that she might have an opportunity of bringing up her sister's children under her eye, married Poris; took the same care of them as she did of her own son; and was as tender to them as if she had been their mother. When news was brought her of Philip's cruel edict, to confine the children of those who had been put to death; plainly foreseeing that they would be given up to the brutal fury of the king and his officers, she formed a surprising resolution, declaring that she would imbrue her hands in the blood of all her children, rather than suffer them to fall into the merciless power of Philip.

Poris, whose soul was struck with horror at this design, told her, in order to divert her from it, that he would send all their children to Athens, to some friends on whose fidelity and humanity he could safely rely, and that he himself would convey them thither. Accordingly, they all set out from Thessalonica, in order to sail to the city of Æneæ, to assist at a solemn festival, which was solemnized annually in honour of Æneæ their founder. Having spent the whole day in festivity and rejoicing, about midnight, when every body else was asleep, they embarked on board a galley which Poris had prepared for them, as if intending to return to Thessalonica, but in reality, to go to Eubœa; when, unhappily, a contrary wind prevented them from advancing forwards in spite of their utmost efforts, and drove them back towards the coast. At daybreak, the king's officers, who were posted to guard the port, having perceived them, immediately sent off an armed sloop; commanding the captain of it, upon the severest penalties, not to return without the galley. As it drew nearer, Poris was seen every moment, either exhorting the ship's company, in the strongest terms, to exert themselves to the utmost in order to get forward; or lifting up his hands to heaven, and imploring the assistance of the gods. In the mean time, Theoxena, resuming her former resolution, and presenting to her children the poison she had prepared, and the daggers she had brought with her: "Death," says she "alone can free you from your miseries; and here is what will procure you that last sad refuge. Secure yourselves from the king's horrid cruelty by the method you like best. Go, my dear children, such of you as are more advanced in years, and take these poignant; or, in case a slower kind of death may be more grateful, take this poison." The enemy were now nearly close to them, and the mother was very urgent. They obeyed her commands, and all, after having swallowed the deadly draughts, or plunged the daggers in their bosoms, were thrown into the sea. Theoxena, after giving her husband a last sad embrace, leaped into the sea with him. Philip's officers then seized the galley, but did not find one person alive in it.

The horror of this tragical event revived and inflamed, to a prodigious degree, the hatred against Philip. He was publicly detested as a bloody tyrant; and people vented, in all places, both against him and his children, dreadful imprecations, which, says Livy soon had their effect; the gods having abandoned him to a blind fury, which prompted him to wreak his vengeance against his own children.

Perseus saw, with infinite pain and affliction, that the regard of the Macedonians for his brother Demetrius, and his credit and authority among the Romans, increased daily. Having now no hopes left of being able to ascend the throne but by criminal methods, he made them his only refuge. He began, by sounding the disposition of those who were in the greatest favour with the king, and by addressing them in obscure and ambiguous words. At first, some seemed not to enter into his views, and rejected his proposals, from believing that there was more to be hoped from Demetrius. But afterwards, observing that the hatred of Philip for the Romans increased sensibly, which Perseus endeavoured daily to inflame, and which Demetrius, on the contrary, opposed to the utmost, they changed their opinion. Judging naturally that the latter, whose youth and inexperience made him not sufficiently upon his guard against the artifices of his brother, would at last fall a victim to them; they thought it their interest to promote an event which would happen without their participation, and to go over immediately to the strongest party. They accordingly did so, and devoted themselves entirely to Perseus.

Having postponed the execution of their more remote designs, they were of opinion, that for the present it would be proper for them to employ their utmost efforts to exasperate the king against the Romans, and to inspire him with thoughts of war, to which he was already very much inclined. At the same time, to render Demetrius every day more suspected, they industriously, on all occasions, made the discourse turn in the king's presence upon the Romans; some expressing the utmost contempt for their laws and customs, others for their exploits; some for the city of Rome, which according to them, was void of ornaments and magnificent buildings; and others, even for such of the Romans as were in highest estimation; making them all pass in this manner in a kind of review. Demetrius, who did not perceive the scope and tendency of all these discourses, never failed, out of zeal for the Romans, and by way of contradiction to his brother, to take fire on these occasions. Hence, without considering the consequences, he rendered himself suspected and odious to the king, and opened the way for the accusations and calumnies preparing against him. Accordingly, his father did not communicate to him any of the designs, which he was continually meditating against Rome, and unbosomed himself only to Perseus.

Some ambassadors whom he had sent to the Bastarnæ, to desire aid from them, returned about the time we are now speaking of. They had brought with them several youths of quality, and even princes of the blood, one of whom promised his sister in marriage to one of Philip's sons. This new alliance with a powerful nation very much exalted the king's courage. Perseus taking advantage of this opportunity, "Of what use," says he, "can all this be to us? We have not so much to hope from foreign aid, as to dread from domestic foes. We harbour in our bosoms, I will not say a traitor, but at least a spy. The Romans, ever since he was a hostage among them, have restored us his body; but as to his heart and inclinations, those he has left with them. Almost all the Macedonians fix already their eyes on him, and are persuaded, that they shall never have any king but him whom the Romans shall please to set over them." By such speeches, the old king's disgust was perpetually kept up, who was already but too much alienated from Demetrius.

About this time the army was reviewed, at a festival solemnized every year with religious pomp, the ceremonies whereof were as follow: A bitch, says Livy, is divided into two parts;² being cut long-wise through the middle of the body, after which half is laid on each side of the road. The troops under arms are made to march between the two parts of the victim thus divided. At the head of this march, the shining arms of all the kings of Macedon are carried, tracing them backwards to the most remote antiquity. The king, with the princes his children, appear afterwards, followed by all the royal household, and the companies of guards. The march is closed by the multitude of the Macedonians. On the present occasion, the two princes walked on each side of the king; Perseus being thirty years of age, and Demetrius twenty-five; the one in the vigour, the other in the flower of his age; sons who might have formed their father's happiness, had his mind been rightly disposed and reasonable.

² We find in Scripture, the like ceremony, in which, in order for the concluding of a treaty, the two contracting parties pass between the parts of the victim divided.—Jer. xxiv. 18.

The custom was, after the sacrifices which accompanied this ceremony were over, to exhibit a kind of tournament, and to divide the army into two bodies, who fought with no other arms than foils, and represented a battle. The two bodies of men were commanded by the two young princes. However, this was not a mere mock battle; all the men exerted themselves with their blunted weapons, with as much ardour as if they had been disputing for the throne. Several were wounded on both sides; and nothing but swords were wanting to make it a real battle. The body commanded by Demetrius had very much the superiority. This advantage gave great unbrage to Perseus. His friends, on the contrary, rejoiced at it, judging that this would be a very favourable and natural opportunity for him to form an accusation against his brother.

The two princes, on that day, gave a grand entertainment to the soldiers of their respective parties. Perseus, whom his brother had invited to his banquet, refused to come. The joy was very great on both sides, and the guests drank in proportion. During the entertainment, much discourse passed about the battle; and the guests intermixed their speeches with jests and railery (some of which were very sharp) against those of the contrary party, without sparing even the leaders. Perseus had sent a spy to observe all that should be said at his brother's banquet; but four young persons, who came by accident out of the hall, having discovered this spy, gave him very rough treatment. Demetrius, who had not heard of what had happened, said to the company: "Let us go and conclude our feast at my brother's, to soften his pain (if he has any remaining) by an agreeable surprise, which will show that we act with frankness and sincerity; and do not harbour any malice against him." Immediately all cried that they would go, those excepted who were afraid that their ill treatment of the spy would be revenged. But Demetrius forcing them thither also, they concealed swords under their robes, in order to defend themselves in case there should be occasion. When discord reigns in families, it is impossible for any thing to be kept secret in them. A man, running hastily before, went to Perseus, and told him that Demetrius was coming, and had four men well armed in his train. He might easily have guessed the cause of it, as he knew that they were the persons who had ill treated the spy. Nevertheless, to make this action still more criminal, Perseus orders the doors to be locked; and then, from the window of an upper apartment which looked into the street, cries aloud to his servants not to open the door to wretches who were come with arms in their hands to assassinate them. Demetrius, who was a little warm with wine after having complained, in a loud and angry tone of voice, at being refused admittance, returned back, and again sat down to table, still ignorant of the affair relating to Perseus's spy.

The next day, as soon as Perseus could get an opportunity to approach his father, he entered his apartment with a very dejected air, and continued some time in his presence, but at a little distance, without opening his mouth. Philip, being greatly surprised at his silence, asked what could be the cause of the concern which appeared in his countenance? "It is," answers Perseus, "by the merest good fortune in the world that you see me here alive. My brother now no longer lays secret snares for me: he came in the night to my house, at the head of a body of armed men, purposely to assassinate me. I had no other way left to secure myself from his fury, but by shutting my doors, and keeping the wall between him and me." Perseus, perceiving by his father's countenance, that he was struck with astonishment and dread: "If you will condescend," says he, "to listen a moment to me, you shall be fully acquainted with the whole state of the affair." Philip answered, that he would willingly hear him; and immediately ordered Demetrius to be sent for. At the same time he sent for Lysimachus and Onomastes, to ask their advice on this occasion. These two men, who were his intimate friends, were far advanced in years. They had not concerned themselves with the quarrel of the two princes, and appeared very seldom at court. Philip, whilst he waited for their coming, walked several times up and down his apartment alone, revolving in his mind a variety of thoughts; his son Perseus standing all the time at a distance. When word was brought Philip that his two venerable friends were come, he withdrew to an inner apartment with them, and as many of his life-guards; and permitted each of his sons to bring three persons, unarmed, along with him; and having taken his seat, he spoke to them as follows:

"Behold in me an unhappy father, forced to sit as judge between my two sons, one the accuser, and the other the accused, of fratricide; reduced to the sad necessity of finding in one of them, either a criminal or a false accuser. For a long time, indeed, from certain expressions which I have overheard, and from your behaviour towards each other, (a behaviour no way suiting brothers,) I have been afraid this storm would break over my head. And yet I hoped, from time to time, that your discontents and disgusts would soften, and your suspicions vanish away. I recollected, that contending kings and princes, laying down their arms, had frequently contracted alliances and friendships; and that private men had suppressed their animosities. I flattered myself, that you would one day remember the endearing name of brethren, by which you are united; those happy years of infancy which you spent in simplicity and union; in fine, the counsels of a father so often repeated; counsels which, alas! I am afraid have been given to children deaf and indocile to my voice. How many times, after setting before you examples of discord between brothers, have I represented its fatal consequences, by showing you that they had thereby involved themselves in inevitable ruin; and not only themselves, but their children, families, and kingdoms? On the other side, I proposed good examples for your imitation: the strict union between the two kings of Lacedæmonia, so advantageous during several centuries to themselves and their country; whereas division and private interest changed the monarchic government into tyranny, and proved the destruction of Sparta. By what other method, than by fraternal concord, did the two brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, from such weak beginnings as almost reflected dishonour on the regal dignity, rise to a pitch of power equal to mine, to that of Antiochus, and of all the kings we know? I even did not scruple to cite examples from the Romans, of which I myself had either been an eye-witness, or heard from others; as the two brothers, Titus and Lucius Quintius, who were both engaged in war with me: the two Scipios, Publius and Lucius, who defeated and subjected Antiochus: their father and their uncle, who, having been inseparable during their lives, were undivided in death. Neither the crimes of the one, though attended with such fatal consequences; nor the virtues of the other, though crowned with such happy success, have been able to make you abhor division and discord, or to inspire you with gentle and pacific sentiments. Both of you, even in my life-time, have turned your eyes and guilty desires upon my throne. You suffer me to live, just so long as that, surviving one of you, I secure my crown to the other by my death. The fond names of father and brother are insupportable to both. Your souls are strangers to tenderness and duty. A restless desire of reigning has banished all other sentiments from your breasts, and entirely engrosses you. But come, let me hear what each of you have to say. Pollute the ears of your parent with your accusations, whether real or feigned. Open your criminal mouths; mutually vent your slanders, and afterwards arm your parricidal hands one against the other. I am ready to hear all you have to say, firmly determined to shut my ears eternally from henceforth against the secret whispers and accusations of brother against brother." Philip having spoken these last words with great emotion and an angry tone of voice, all who were present wept, and continued a long time in a mournful silence.

At last, Perseus spoke as follows:—"I perceive plainly, that I ought to have opened my door in the dead of night; to have admitted the assassins into my house, and presented my throat to their murderous swords, since guilt is not believed till it has been perpetrated; and since I, who was so inhumanly attacked, receive the same injurious reproaches as the aggressor. People have but too much reason to say, that you consider Demetrius alone as your true son; whilst I am looked upon as a stranger, sprung from a concubine, or even a supposititious child. For, did your breast glow with the tenderness which a father ought to have for his child, you would not think it just to inveigh so bitterly against me, (for whose life so many snares have been laid,) but against him who contrived them; and you would not think my life of so little consequence, as to be entirely unmoved at the imminent danger I have escaped, and at that to which I shall be exposed, should the guilt of my enemies be suffered to go unpunished. If I must die without being suffered to complain, be it so; let me be silent, and be contented with beseeching the gods, that the crime which was begun in my person, may end in it, and not extend to you. But if I may be allowed to do with regard to you on the present occasion, what nature suggests to those who, seeing themselves attacked unawares in a desert, implore the assistance even of those whom they had never seen; if when I see swords drawn against me, I may be permitted to utter a plaintive and supplicating voice; I conjure you by the tender name of father, (for which whether my brother or I have had the greatest reverence, you yourself have long known,) to listen to me at this time, as you would, if, awakened suddenly from your sleep by the tumult of what passed last night, chance had brought you, at the instant of my danger, and in the midst of my complaints; and you had found Demetrius at my door, attended by persons in arms. What I should have told you yesterday, in the greatest emotion and petrified with fear, I say to you to-day.

"Brother, for a long time we have not lived together like persons desirous of sharing in parties of pleasure. Your predominant wish is to reign; but you find an invincible obstacle in my age, the law of nations, the ancient customs of Macedonia; and a still stronger circumstance, in my father's will and pleasure. It will be impossible for you ever to force these barriers, and to ascend the throne, but by imbruing your hands in my blood. To compass your horrid ends, you leave nothing untried, and set every engine at work. Hitherto, either my vigilance, or my good fortune, has preserved me from your murderous hands. Yesterday, at the review, and the ceremony of the tournament which followed it, the battle, by your contrivance, became almost bloody and fatal; and I escaped death only by suffering myself and my followers to be defeated. From this fight, which was really a combat between enemies, you insidiously wanted (as if what had passed had been only the diversion of brothers) to allure me to your feast. Can you suppose (father) that I should have met with unarmed guests there, since those very guests came to my palace completely armed, at so late an hour? Can you imagine that I should have had nothing to fear, in the gloom of night, from their swords, when in open day, and before your eyes, they had almost killed me with their wooden weapons? What! you who are my professed enemy; you, who are conscious that I have so much reason to complain of your conduct; you, I say, come to me in the night, at an unseasonable hour, and at the head of a company of armed young men! I did not think it safe for me to go to your entertainment; and should I receive you in my house at a time when, heated with the fumes of wine, you came so well attended? Had I then opened my door, (father) you would be preparing to solemnize my funeral at this very instant in which you vouchsafe to hear my complaints. I do not advance any thing dubious, nor speak barely from conjecture. For can Demetrius deny that he came to my house attended by a band of young people, and that some of them were armed? I only desire to have those whom I shall name sent for. I believe them capable of any thing; but yet they will not have the assurance to deny this fact. Had I brought them before you, after seizing them armed in my house, you would be fully convinced of their guilt; and surely their own confession ought to be no less proof of it.

"You call down imprecations and curses upon impious sons who aspire to your throne: this (my father) you have great reason to do; but then, vent not your imprecations blindly, and at random. Distinguish between the innocent and the guilty. Let him who meditated to murder his brother, feel the anger of the gods, the just avengers of paternal authority; but then let him, who by his brother's guilt was brought to the brink of destruction, find a secure asylum in his father's tenderness and justice. For where else can I expect to find one! I, to whom neither the ceremony of the review, the solemnity of the tournament, my own house, the festival, nor the hours of night allotted by the gods to man for repose, could afford the least security? If I go to the entertainment to which my brother invites me, I am a dead man; and it will be equally fatal to me, if I admit him into my house when he comes thither at midnight. Snares are laid for me wherever I tread. Death lies in ambush for me wherever I move;—to what place then can I fly for security?

"I have devoted myself only to the gods, and to you, my father. I never made my court to the Romans, and cannot have recourse to them. They wish my ruin, because I am so much affected with their injustice to you; because I am tortured to the soul and fired with indignation, to see you dispossessed of so many cities and nations; and, lately, of the maritime coast of Thrace. They cannot flatter themselves with the hopes of making themselves masters of Macedonia as long as you or I are in being. They are sensible, that, should I die by my brother's guilt, or age bring you to the grave, or the due course of nature be anticipated; then the king and kingdom will be at their disposal.

"Had the Romans left you some city or territory, not in the kingdom of Macedon, I possibly might have had some opportunity of retiring to it. But, it may be said, I shall find a sufficiently powerful protection in the Macedonians. You yourself, father, saw yesterday, with what animosity the soldiers attacked me in the battle. What was wanting for my destruction but swords of steel? However, the arms they then wanted, my brother's guests assumed in the night. Why should I mention a great part of the principal persons of your court, who ground all their hopes on the Romans, and on him who is all-powerful with them? They are not ashamed to prefer him not only to me, who am his elder brother, but I might almost say it, to you, who are our king and father. For they pretend that it is to him you are obliged for the senate's remitting you some of those things which they otherwise would have required: it is he who now checks the Romans, and prevents their advancing in a hostile manner into your kingdom. In fine, if they may be believed, your old age has no other refuge but the protection which your young son procures you. On his side are the Romans, and all the cities which have been dismembered from your dominions, as well as such Macedonians whose dependence, with regard to fortune, is placed wholly on the Romans. But with respect to myself, I look upon it as glorious to have no other protector than you, my father, and to place all my hopes in you alone.

"What do you judge to be the aim and design of the letter you lately received from Quintus, in which he declares expressly, that you acted prudently for your interest, in sending Demetrius to Rome; and wherein he exhorts you to send him back thither, accompanied by other ambassadors, and a greater train of Macedonian noblemen? Quintus is now every thing with Demetrius. He has no other guide but his councils, or rather his orders. Quite forgetting that you are his father, he seems to have substituted him in your place. It is in the city of Rome, and in his sight, that he formed the secret and clandestine designs which will soon break out into action. It is merely to ensure their success, that Quintus orders you to send along with Demetrius a greater number of the Macedonian nobility. They set out from this country with the most sincere attachment to your person and interest; but, won by the caresses which are lavished upon them in that city, they return from it corrupted and debauched by directly opposite sentiments. Demetrius is all in—" with them: they already presume, in your lifetime, to give him the title of king. If I am indignant at his conduct, I have the grief to see not only others, but yourself, my father, charge me with the design of aspiring to your throne. Should this accusation be levelled at us both, I am conscious of my own innocence, and it cannot in any manner affect me. For whom, in that case, should I dispossess, to seize upon what would be another's right: there is no one but my father between me and the throne; and I beseech the gods that he may long continue so. In case I should happen to survive him, (and this I would not wish any longer than he shall think me worthy of it,) I shall succeed him in the kingdom, if it be his good pleasure. He may be accused of aspiring to the throne, and of aspiring in the most unjust and criminal manner, who is impatient to break the order and overleap the bounds prescribed by age, by nature, by the usages and customs of Macedonia, and by the law of nations. My elder brother, says Demetrius to himself, to whom the kingdom belongs both by the right of seniority and my father's will, is an obstacle to my ambitious views. I must dispatch him—I shall not be the first who has waded through a brother's blood to the throne.—My father in years, and without support, will be too much afraid for his own life to meditate revenge for his son's death. The Romans will be pleased to see me on the throne; they will approve my conduct, and be able to support me. I own, my father, these projects may all be defeated, but I am sure they are not without foundation. In a word, I reduce all to this: it is in your power to secure my life, by bringing to condign punishment those who yesterday armed themselves to assassinate me; but, should their villany take effect, it will not be in your power to revenge my death."

As soon as Perseus had ended his speech, all the company cast their eyes on Demetrius, to intimate that it was incumbent on him to answer immediately. But as he, quite oppressed with sorrow and overwhelmed in tears, seemed unable to speak, a long silence ensued. At last, being pressed to an answer, he made his grief give way to necessity, and spoke as follows:

"Perseus, by accusing me in your presence, my father, and by shedding fictitious tears to move you to compassion, has made you suspect mine, which, alas! are but too sincere; and by that means has deprived me of all the advantages the accused generally have. Although ever since my return from Rome he has been day and night laying snares for me, in secret cabals with his creatures; yet he now represents me to you, not only as laying hidden ambuscades to destroy him, but attacking him by open violence and an armed force. He endeavours to alarm you by the pretended dangers which surround him, in hopes of hastening by your means the death of his innocent brother. He declares that he has no refuge, no asylum left, with design to prevent my finding one in your clemency and justice. In the solitary and abandoned state to which I see myself reduced, quite friendless and unprotected, he strives to make me odious, by reproaching me with possessing an influence, an interest with foreigners, which are rather a prejudice than a service to me.

"Observe, I beseech you, with what insidious art he has blended and confounded the transactions of last night with every other circumstance of my life: and this in a double view; first, to raise a suspicion in you of my conduct in general from this last action, the innocence of which will soon be evident; and secondly, to support, by this idle story of a nocturnal attack, his equally idle accusation, of my harbouring criminal views, hopes, and pretensions. At the same time he has endeavoured to show that this accusation was not premeditated or prepared; but that it was wholly the effect of the fear with which he was seized, occasioned by last night's tumult. But, Perseus, if I had attempted to betray my father and his kingdom; had I engaged in conspiracies with the Romans, and with the enemies of the state; you ought not to have waited for the opportunity of the fictitious story of last night's transactions, but should have impeached me before this time of such treason. If the charge of treason, when separated from the other, was altogether improbable, and could serve no other purpose but to prove how much you envy me, and not to evince my guilt; you ought not to have mentioned it now, but should have postponed that charge to another time; and have examined now this question only, whether you laid snares for me, or I for you. I nevertheless will endeavour, as far as the confusion into which this sudden and unforeseen accusation has thrown me will permit, to separate and distinguish what you have thrown together indiscriminately; and to show whether you or myself ought in justice to be accused of laying a snare for the other last night.

"Perseus asserts, that I harboured a design to assassinate him, in order that, by the death of my elder brother, to whom the crown appertains by the right of nations, by the customs of Macedonia, and even, as he pretends, by your determination, I, though the younger son, might succeed to the throne. To what purpose, therefore, is that other part of his speech, where he declares, that I have been particularly studious to ingratiate myself with the Romans, and flattered myself with the hopes of being able to ascend the throne by their assistance? For, if I thought the Romans were powerful enough to bestow the kingdom of Macedon on whomsoever they pleased, and if I relied so much on my influence and authority with them, why should I commit a fratricide of no advantage to myself? What! should I have affected to surround my temples with a diadem, dyed with my brother's blood, merely that I might become odious and execrable, even to those with whom I had acquired some influence, (if indeed I have any) by a probity either real or dissimulated? Unless you can suppose that Quintus, whose counsel I am accused of following, (he, I say, who lives in so delightful a union with his brother,) suggested to me the horrid design of imbruing my hands in my brother's blood. Perseus has summoned up all the advantages, by which (as he would insinuate) I can promise myself a superiority over him: such as the credit of the Romans, the suffrages of the Macedonians, and the almost universal consent of gods and men; and yet he, at the same time (as if I were inferior to him in all respects) charges me with having recourse to an expedient which none but the blackest villains could employ. Are you willing to have us judged upon this principle and rule, that whichever of us two was apprehensive that the other would be judged more worthy of the diadem, shall be declared to have formed a design of murdering his brother?

"But let us come to facts, and examine the order and plan of the criminal enterprise with which I am charged. Perseus pretends to have been attacked in different manners, all which are, however, included within the space of one day. I attempted, as he says, to murder him in broad day-light, in the battle which followed the sacred ceremony of the review. I determined to poison him at an entertainment to which I had invited him. In fine, I resolved to attack him with open force in the dead of night, attended by armed persons to a party of pleasure at his house.

"You see, my father, the season I had chosen to commit this fratricide; a tournament, a banquet, a party of pleasure, and on how venerable and solemn a day! a day on which the army is reviewed, on which the resplendent arms of all the Macedonian monarchs are carried in front of the procession; on which it passes between the two parts of the sacred victim; and on which we have the honour to march on each side of you, at the head of the whole Macedonian people. What! though purified by this august sacrifice from all faults I might before have committed; having before my eyes the sacred victim through which we passed, was my mind intent upon fratricides, poisons, and daggers! Defiled in such a manner by crimes of the most horrid nature, by what ceremonies, by what victims, would it have been possible for me to purify myself?

"It is evident that my brother, hurried on by a blind wish to calumniate and destroy me, in his endeavour to make every thing suspected, and a crime in me, betrays and contradicts himself. For (brother) had I formed the design of poisoning you at my table, what could be more ill-judged than to exasperate you, and put you upon your guard by an obstinate battle in which I should have discovered that I had designs of violence against you; and by that means have prevented your coming to an entertainment to which I had invited you, and at which you accordingly refused to be present? But surely, after such a refusal, should I not have endeavoured to reconcile myself to you; and, as I had resolved to take you off by poison, ought I not to have sought another opportunity for giving you the fatal draught? Could it be expected that I should abruptly fly off on the very same day to another scheme, and attempt to assassinate you, upon pretence of going to your house on a party of pleasure? Could I reasonably flatter myself with the hopes, (taking it for granted that the fear of your being murdered had made you refuse to come to my entertainment,) that the same fear would not induce you to refuse me admittance into your house?

"I presume, father, I may confess to you without blushing, that in a day of festivity and rejoicing, happening to be in company with young people of my own age, I drank more plentifully than usual. Inquire, I beseech you, how we spent our time at the feast yesterday, how full of mirth we were, how transported with thoughtless gaiety, very much heightened by our, perhaps, too indiscreet joy for the victory we had gained in the tournament. It is the sad condition of an unforeseen accusation; it is the danger in which I now see myself involved, that have dispelled but too easily the fumes of wine; otherwise a calm assassin, my eyes had still been closed in slumbers. Had I formed a resolution to attack your house with a view of murdering you, would it not have been possible for me to abstain for one day from immoderate drinking, and to keep my companions from the like excess?

"But, that it may not be thought that I alone act with frankness and simplicity, let us hear my brother, who has no malice, and does not harbour the least suspicion. All, says he, that I know, and the only thing I have to complain of, is, that they came armed to my house, upon pretence of engaging in a party of pleasure. Should I ask you how you came to know this, you will be forced to own, either that my house was filled with spies sent by you, or else that my attendants had taken up arms in so open a manner that every one knew of it. What does my brother do? That he may not seem to have formerly watched all my motions, nor at this time to ground his accusation merely on suppositions; he beseeches you to inquire of those whom he shall name, whether it be not true that they came armed to his house; in order that (as if this were a doubtful circumstance) after this inquiry into an incident which they themselves own and confess, they may be considered as legally convicted. But is this the question? Why do not you desire an inquiry to be made whether they took up arms to assassinate you, and whether they did it with my knowledge, and at my request? For this is what you pretend; and not what they themselves own publicly, and which is very manifest, that they took up arms with no other view than to defend themselves. Whether they had or had not reason to arm themselves, that they are to inform you. Do not blend and confound my cause with theirs, for they are quite distinct and separate. Only tell us whether we intended to attack you openly or by surprise. If openly, why did we not all take up arms? Why were these only armed who had insulted your spy? In case it was to have been by surprise, in what manner would the attack have been made? Would it have been at the end of the feast; and after I had left it with my company, would the four men in question have stayed behind, to have fallen upon you when asleep? How would it have been possible for them to conceal themselves in your house, since they were strangers in my service, and could not but be very much suspected, having been seen but a few hours before engaged in the quarrel? Again, supposing they had found an opportunity to murder you, in what manner could they have escaped? Could four men armed have been able to make themselves masters of your house?

"Leave, then, this nocturnal fiction, and come to what really pains you, and which you have so much at heart. For what reason, (methinks I hear my brother say,) for what reason (Demetrius) do the people talk of making you king? Why do some persons think you more worthy than I of succeeding our father? Why do you make my hopes doubtful and uncertain, which, were it not for you, would have been established on the most solid foundation? Such are the reflections which Perseus revolves in his mind, though he does not express himself in this manner. It is this that makes him my enemy and my accuser: it is this that fills the palace and every part of the kingdom with suspicions and accusations. If I ought not now, father, so much as to hope for the sceptre, nor perhaps ever think of contesting it, as being the younger, and because it is your will and pleasure that I should yield to my elder brother; it does not follow that I ought to make myself appear unworthy of it, either to you (my father) or all the Macedonians; a circumstance which nothing but my conduct could occasion. I can, indeed, through moderation, resign it to whom it belongs; but I cannot prevail with myself to renounce my virtue and good name.

"You reproach me with the affection of the Romans, and impute that to me for a crime which ought to be my glory. I did not desire to be sent to Rome, neither as a hostage at first, nor afterwards as ambassador; this, father, you yourself very well know. When you ordered me to go thither, I obeyed your commands: and I believe my conduct there and behaviour were such, as cannot reflect the least dishonour either on yourself, your crown, or the Macedonian nation. It is therefore yourself, father, who occasioned the friendship I have contracted with the Romans. So long as you shall be at peace with them, so long our friendship will subsist: but at the first signal for war, though I have been a hostage among them, and exercised the functions of an ambassador in such a manner as perhaps has not been disadvantageous to my father; from that moment, I say, I shall declare myself their enemy. I do not desire to reap any benefit on the present occasion, from the love which the Romans have for me; all I entreat is, that it may not be of prejudice to me. It was not begun in war, nor is it designed to subsist in it. As a hostage and an ambassador, peace was my only object; let that be neither considered in me as a crime nor a merit.

"If I have violated, in any manner, the respect I owe to you, my father; if I have formed any criminal enterprise against my brother, let me be punished as I deserve; but if I am innocent, this I claim; that as I cannot be convicted of the least guilt, I may not fall a victim to envy. This is not the first time that my brother has charged me with harbouring horrid designs; but it is the first time he has attempted to do it openly, though without the least foundation. Was my father exasperated against me, it would be your duty, as the elder, kindly to intercede for your younger brother, to solicit his pardon, to entreat that some regard might be shown to his youth; and that a fault which had been committed merely through inadvertency, might be overlooked. My ruin comes from that very quarter, whence I might naturally have expected my safety.

"Almost half asleep, after the feast and party of pleasure, I am dragged here on a sudden, to answer a charge of fratricide; and am forced to plead my own cause, unassisted by advocates, and unsupported by the advice or influence of a single person. Had I been to speak in favour of another, I should have taken time to prepare and compose my discourse; and yet, on such an occasion, my reputation only would have laid at stake, and I should have had nothing to do but to display my wit and eloquence;—at this instant, without knowing the cause for which I am ordered to appear in this place, I hear an offended father commanding me to make my defence, and a brother charging me with the most horrid crimes. Perseus has had all the time he could desire to prepare his accusation, whilst I did not so much as know what the business was, till the very instant the accusation was brought against me. In this rapid moment, ought I to be more attentive to my accuser than studious of my own apology? Surprised by a sudden and unforeseen accusation, I could scarce comprehend what was laid to my charge, so far from being able to know how to make my defence. What hope could I have left, did I not know that it is my father who is to judge! He may show a greater affection for my brother, as the elder; but he owes more compassion to me, as being the party accused: I myself conjure you to preserve my life for your own sake and mine; whereas Perseus insists upon your sacrificing me to his safety. What may you not naturally expect from him when you shall once have invested him with your authority, as he now demands the favour at no less a price than my blood?"

Whilst Demetrius defended himself in this manner, his words were interrupted by deep sighs, and groans intermixed with tears. Philip, dismissing both of them for a moment, advised with his friends; and then ordering them to be called in again, he told them: "I will not pronounce sentence in this affair from mere words and an hour's discussion, but from the inquiry I shall make into your conduct, from your behaviour in small as well as great things, and from your words as well as actions." This judgment showed plainly enough, that although Demetrius had cleared himself with regard to the charge of endeavouring to take away his brother's life, Philip, however, suspected him from the connexions with the Romans. These were in a manner the first seeds of the war that were sown in Philip's lifetime, and which were to ripen under Perseus his successor.

The king, some time after, sent A. M. 3823. Philoctes and Appelles as his ambassadors to Rome; not so much with the design of employing them in any negotiation, as to gain information how the inhabitants of that city stood affected with regard to Demetrius; and to inquire secretly into what he had said there (particularly to Quintus,) respecting the succession to the throne. Philip imagined that these two men were not attached to any party; but they were Perseus's adherents, and had engaged in his conspiracy. Demetrius, who knew nothing of what was transacting, (his brother's accusation excepted,) had no hopes of ever being able to pacify his father; especially when he found that his brother had so ordered matters that he could not have the least access to him. All he therefore endeavoured was, to keep a watchful guard over his words and actions, in order to give no ground for suspicion and envy. He avoided speaking of the Romans, or holding the least correspondence with them, even by letter, knowing it was this that chiefly incensed the Macedonians against him. He ought to have taken these precautions sooner; but this young prince, who had no experience, and was frank and sincere, and judged of others from himself, imagined he had nothing to fear from a court, with whose intrigues and artifices he ought to have been better acquainted.

Philip, from a vulgar opinion which prevailed in Macedon, that from the top of mount Hæmus to the Black Sea and the Adriatic, as well as the Danube and the Alps, might be discovered, had the curiosity to ascertain the truth of it himself; imagining that this prospect might be of some service to the design he meditated, of making Italy the seat of war. He only took Perseus with him, and sent Demetrius into Macedonia; appointing Didas, governor of Pæonia, and one of the king's chief officers, to escort him. This man was a creature of Perseus, who had taught him his lesson perfectly; and exhorted him, above all things, to insinuate himself as artfully as possible into the good graces of the young prince, in order to discover all his secrets.

Didas executed his commission but too well. He agreed to every thing that Demetrius said, lamented his ill fate, seemed to detest the injustice and insincerity of his enemies, who represented him, on all occasions, in the most odious light to his father; and offered to serve him, to the utmost, in whatever lay in his power. Demetrius at last resolved to fly to the Romans. He fancied that heaven had opened him a certain means (for it was necessary to pass through Pæonia, of which Didas, as I observed above, was governor,) and accordingly he revealed his design to him. Didas, without loss of time, sent advice of this to Perseus, and the latter to king Philip; who, after having undergone inexpressible fatigues in his journey up mount Hæmus, was returned from his expedition with no better information than he carried with him. The monarch and his attendants did not, however, refuse the vulgar opinion; in all probability, that they might not expose so ridiculous a journey to the laughter of the public; rather than because they had seen from one and the same spot, rivers, seas, and mountains, at so vast a distance from one another. Be this as it may, the king was at that time employed in the siege of a city called Petra, when the news I have mentioned was brought him. Herodotus, Demetrius's bosom friend, was seized, and strict orders were given to keep a watchful eye over the prince.

Philip, at his return to Macedon, was seized with a deep melancholy. This last attempt of Demetrius went to his heart. He thought, however, that it would be proper for him to wait the return of the ambassadors whom he had sent to Rome, and who had been taught their lesson before they left Macedon. They reported exactly whatever had been dictated to them; and presented the king with a forged letter, sealed with the counterfeit seal of T. Quintus, in which he desired Philip, "not to be offended at his son Demetrius, for some unguarded expressions which might have escaped him with respect to the succession to the crown; assuring him that he would not engage in any attempt contrary to the ties of blood and nature." He concluded with observing, "that he was very far from ever giving him such counsel." This letter confirmed all that Perseus had advanced against his brother. Herodotus was put to the torture, and died on the rack, without charging his master with any thing.

Perseus again accused his brother before the king. His having projected the design of flying to the Romans through Pæonia, and of bribing certain persons to accompany him in his flight, was imputed to him as a crime. But the circumstance which bore hardest against him, was the forged letter of Quintus. His father nevertheless did not declare himself publicly against him, resolving to make away with him secretly; not out of regard to his son, but lest the noise which the bringing him to execution would make, should discover too risibly the designs he projected against Rome. At his leaving Thessalonica to go to Demetrius he commanded Didas to despatch the young prince. The latter having carried Demetrius with him into Pæonia, poisoned him at an entertainment that was made after a sacrifice. Demetrius had no sooner drunk the deadly draught, than he found himself seized with violent pains. He withdrew to his apartment, complaining bitterly of his father's cruelty, and loudly charging his brother with the crime of fratricide, and Didas with his barbarous treachery. His pains increasing, two of Didas's domestics entered the room, threw blankets over his head, and stifled him. Such was the end of this young prince, who deserved a much better fate.

Almost two years were elapsed A. M. 3825. before the conspiracy of Perseus against his brother was discovered. Ant. J. C. 179.

In the mean time Philip, tortured by grief and remorse, incessantly deplored his son's murder, and reproached himself with his cruelty. His surviving son, who looked upon himself already as king, and to whom the courtiers began to attach themselves, from the expectation that he would soon be their sovereign, gave him no less pain. It was infinitely shocking to him to see his old age despaired; some waiting with the utmost impatience for his death, and others even not waiting for it.

Among those who had access to him, Antigonus held the first rank. He was nephew of another Antigonus,² who had been Philip's guardian; and under that name, and in that quality, had reigned ten years. This worthy man had always continued inviolably attached, both from duty and affection, to the person of his prince, in the midst of the tumults and cabals of the court. Perseus had never cared for him; but this inviolable attachment to his father had made him his professed enemy. Antigonus plainly perceived the danger to which he would be exposed when that prince should succeed to the crown. Finding that Philip began to fluctuate in thought, and would from time to time sigh and weep for his son Demetrius, he thought it proper to take advantage of that disposition; and sometimes listening to his discourse on that subject, at other times beginning it himself, and regretting the precipitate manner in which that affair had been conducted, he entered into his sentiments and complaints, and thereby gave them new force. And as truth always leaves some footsteps by which in may be discerned, he used his utmost endeavours to trace out the secret intrigues of Perseus's conspiracy.

The persons who had had the greatest concern in that affair, and of whom the strongest suspicion might with the greatest justice be entertained, were Appelles and Philocles, who had been sent ambassadors to Rome, and had brought from thence, as in the name of Quintius Flaminius, the letter which had proved so fatal to the young prince. It was generally whispered at court that this whole letter was forged: but still this was only conjecture, and there was no proof of it. Very luckily, Xychus, who had accompanied Appelles and Philocles in quality of secretary of the embassy, happened upon some occasion to apply to Antigonus. Immediately he put him under an arrest, caused him to be carried to the palace, and leaving him under a strong guard, went to Philip. "I imagined," says he, "royal sir, from several things I have heard you say, that nothing could give you greater pleasure than to know exactly what idea you ought to entertain of your two sons; and to ascertain which of them it was that made an attempt on the other's life. You now have in your power the man who is best able to give you a perfect account of that whole affair, and this is Xychus. He is now in your place, and you may command him to be sent for." Xychus being immediately brought in, at first denied every thing; but so very faintly, that it was evident he would make a full discovery, upon being ever so little intimidated. Accordingly, the instant that the officer of justice appeared, he made a full confession, revealed the whole intrigue of the ambassadors, and the share he himself had in it. Immediately Philocles, who happened to be in court at that time, was seized; but Appelles, who was absent, hearing that Xychus had made a full discovery, fled to Italy. History does not inform us of the particulars which were extorted from Philocles. Some pretend that after having resolutely denied the charge at first, he was utterly confounded upon his being confronted with Xychus. According to other historians, he bore the torture with the utmost fortitude, and asserted his innocence to the last gasp. All these things only revived and augmented the sorrow of Philip; a father equally wretched, whether he turned his reflections on his murdered son, or on him who was still living.

Perseus, being informed that his whole plot had been discovered, knew too well his own power and influence to believe it necessary to secure himself by flight. The only precaution he took was, a resolution to keep at a distance from court as long as his father should live, in order to withdraw himself from his resentment.

Philip did not entertain the hope of having it in his power to seize Perseus, and bring him to condign punishment. The only thought he then entertained was, to prevent his enjoying, with impunity, the fruits of his guilt. In this view he sent for Antigonus, to whose great care he owed the discovery of the conspiracy; and whom he judged very well qualified, both on account of his personal merit, and of his uncle Antigonus's recent fame and glory, to fill the Macedonian throne. "Reduced," says Philip, "to the deplorable necessity of wishing that to be my fate, which other fathers detest as the most dreadful calamity that can befall them (the being childless); I am now resolving to bequeath to you a kingdom, for which I am indebted to the guardianship of your uncle; and which he not only preserved by his fidelity, but enlarged considerably by his valour. I know no man worthy of the crown but yourself. And were there none capable of wearing it with dignity, I had infinitely rather it should be lost for ever, than that Perseus should have it as the reward of his infamous perfidy. Methinks I shall see Demetrius risen from the sepulchre, and restored to his father, if I can substitute you in his place; you, who alone bewailed the untimely death of my dear son, and the unhappy credulity which proved his destruction."

After this he bestowed the highest honours on Antigonus, and took every opportunity of producing him in the most advantageous light to the public. Whilst Perseus resided in Thrace, Philip made a progress through several cities of Macedon, and recommended Antigonus to all the noblemen of the greatest distinction, with the utmost zeal and affection; and, had fate allowed him a longer life, it was not doubted but he would have put him in possession of the throne. Having left Demetrius, he made a considerable stay in Thessalonica, from whence he went to Amphipolis, where he fell dangerously ill. The physicians declared, that his sickness proceeded more from his mind than his body. Grief kept him continually awake; and he frequently imagined he saw, in the dead of night, the ghost of the ill-fated Demetrius, reproaching him with his death, and calling down curses on his head. He expired, bewailing one of his sons with a shower of tears, and venting imprecations against the other. Antigonus might have been raised to the throne, had the king's death been immediately divulged. Calligenes the physician, who presided in all the consultations, did not stay till the king had breathed his last; but the very instant he saw that it was impossible for him to recover, he despatched couriers to Perseus; it having been agreed between them that he should keep some in readiness for that purpose; and he concealed the king's death from every body out of the palace, till Perseus appeared, whose sudden arrival surprised all people. He then took possession of the crown which he had acquired by guilt.

He reigned eleven years; the last four of which were employed in war against the Romans, for which he had made preparations from the time of his accession to the throne. At last, Paulus Æmilius gained a famous victory over him, which put an end to the kingdom of Macedon. To prevent my being obliged to divide and interrupt the series of Perseus's history, which has scarce any connexion with that of the other kings, I shall defer it to the following book, where it shall be related at large, and without interruption.

SECTION II.—THE DEATH OF SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR, WHOSE REIGN WAS SHORT AND OBSCURE. HE IS SUCCEDED BY HIS BROTHER ANTIOCHUS, SURNAMED EPIPHANES. CAUSES OF THE WAR WHICH AFTERWARDS BROKE OUT BETWEEN THE KINGS OF EGYPT AND SYRIA. ANTIOCHUS GAINS A VICTORY OVER PTOLEMY. THE CONQUEROR POSSESSES HIMSELF OF EGYPT, AND TAKES THE KING PRISONER. A REPORT PREVAILING OF A GENERAL REVOLT, HE GOES INTO PALESTINE; BESIEGES AND TAKES JERUSALEM, WHERE HE EXERCISES THE MOST HORRID CRUELITIES. THE ALEXANDRIANS, IN THE ROOM OF PHILOMETOR, WHO WAS ANTIOCHUS'S PRISONER, RAISE TO THE THRONE HIS YOUNGER BROTHER PTOLEMY EVERGETES, SURNAMED ALSO PHYSCON. ANTIOCHUS RENEWS THE WAR WITH EGYPT. THE TWO BROTHERS ARE RECONCILED. HE MARCHES TOWARDS ALEXANDRIA, IN ORDER TO LAY SIEGE TO IT. POPILIUS, ONE OF THE ROMAN AMBASSADORS, OBLIGES HIM TO QUIT EGYPT AND NOT TO MOLEST THE TWO BROTHERS.

SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR did not reign long in Asia, nor did he perform any memorable action. Under him happened the famous incident concerning Heliodorus, related in the second book of Maccabees. The holy city of Jerusalem enjoyed at that time profound tranquillity. The piety and resolution of Onias, the high priest, caused the laws of God to be strictly observed there, and prompted even kings and idolatrous princes to have the holy place in the highest veneration. They honoured it with rich gifts; and king Seleucus furnished, from his own private revenues, all that was necessary for the solemnization of the sacrifices. Nevertheless, the perfidy of a Jew called Simon, governor of the temple, raised on a sudden great disorder in the city. This man, to revenge himself of the opposition which Onias the high priest made to his unjust enterprises, informed the king that there were immense treasures in the temple, which were not designed for the expenses of the sacrifices, and that he might seize upon them all. The king, on this information, sent Heliodorus his first minister to Jerusalem, with orders to carry off all those treasures.

Heliodorus, after having been received by the high-priest with honours of every kind, told him the motive of his journey, and asked him whether the information that had been given to the king, with regard to the treasure, was true. The high-priest told him, that these treasures were only deposited there as in trust, and were allotted to the maintenance of widows and orphans; that he could not absolutely dispose of them to the prejudice of those to whom they belonged; and who imagined that they could not secure them better, than by depositing them in a temple, the holiness of which was revered throughout the whole universe. This treasure consisted of 400 talents of silver (about 50,000*l.* sterling;) and 200 talents of gold (300,000*l.* sterling.) However, the minister sent from the prince, insisting on the orders he had received from court, told him plainly that this money, whatever might be the consequence, must all be carried to the king.

The day appointed for the carrying it off being come, Heliodorus came to the temple, with the intention to execute his commission. Immediately the whole city was seized with the utmost terror. The priests, dressed in their sacerdotal vestments, fell prostrate at the foot of the altar; beseeching the God of heaven, who enacted the law with regard to deposits, to preserve those laid up in his temple. Great numbers flocked in crowds, and jointly besought the Creator upon their knees, not to suffer so holy a place to be profaned. The women and maidens, covered with sackcloth, were seen lifting up their hands to heaven. It was a spectacle truly worthy of compassion, to see such multitudes, and especially the high-priest, pierced with the deepest affliction, under the apprehension of so impious a sacrilege.

By this time, Heliodorus, with his guards, was come to the gate of the treasury, and preparing to break it open. But the Spirit of the Almighty now revealed himself by the most sensible marks; inasmuch that all those who had dared to obey Heliodorus, were struck down by a divine power, and seized with a terror which bereaved them of all their faculties. For there appeared to them a horse richly caparisoned, which rushing at once upon Heliodorus, struck him several times with his fore-feet. The man who sat on this horse had a terrible aspect, and his arms seemed of gold. At the same time there were seen two young men, whose beauty dazzled the eye, and who, standing on each side of Heliodorus, scourged him incessantly, and in the most violent manner. Heliodorus, falling to the ground, was taken up, and put into his litter; and this man, who a moment before had come into the temple followed by a great train of guards, was forced away from this holy place, and had no one to succour him; and that, because the power of God had displayed itself in the strongest manner. By the same power he was cast to the ground speechless, and without the least sign of life; whilst the temple, which before resounded with nothing but lamentations, now echoed with the shouts of all the people, who returned thanks to the Almighty, for having raised the glory of his holy temple by the effect of his power.

But now, some of Heliodorus's friends besought the high-priest to invoke God in his favour. Immediately Onias offered a sacrifice for his health. Whilst he was praying, the two young men above mentioned appeared to Heliodorus, and said to him: "Return thanks to Onias the high-priest; for it is for his sake that the Lord has granted you life. After having been chastened of God, declare unto the whole world his miraculous power." Having spoken these words, they vanished.

Heliodorus offered up sacrifices and made solemn vows to him who had restored him to life. He returned thanks to Onias, and went his way; declaring to every one the wonderful works of the Almighty, to which he himself had been an eye-witness. The king asking him, whether he believed that another person might be sent with safety to Jerusalem, he answered; "In case you have an enemy or any traitorous wretch who has a design upon your crown, send him thither; and you will see him return back flayed with scourging, if indeed he return at all. For he who inhabiteth the heavens is himself present in that place: he is the guardian and protector of it; and he strikes those mortally who go thither to injure it."

The king was soon punished for this sacrilegious act, by the very man whom he had commanded to plunder the temple. Antiochus the Great having, after his defeat at Sipylos concluded the ignominious peace with the Romans before-mentioned, had given them, among other hostages, Antiochus, one of his sons, and the younger brother of Seleucus. He had resided thirteen years in Rome.³ Seleucus his brother wanted him, but for what reason is not known; (perhaps to put him at the head of some military expedition which he might judge him capable of executing;) and to obtain him, he sent Demetrius his only son, who was but twelve years of age, to Rome, as a hostage in Antiochus's room. During the absence of the A. M. 3829. two heirs to the crown, (one of Ant. J. C. 175, whom was gone to Rome, and the other not returned from it,) Heliodorus imagined he might, with very little difficulty, seize upon it, by taking off Seleucus; and accordingly he poisoned him.

In this manner was fulfilled the prophecy of Daniel. After speaking of the death of Antiochus the Great, he adds, "Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom: but within a few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle."⁴ These few words denote evidently the short and obscure reign of Seleucus, and the kind of death he was to die. The Hebrew text points him out still more clearly. "There shall rise up in his place," of Antiochus, "a man who, as an extortioner, a collector of taxes, shall cause to pass away," shall destroy, "the glory of the kingdom." And, indeed, this was the sole employment of his reign. He was obliged to furnish the Romans, by the articles of the peace concluded between them, 1000 talents annually;¹ and the twelve years of this tribute ended exactly with his life. He reigned but eleven years.

Antiochus,² afterwards surnamed Epiphanes, who was returning from Rome into Syria, heard at Athens of the death of his brother Seleucus. He was told that the usurper had a very strong party, but that another was forming in favour of Ptolemy, whose claim was founded in right of his mother, the late king's sister. Antiochus had recourse to Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and to Attalus his brother, who seated him on the throne, after having expelled Heliodorus.

The prophet Daniel (from verse 21 of chapter xi. to the end of chapter xii.) foretells every thing that was to befall Antiochus Epiphanes, who was a cruel persecutor of the Jews, and who is pointed out elsewhere by the "little horn which was to issue out of one of the four large horns."³ I shall explain this prophecy hereafter.

Here (chap. xi. verse 21,) the prophet describes his accession to the throne. "And in his" Seleucus's, "estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries." Antiochus's conduct will show how vile he was. It is said, "that to him they shall not give the honours of the kingdom." He did not obtain the crown either by right of birth, as his brother Seleucus had left behind him a son who was his lawful heir, or by the free choice of the people; Eumenes and Attalus having set it on his head. Being returned from the west peaceably (or rather secretly) to surprise his rival, he won the hearts of the people by his artifices, and a specious appearance of clemency.

He assumed the title of Epiphanes,⁴ that is, illustrious, which title was never worse applied. The whole series of his life will show, that he deserved much more than that of Epimanes, (mad or furious) which some people gave him.

Some circumstances related of him, prove how justly the epithet vile is bestowed upon him in Scripture. He used frequently to go out of his palace, accompanied only by two or three domestics, and ramble up and down the streets of Antioch. He would spend his time in talking with goldsmiths and engravers in their shops, and in disputing with them on the most minute particulars relating to the arts they professed, and which he ridiculously boasted he understood as well as they. He would very often stoop so low as to converse with the dregs of the populace, and mix indiscriminately with them in the places where they were assembled. On these occasions he would sit and drink with foreigners of the meanest condition in life. Whenever he heard of pleasure between young people, he used to go (without saying a word to any person) and join in all their wanton fooleries; would carouse and sing with them, without observing the least moderation or decorum. He sometimes would take it into his head to divest himself of his royal habit, and put on a Roman robe; and in that garb would go from street to street, as he had seen the candidates at Rome do at an election for magistrates. He asked the citizens to favour him with their votes, by giving his hand to one, by embracing another, and sometimes would canvass for the office of ædile, and at other times for that of tribune. After having got himself elected, he would call for the Curule chair,⁵ and seating himself in it, would judge the petty suits relating to contracts of buying or selling, and pronounce sentence with as much seriousness and gravity as if he decided affairs of the utmost importance. We are likewise told that he was very much given to drinking; that he squandered away a great part of his revenues in excess and debauch; and that, when intoxicated with liquor, he would frequently scour up and down the city, throwing away handfuls of money among the populace, and crying, "Catch as catch can." At other times, he would leave his palace, (dressed in a Roman robe, with a crown of roses on his head,) and walk without attendants about the streets; or which occasions, if any person offered to follow him, he used to pelt them with stones, always carrying a great quantity under his robe, for that purpose. He often used to go and bathe himself in the public baths with the common people, where he committed such extravagancies, as made every body despise him. After what has been said, (and I omit a great many other particulars,) I submit to the reader's judgment, whether Antiochus did not merit the title of madman, rather than that of illustrious.

Scarce was Antiochus well seated on the throne,⁶ when Jason, brother of Onias the Jewish high-priest, having formed a design to supplant his brother, offered that prince, secretly, 360 talents (about 90,000*l.* sterling,) besides 80 more (about 12,000*l.*) for another article, upon condition that he should appoint him high-priest. He succeeded in his negotiation; and accordingly Onias, who was universally revered for his strict piety and justice, was deposed, and Jason established in his room. The latter subverted entirely the religion of his ancestors, and brought infinite calamities upon the Jewish nation, as appears from the second book of the Maccabees and Josephus.

In Egypt,⁷ from the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes, Cleopatra his widow, sister of Antiochus Epiphanes, had assumed the regency and the guardianship of her young son; and had acquitted herself with the greatest care and prudence. But she dying that year, the regency fell to Lentulus, a nobleman of great distinction in that country; and Euleus the eunuch was appointed to superintend the king's education. These were no sooner in their employments, than they sent a deputation to demand Cœle-syria and Palestine of Antiochus Epiphanes; a demand that very soon after occasioned a war between the two crowns. Cleopatra, who was mother of one of these kings and sister to the other, had prevented them as long as she lived from coming to a rupture. But the new regents did not show so much regard for Antiochus, nor scruple to demand of him what they believed their sovereign's right. It is certain that the Egyptian monarchs had always possessed the sovereignty of these provinces from the time of the first Ptolemy,⁸ till Antiochus the Great wrested them from Ptolemy Epiphanes, and left them to Seleucus his son, with no other right than that of conquest. They had descended from the latter to his brother Antiochus.

The Egyptians, to enforce their pretensions, declared, that in the last division of the empire between the four successors of Alexander, who remained masters of every thing after the battle of Ipsus, these provinces had been assigned to Ptolemy Soter; that himself and his successors to the crown of Egypt, had enjoyed them from that time till the battle of Paneas, the gaining of which had enabled Antiochus the Great to dispossess Egypt of those provinces: that this prince had stipulated, when he gave his daughter to the king of Egypt, to restore to him at the same time those provinces as her dowry; and that this was the principal article of the marriage contract.

Antiochus denied both these facts: and pretended that, on the contrary, in the general division which had been made of Alexander's empire, all Syria (including Cœle-syria and Palestine) had been assigned to Seleucus Nicator; and that consequently they belonged to the prince in possession of the kingdom of Syria. With regard to the marriage contract, by virtue of which the Egyptians demanded back those provinces, he asserted that it was an absolute chimera. In fine, after having given their reasons on both sides without coming to any conclusion, they found it necessary to decli^e their pretensions by force of arms.

Ptolemy Philometor,¹ having entered his fifteenth year, was declared of age. Great preparations were made in Alexandria for the solemnity of his coronation, according to the Egyptian custom. Antiochus sent Apollonius, one of the chief noblemen of his court, with the character of ambassador, to be present on that occasion, and to congratulate the young king in his name. This, in outward appearance, was to do honour to his nephew; but the real motive was, to discover, if possible, the designs of that court with respect to the provinces of Cœle-syria and Palestine, as well as what measures were taking with regard to them. The instant he heard, on the return of Apollonius, that all things were preparing for war, he went by sea to Joppa, visited the frontiers of the country, and put it into a condition of defending itself against all the attacks of the Egyptians.

In his progress he passed through Jerusalem. Jason and the whole city received him there with the greatest pomp and magnificence. Notwithstanding the honours paid him in Jerusalem, he afterwards brought great calamities on that city and the whole Jewish nation. From Jerusalem he went to Phœnicia; and, after having settled all things in every place through which he passed, he returned to Antioch.

The same Apollonius who has been just mentioned,² had been sent by Antiochus to Rome, at the head of an embassy. He made excuses to the senate for his master's having sent the tribute later than was stipulated by the treaty. Besides the sum due, he made a present to the people of several golden vases. He demanded, in that prince's name, that the alliance and friendship which had been granted his father should be renewed with him; and desired that the Romans would give him such orders as suited a king, who valued himself on being their affectionate and faithful ally. He added, that his sovereign could never forget the great favours he had received from the senate; from all the youths of Rome; and from persons of all ranks and conditions, during his abode in that city, where he had been treated not merely as a hostage, but as a monarch. The senate made an obliging answer to these several particulars, and dismissed Apollonius with the highest marks of distinction, and laden with presents. It was well known, from the Roman ambassadors who had been in Syria, that he was very much esteemed by the king, and had the highest regard for the Romans.

Jason,³ the year following, sent his brother Menelaus to Antioch, to pay the tribute to the king, and to negotiate some affairs of importance. But that perfidious wretch, in the audience to which he was admitted, instead of confining himself to his commission, supplanted his brother, and obtained his office, by offering 300 talents more than he did. This new choice gave rise to tumults, disorders, murders, and sacrilegious acts; but the death of Onias, who was universally beloved and revered, crowned the whole. Antiochus, hard-hearted as he was, however, lamented his death, and brought the murderer to condign punishment. I make only a transient mention of these facts, and omit the principal circumstances of them, because they belong properly to the history of the Jews, which does not enter into my plan, and of which I relate only such particulars at large as are too important to be entirely omitted, or which cannot be abridged in such a manner as to preserve their beauty.

Antiochus,⁴ who from the return of Apollonius from the Egyptian court had been preparing for the war with which he saw himself threatened by Ptolemy on account of Cœle-syria and Palestine, finding himself in a condition to begin it, resolved not to wait for it in his own dominions, but to carry his arms into the enemy's country. He imagined that as Ptolemy was but sixteen, and was governed entirely by weak ministers, he should be able to bring him to what terms he pleased. He was persuaded that the Romans, under whose protection the Egyptians had put themselves, had so much upon their hands, that it would be impossible for them to give the latter the least succour; and that the war they were carrying on against Perseus, king of Macedon, would not allow them leisure for it. In a word, he thought the present juncture very favourable for him to decide his differences with the Egyptians on account of those provinces.

In the mean time, to observe measures with the Romans, he sent ambassadors to the senate to represent the right he had to the provinces of Cœle-syria and Palestine, of which he was actually possessed, and the necessity he was under of engaging in a war in order to support that right: immediately after which he put himself at the head of his army, and marched towards the frontiers of Egypt. Ptolemy's army came up with his near mount Casius and Pelusium; and a battle was fought, in which Antiochus was victorious. He made so good a use of his success, that he put the frontier in a condition to serve as a barrier, and to check the utmost efforts the Egyptians might make to recover those provinces. This was his first expedition into Egypt; after which, without engaging in any other enterprise that year, he returned to Tyre, and placed his army in winter quarters in the neighbourhood of that city.

During his stay there,⁵ three persons, deputed from the sanhedrim of Jerusalem, came to complain of Menelaus, whom they proved in his presence to be guilty of impiety and sacrilege. The king was going to condemn him; but at the request of Ptolemy Macron, one of his ministers in the interest of Menelaus, he cleared him, and put to death the three deputies, as false witnesses: an action, says the author of the Maccabees, so very unjust, "that before the Scythians they would have been judged innocent."⁶ The Tyrians, touched with compassion at their unhappy fate, gave them honourable interment.

This Ptolemy Macron,⁷ having formerly been governor of the island of Cyprus, under king Ptolemy Philometor, had kept in his own hands, during the minority of that monarch, all the revenues of that country; and could never be prevailed on to deliver them up to the ministers, though they made the warmest remonstrances upon that head; but had constantly refused to pay any attention to them, in consequence of the well-founded suspicions he entertained of their fidelity. At the coronation of the king, he brought the whole treasure to Alexandria, and deposited it in the exchequer: a rare instance of a noble disregard of wealth, in a man who had the public finances at his disposal! So considerable a sum, and coming at a time when the government was in extreme want of money, had done him great honour, and gained him prodigious influence at court. But afterwards, exasperated at some ill treatment he met with from the ministers, or at his not having been rewarded as he wished for so important a service, he rebelled against Ptolemy, entered into Antiochus's service, and delivered up the island of Cyprus to him. That king received him with infinite satisfaction, took him into the number of his confidants, made him governor of Cœle-syria and Palestine, and sent to Cyprus, in his room, Crates, who had commanded in the castle at Jerusalem under Sostratus. Frequent mention is made of this Ptolemy Macron in the Books of the Maccabees.

Antiochus spent the whole winter in making fresh preparations for a second expedition into Egypt; and the instant the season would permit it, invaded that country both by sea and land. Ptolemy had raised a very considerable army, but it was unable to make head against Antiochus; for that monarch gained a second cattle on the frontiers, took the city of Pelusium, and marched into the very heart of Egypt. In this last defeat of the Egyptians, it was in his power not to have suffered a single man to escape; but the more completely to ruin his nephew, instead of making use of the advantage he had gained, he himself rode up and down on all sides, and obliged his soldiers to discontinue the slaughter. This clemency gained him the hearts of the Egyptians; and when he advanced into the country, all the inhabitants came in crowds to pay their submission to him; so that he soon took Memphis and all the rest of Egypt, except Alexandria, which alone held out against him.¹

Philometor was either taken or else surrendered himself to Antiochus, who set him at full liberty. After this they had but one table; lived, seemingly, in great friendship; and, for some time, Antiochus affected to be extremely careful of the interests of the young king his nephew, and to regulate his affairs as his guardian. But when he had once possessed himself of the country, under that pretext he seized whatever he thought fit, plundered all places, and enriched himself, as well as his soldiers, with the spoils of the Egyptians.

Philometor made a miserable figure all this time.² In the field, he had always kept as far as possible from danger, and had not even shown himself to those who fought for him. And after the battle, in how subject a manner did he submit himself to Antiochus, by whom he suffered himself to be dispossessed of so fine a kingdom, without making any effort to preserve it? This, however, was not so much owing to want of courage and natural capacity, (for he afterwards gave proofs of both,) as the effects of his soft and effeminate education under Euleus his governor. That enuch, who also was his prime minister, had used his utmost endeavours to plunge him in luxury and effeminacy, in order to make him incapable of public business, and to make himself as necessary when the young prince came of age as he had been during his minority; and thereby retain all power in his own hands.

Whilst Antiochus was in Egypt,³ a false report of his death spread throughout Palestine. Jason thought this a proper opportunity to recover the employment he had lost in that country. Accordingly, he marched with a few more than 1000 men to Jerusalem; and there, by the assistance of his partisans in the city, made himself master of it, drove out Menelaus, who withdrew to the citadel, exercised every species of cruelty upon his fellow-citizens, and put to death, without mercy, all those who fell into his hands, and whom he considered as his enemies.

When advice of this was brought Antiochus in Egypt, he concluded that the Jews had made a general insurrection, and therefore set forward immediately to quell it. The circumstance which chiefly exasperated him was, his being informed that the inhabitants of Jerusalem had made great rejoicings, when a false report had prevailed of his death. He therefore besieged the city; took it by storm; and, during the three days that it was abandoned to the fury of the soldiers, he caused 80,000 men to be inhumanly butchered. Forty thousand were also taken prisoners, and the like number sold to the neighbouring nations.

But not yet satisfied, this impious wretch entered forcibly into the temple, as far as the sanctuary and the most sacred places; even polluting, by his presence, the holy of holies, whither the traitor Menelaus led him. After this, adding sacrilege to profanation, he carried away the altar of incense, the table for the show-bread, the candlestick with seven branches, belonging to the sanctuary, (all these were of gold,) with several other vases, utensils, and gifts of kings, also of gold. He plundered the city, and returned to Antioch laden with the spoils of Judea and Egypt.

which together amounted to immense sums.⁴ To complete the calamity of the Jews, Antiochus, at his setting out, appointed, as governor over Judea, Phrygian, Philip by name, a man of great cruelty. He nominated Andronicus, a man of the like barbarous disposition, governor of Samaria; and bestowed on Menelaus, the most wicked of the three, the title of high-priest, investing him with the authority annexed to the office.

Such was the beginning of the calamities which had been foretold at Jerusalem by strange phenomena in the skies,⁵ that had appeared there, some time before during forty days successively. These were men some on horseback and others on foot, armed with shields, lances, and swords, who, forming considerable bodies, combated in the air, like two hostile armies.

The Alexandrians,⁶ seeing Philometor in the hands of Antiochus, A. M. 3835 whom he suffered to govern his Ant. J. C. 169 kingdom at discretion, considered him as lost to them, and therefore seated his younger brother upon the throne, which they first declared void. On this occasion he had the name of Ptolemy Euergetes II.⁷ given him, which was soon changed to that of Cacergetes; the former signifying beneficent, and the latter evil-doer. He afterwards was nicknamed Physon,⁸ or tun-bellied, because his gluttony had made him remarkably corpulent. Most historians mention him under the latter epithet.⁹ Cineas and Cumanus were appointed his chief ministers, and were ordered to use their utmost endeavours to restore, if possible, the affairs of the kingdom, now so dilapidated, to their former flourishing condition.

Antiochus, who had advice of what was transacting, took occasion thereupon to return a third time into Egypt, under the specious pretence of restoring the dethroned monarch; but, in reality, to make himself absolute master of the kingdom. He defeated the Alexandrians in a sea-fight near Pelusium, marched his forces into Egypt, and advanced directly towards Alexandria in order to besiege it. The young king consulted his two ministers, who advised him to summon a grand council, composed of all the principal officers of the army, and to deliberate with them on the measures proper to be taken in the present exigency. After many debates, they came at last to this resolution; that, as their affairs were reduced to so low an ebb, it would be absolutely necessary for them to endeavour a reconciliation with Antiochus; and that the ambassadors of the several states of Greece who were in Alexandria at that time, should be desired to employ their mediation; to which they readily consented.

They went by water up the river to Antiochus, with the overtures of peace, accompanied by two of Ptolemy's ambassadors, who had the same instructions. He gave them a very gracious reception in his camp, regaled them that day in a very magnificent manner, and appointed the next day for them to make their proposals. The Achæans spoke first, and afterwards the rest in their turns. All were unanimous in their accusation of Euleus; ascribing the calamities of the war to his mal-administration, and to the minority of Ptolemy Philometor. At the same time, they apologized in a very artful manner for the new king, and employed all the powers of their rhetoric to move Antiochus in his favour, in order to induce him to treat with him; laying great stress on their affinity.

Antiochus, in the answer he gave, agreed entirely with them, as to the cause and origin of the war; took occasion from thence to expatiate on the right he had to Coele-syria and Palestine: alleged the reasons we have related above; and produced some documents, which were judged so strong, that all the members of this congress were convinced of the justice of his claim to those provinces. As to the conditions of the peace, he postponed them till another opportunity; giving them reason to hope that he would cause a solemn treaty to be drawn up, as soon as two absent persons, whom he named, should be with him; declaring, at the same time, that he would not take a single step without them.

After this answer he decamped, came to Naucratis, marched from thence to Alexandria, and began to besiege it. In this extremity, Ptolemy Euergetes and Cleopatra his sister, who were in the city, sent ambassadors to Rome, representing the deplorable condition to which they were reduced, and imploring the aid of the Romans. The ambassadors appeared in the audience to which they were admitted by the senate, with all the marks of sorrow used at that time in the greatest afflictions, and made a speech still more affecting. They observed that the authority of the Romans was so much revered by all nations and kings; and that Antiochus particularly had received so many obligations from them; that if they would only declare by their ambassadors, that the senate did not approve of his making war against kings in alliance with Rome, they did not doubt but Antiochus would immediately draw off his troops from Alexandria, and return to Syria: that should the senate refuse to afford them protection, Ptolemy and Cleopatra, being expelled from their kingdom, would be immediately reduced to fly to Rome; and that it would reflect a dishonour on the Romans, to have neglected to aid the king and queen, at a time when their affairs were so desperate.

The senate, moved with their remonstrances, and persuaded that it would not be for the interest of the Romans to suffer Antiochus to attain to such a height of power, and that he would be too formidable should he unite the crown of Egypt to that of Syria, resolved to send an embassy to Egypt to put an end to the war. C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimus, and C. Hostilius, were appointed for this important negotiation. Their instructions were, that they should first wait upon Antiochus, and afterwards on Ptolemy; should order them, in the name of the senate, to suspend all hostilities, and put an end to the war; and that should either of the parties refuse compliance, the Romans would no longer consider them as their friend or ally. As the danger was imminent, three days after the resolution had been taken in the senate, they set out from Rome with the Egyptian ambassadors.

A little before their departure, some ambassadors from Rhodes arrived in Egypt, who came expressly to terminate, if possible, the disputes between the two crowns. They landed at Alexandria, and went from thence to Antiochus's camp. They did all that lay in their power to induce him to come to an accommodation with the king of Egypt; strongly insisting on the friendship with which both crowns had so long honoured them; and how nearly it concerted them to employ their good offices, in order to settle a lasting peace between them. As they expatiated considerably on these common-place topics, Antiochus interrupted them, and declared in few words, that they had no occasion to make long harangues on this subject; that the crown belonged to the elder of the two brothers, with whom he had concluded a peace and contracted a strict friendship; that, if he were recalled and replaced upon the throne, the war would be ended at once.

These indeed were his words, but his intentions were very different; his views being only to perplex affairs for the attainment of his own ends.¹ The resistance he met with from Alexandria, the siege of which he plainly saw he should be forced to raise, obliged him to change his plan, and conclude, that it would henceforward be his interest to keep up an enmity and occasion a war between the two brothers, which might weaken them to such a degree, that it should be in his power to overpower both whenever he pleased. In this view he raised the siege, marched towards Memphis, and gave Philometor, in outward appearance, possession of the whole kingdom. Pelusium excepted, which he kept as a key for entering Egypt when he pleased, and the instant matters should be ripe for his purpose. After having made these dispositions, he returned to Antioch.

Philometor began at last to wake from the lethargy into which his indolent effeminacy had plunged him, and to be sensible of all the calamities these revolutions had brought upon him. He had even natural penetration enough to see through Antiochus's design; and that king's keeping possession of Pelusium opened his eyes. He saw plainly, that he kept this key of Egypt with no other view than to re-enter it, when his brother and himself should be reduced so low, by the war which they carried on against each other, as to be unable to make the least resistance; and that then, both would fall victims to his ambition. The instant, therefore, that Antiochus marched away, he sent to inform his brother that he was willing to come to an accommodation, which was accordingly effected by the mediation of Cleopatra their sister, on condition that the two brothers should reign jointly. Philometor returned to Alexandria, and Egypt was restored to its former tranquillity, to the great joy of the inhabitants, particularly those of Alexandria, who had suffered exceedingly during the war.

Had Antiochus spoken from his heart, when he declared that the sole design of his coming into Egypt was to restore Philometor to his throne, he would have been pleased to hear that the two brothers were reconciled. But he was far from entertaining such thoughts; and I before observed, that he concealed beneath those specious professions, an intention to crush the two brothers, after they should have weakened each other by a war.

The brothers, convinced that Antiochus would again invade them with great vigour, sent ambassadors into Greece to desire some auxiliary forces from the Achæans. The assembly was held in Corinth. The two kings requested only one thousand foot under the command of Lycortas, and two hundred horse, under Polybius. They had also given orders for raising 1000 mercenary troops. Callicrates, who presided in the assembly, opposed the request made by the ambassadors, under the pretence that it would not be for the interest of the Achæan confederates to concern themselves in any manner with foreign affairs; but that they ought to preserve their soldiers, to be in a condition to aid the Romans, who, it was believed, would soon come to a battle with Perseus. Lycortas and Polybius then speaking, observed, among other things, that Polybius having been the year before with Marcius, who commanded the Roman army in Macedonia, to offer him the aid which the Achæan league had decreed to send him; the consul, when he thanked him, said, that as he had got footing in Macedonia, he should not want the aid of the allies; and therefore that the Achæans could not have that pretext for abandoning the kings of Egypt. Besides that, as the league was able without the least inconvenience to levy 30 or 40,000 men, so small a number as was desired by the Egyptian princes would not lessen their strength: that the Achæan confederates ought to embrace the opportunity they now had of aiding the two kings: that it would be the highest ingratitude in them to forget the favours they had received from the Egyptians; and that their refusal on this occasion would be a violation of the treaties and oaths on which the alliance was founded. As the majority were for granting the aid, Callicrates dismissed the ambassadors, upon pretence that it was contrary to the laws, to debate an affair of that nature in such an assembly.

Another therefore was held, some time after, in Sicily; and as the members were upon the point of taking the same resolution, Callicrates read a forged letter from Q. Marcius, by which the Achæans were exhorted to employ their mediation for terminating the war between the two Ptolemies and Antiochus; and in consequence caused a decree to pass, whereby the Achæan confederates agreed to send only an embassy to those princes.

The instant that Antiochus heard of the reconciliation of the two brothers,¹ he resolved to employ his whole force against them. Accordingly he sent his fleet early into Cyprus, to preserve the possession of that island: at the same time he marched at the head of a very powerful land army, with the design to conquer Egypt openly, and not pretend, as he had before done, to fight the cause of one of his nephews. Upon his arrival at Rhinocorura, he found ambassadors from Philometor, who told him, that their sovereign was very sensible that he owed his restoration to Antiochus; that he conjured him not to destroy his own work by employing force and arms; but on the contrary to acquaint him amicably with his pretensions. Antiochus, throwing off the mask, no longer used the tender and affectionate expressions of which he had till then been so ostentatiously lavish, but declared himself at once an enemy to both. He told the ambassadors, that he insisted upon having the island of Cyprus, with the city of Peluseum, and all the land along the arm of the Nile on which it was situated, resigned to him for ever; assuring them, that he was determined to conclude a peace upon no other conditions. He also fixed a day for a final answer to his demand.

The time being elapsed, and the satisfaction he claimed not being made, he began hostilities; penetrated as far as Memphis, subjecting the whole country through which he passed; and there received the submission of almost all the rest of the kingdom. He afterwards marched towards Alexandria, with design to besiege that city, the possession of which would have made him absolute master of all Egypt. He would certainly have succeeded in his enterprise, had he not been checked in his career by the Roman embassy, which broke all the measures he had been so long taking, in order to possess himself of Egypt.

We before observed, that the ambassadors who were nominated to go to Egypt, had left Rome with the utmost diligence. They landed at Alexandria, just at the time Antiochus was marching to besiege it. The ambassadors came up with him at Eleusine,² which was not a mile from Alexandria. The king seeing Popilius, with whom he had been intimately acquainted at Rome when he was a hostage in that city, opened his arms to embrace him as his old friend. The Roman, who did not consider himself on that occasion as a private man, but as a servant of the public, desired to know, before he answered his compliment, whether he spoke to a friend or an enemy of Rome. He then gave him the decree of the senate, bade him read it over, and return him an immediate answer. Antiochus, after perusing it, said he would examine the contents of it with his friends, and give his answer in a short time. Popilius, enraged at the king for talking of delays, drew, with the wand he had in his hand, a circle round Antiochus, and then raising his voice; "Answer," says he, "the senate, before you stir out of that circle." The king, quite confounded at so haughty an order, after a moment's reflection, replied that he would act according to the desire of the senate. Popilius then received his civilities; and behaved afterwards in all respects as an old friend. How important was the effect of this blunt loftiness of sentiment and expression!³ The Roman with a few words strikes terror into the king of Syria, and saves the king of Egypt.

The circumstance which made the one so bold, and the other so submissive, was the news that arrived just before of the great victory gained by the Romans over Perseus, king of Macedonia. From that instant every thing gave way before them; and the Roman name grew formidable to all princes and nations.

Antiochus having left Egypt at the time stipulated, Popilius returned with his colleagues to Alexandria, where he brought to a conclusion the treaty of union between the two brothers, which had hitherto been but slightly sketched out. He then crossed into Cyprus; sent home Antiochus's fleet, which had gained a victory over that of the Egyptians; restored the whole island to the kings of Egypt, who had a just claim to it; and returned to Rome, in order to acquaint the senate with the success of his embassy.

Ambassadors from Antiochus, the two Ptolemies, and Cleopatra their sister, arrived there almost at the same time. The former said, "That the peace which the senate had been pleased to grant their sovereign, appeared to him more glorious than the most splendid conquests; and that he had obeyed the commands of the Roman ambassadors, as strictly as if they had been sent from the gods." How grovelling, and at the same time how impious, was all this! They afterwards congratulated the Romans on the victory they had gained over Perseus. The rest of the ambassadors declared, in the like extravagant strain, "That the two Ptolemies and Cleopatra thought themselves bound in as great obligations to the senate and people of Rome, as to their parents, and even to the gods; having been delivered by the protection which Rome had granted them, from a very grievous siege; and re-established on the throne of their ancestors, of which they had been almost entirely dispossessed." The senate answered, "That Antiochus acted wisely in paying obedience to the ambassadors; and that the people and senate of Rome were pleased with him for it." Methinks this is carrying the spirit of haughtiness as high as possible. With regard to Ptolemy and Cleopatra, it was answered, "That the senate were very much pleased with the opportunity of doing them some service: and that they would endeavour to make them sensible, that they ought to look upon the friendship and protection of the Romans as the most solid support of their kingdom." The prætor was then ordered to make the ambassadors the usual presents.

In his march through Palestine, he detached 22,000 men, the command of whom he gave to Apollonius, with orders to destroy the city of Jerusalem.

Apollonius arrived there just two years after this city had been taken by Antiochus. At his first coming, he did not behave in any manner as if he had received such cruel orders, and waited till the first sabbath-day before he executed them. But then, seeing all the people assembled peaceably in the synagogues and engaged in paying their religious worship to the Creator; he put in execution the barbarous commission he had received, and setting all his troops upon them, he commanded them to cut to pieces all the men, and to seize all the women and children, in order that they might be exposed to sale. These commands were obeyed with the utmost cruelty and rigour. Not a single man was spared; all they could find being cruelly butchered, inasmuch that the streets streamed with blood. The city was afterwards plundered; and fire set to several parts of it, after all the riches that could be found had been carried off. They demolished such parts of the houses as were still standing; and, with the ruins, built a strong fort on the top of one of the hills of the city of David, opposite to the temple, which it commanded. They threw a strong garrison into it, to awe the whole Jewish nation; they made it a place for arms, furnished with good magazines, where they deposited all the spoils taken in the plunder of the city.

From thence the garrison fell on all who came to worship the true God in the temple; and shed their blood on every part of the sanctuary, which they polluted by all possible methods. A stop was put to the morning and evening sacrifices; not one of the servants of the true God daring to come and adore him there.

As soon as Antiochus was returned to Antioch, he published a decree, by which the several nations in his dominions were commanded to lay aside their ancient religious ceremonies and their particular usages; and to conform to the religion of the king, and to worship the same gods, and after the same manner, as he did. This decree, though expressed in general terms, was nevertheless aimed chiefly at the Jews, whose religion, as well as their nation, he was absolutely determined to extirpate.

In order that this edict might be punctually executed, he sent commissioners into all the provinces of his empire, who were commanded to see it put in execution, and to instruct the people in all the ceremonies and customs to which they were to conform.

The Gentiles obeyed with no great reluctance. However little affected we might suppose them to be with the change of their worship or gods, they however were not very well pleased with this innovation in religious matters. No people seemed more eager to comply with the orders of the court than the Samaritans. They presented a petition to the king, in which they declared themselves not to be Jews; and desired that their temple, built on mount Gerizim, which, till then, had not been dedicated to any deity in particular, might henceforward be dedicated to the Grecian Jupiter, and be called after his name. Antiochus received their petition very graciously; and ordered Nicanor, deputy-governor of the province of Samaria, to dedicate their temple to the Grecian Jupiter as they had desired, and not to molest them in any manner.

But the Samaritans were not the only apostates who forsook their God and their law in this trial. Several Jews also, either to escape the persecution, or to ingratiate themselves with the king or his officers, or else from inclination or libertinism, did the same. From these different motives many fell from Israel; and several of those who had once taken this wicked step, joining themselves with the king's forces, became (as is but too common) greater persecutors of their unhappy brethren than the heathens themselves, employed to execute this barbarous commission.

The commissioner who was sent into Judea and Samaria, to see the king's decree punctually obeyed, was called Athenæus, a man advanced in years, and extremely well versed in all the ceremonies of the Grecian idolatry, who, for that reason, was judged a fit person to invite those nations to join in it. As soon as he arrived in Jerusalem, he began by putting a stop to the sacrifices which were offered up to the God of Israel, and suppressing all the observances of the Jewish law. They polluted the temple in such a manner, that it was no longer fit for the service of God; profaned the sabbaths and other festivals; forbid the circumcision of children; carried off and burnt all the copies of the law wherever they could find them; abolished all the ordinances of God in every part of the country, and put to death whoever was found to have acted contrary to the decree of the king. The Syrian soldiers, and the commissioner who commanded over them, were the chief instruments by which the Jews were converted to the religion professed by the sovereign.

To establish it the sooner in every part of the nation, altars and chapels filled with idols were erected in every city, and sacred groves were planted. Officers were appointed over these, who caused all the people in general to offer sacrifices in them every month, on the day of the month on which the king was born, who made them eat swine's flesh, and other unclean animals sacrificed there.

One of these officers, Appelles by name, came to Modin, the residence of Mattathias, of the sacerdotal race, a venerable man, and extremely zealous for the law of God. He was son to John, and grandson to Simon, from whose father Asmoneus the family was called Asmoneans. With him were his five sons, all brave men, and fired with as ardent a zeal for the law of God as himself. These were Joannan, surnamed Gaddis; Simon, surnamed Thasi; Judas, surnamed Maccabeus; Eleazar, surnamed Abaron; and Jonathan, surnamed Apphus. On his arrival at Modin, Appelles assembled the inhabitants, and explained to them the purport of his commission. Directing himself afterwards to Mattathias, he endeavoured to persuade him to conform to the king's orders, in hopes that the conversion of so venerable a man would induce all the rest of the inhabitants to follow his example. He promised that, in case of his compliance, the king would rank him in the number of his friends, and appoint him a member of his council; and that himself and his sons should be raised, by the court, to the greatest honours and preferments. Mattathias said, with a loud voice, so as to be heard by the whole assembly, that though all the nations of the earth should obey king Antiochus, and all the people of Israel should abandon the law of their forefathers, and obey his ordinances, yet himself, his children, and his brothers, would adhere for ever inviolably to the law of God.

After having made this declaration, seeing a Jew going up to the altar which the heathens had raised, to sacrifice there in obedience to the king's injunction; fired with a zeal like that of Phineas, and transported with a just and holy indignation, he rushed upon the apostate and killed him: after this, being assisted by his sons, and some others who joined them, he also killed the king's commissioner and all his followers. Having in a manner set up the standard, by this bold action, he cried aloud in the city: "Whosoever is zealous of the law, and maintaineth the covenants, let him follow me." Having now assembled his whole family, and all who were truly zealous for the worship of God, he retired with them to the mountains, whither they were soon followed by others; so that all the deserts of Judea were filled, in a little time, with people who fled from the persecution.

At first, when the Jews were attacked on the sabbath, for fear of violating the holiness of the day, they did not dare to make the least defence, but suffered themselves to be cut to pieces. However, they soon became sensible, that the law of the sabbath was not binding on persons in the case of such imminent danger.

Advice being brought to Antiochus, that his decrees were not so implicitly obeyed in Judea as in all other nations, he went thither in person, in order to see them put in execution. He exercised the most horrid cruelties over all such Jews as refused to abjure their religion; in order to force the rest, by the dread of the like inhuman treatment, to comply with what was required of them. At this time happened the martyrdom of Eleazar, and that of the mother and her seven sons, commonly called the Maccabees. Although their history is universally known, it appears to me so important, and relates so nearly to Antiochus, whose reign I am now writing, that I cannot prevail with myself to omit it. I shall therefore repeat it in almost the very words of Scripture.

The extreme violence of the persecution occasioned many Jews to fall away; but on the other side, several continued inflexible, and chose to suffer death, rather than pollute themselves by eating impure meats. One of the most illustrious among these, was Eleazar. He was a venerable old man, ninety years of age, and a doctor of the law, whose life had been one continued series of spotless innocence. He was commanded to eat swine's flesh, and endeavours were used to make him swallow it, by forcibly opening his mouth. But Eleazar, preferring a glorious death to a criminal life, went voluntarily to execution; and persevering in his resolute patience, was determined not to infringe the law to save his life.

His friends who were present, moved with an unjust compassion, took him aside, and earnestly besought him to permit them to bring him such meats as he was allowed to eat; in order that it might be imagined that he had eaten of the meats of the sacrifice, pursuant to the king's command; and by that means save his life. But Eleazar, considering only what his great age, the noble and generous sentiments he was born with, and the life of purity and innocence which he had led from his infancy, required of him, answered, pursuant to the ordinances of the holy law of God, that he would rather die than consent to what was desired of him. "It would be shameful," says he to them, "for me, at this age, to use such an artifice, which would occasion many young men, upon the supposition that Eleazar, at fourscore and ten years of age, had embraced the principles of the heathens, to be imposed upon by the deceit, which I should have employed to preserve the short remains of a corruptible life; and thereby I should dishonour my old age, and expose it to the curses of all men. Besides, supposing I should by that means for the present avoid the punishment of men, I could never fly from the hand of the Almighty, neither in this world nor in that which is to come. For this reason, if I lay down my life courageously, I shall appear worthy of my old age, and shall leave behind me, for the imitation of young people, an example of constancy and resolution, by suffering patiently an honourable death, for the sake of our venerable and holy laws." Eleazar had no sooner ended his speech, than he was dragged to execution. The officers that attended him, and who hitherto had behaved with some humanity towards him, grew furious upon what he had said, which they looked upon as the effect of pride. When the torments had made him ready to breathe his last, he vented a deep sigh, and said: "O Lord! thou who art possessed of the holy knowledge, thou seest that I, who could have delivered myself from death, do yet suffer cruel agonies in my body: but in my soul find joy in my sufferings, because I fear thee." Thus died this holy man, leaving by his death, not only to the young men, but to his whole nation, a glorious example of virtue and resolution.

At this time seven brothers, with their mother, were seized; and king Antiochus would force them to eat swine's flesh contrary to their law, by causing their bodies to be scourged in a most inhuman manner. But the eldest of the brethren said to him:

"What is it thou wouldst ask or learn of us? We are ready to lay down our lives, rather than violate the holy laws which God gave to our forefathers." The king being exasperated at these words, ordered brazen pans and caldrons to be heated; and, when they were red, he caused the tongue of that man who had spoken first, to be cut off; had the skin torn from his head, and the extremities of his hands and feet cut off, before the eyes of his mother and his brethren. After being mutilated in every part of his body, he was brought to the fire, and fried in the pan. Whilst these tortures were inflicting upon him, his brothers and their mother exhorted each other to die courageously, saying, "The Lord God will have regard to truth: he will have pity on us, and comfort us, as Moses declares in his song."

The first dying in this manner, the second was taken; and after the skin of his head, with the hair were torn away, he was asked whether he would eat of some meats which were presented to him, before that all his limbs should be severed one after another from his body. But he answered in the language of his country, "I will not." He was then tortured in the same manner as his brother. Being ready to expire, he spoke thus to the king: "Wicked prince! you bereave us of this present life; but the king of heaven and earth, if we die for the defence of his laws, will one day raise us up to everlasting life."

They now proceeded to the third. He was commanded to put forth his tongue, which he did immediately; and afterwards stretching forth his hands manfully, he bravely said: "I received these limbs from heaven, but now I despise them, since I am to defend the laws of God; from the sure and steadfast hope that he will one day restore them to me." The king and all his followers were astounded at the intrepidity of this young man, who utterly disregarded the severest tortures.

The fourth was tortured in the same manner, and being ready to die he said to the king: "It is for our advantage to be killed by men, because we hope that God, by raising us up again, will restore us to life; but thy resurrection, O king, will not be unto life."

The fifth, whilst they were tormenting him, said to Antiochus: "You now act according to your own will and pleasure, because you are invested with absolute power among men, though you are but a mortal man. But do not imagine that God has forsaken our nation. Stay but a little, and you will see the wondrous effects of his power; and in what manner he will torment both yourself and your posterity."

The sixth came next, who, the moment before he expired said: "Do not deceive yourself; it is true, indeed, our sins have drawn upon us the exquisite tortures which we now suffer; but do not flatter yourself with the hopes of impunity, after having presumed to make war against God himself."

In the mean time their mother, supported by the hopes that she had in God, beheld with incredible resolution all her seven sons die thus in one day. She encouraged them by her discourse, full of fortitude and wisdom, and uniting a manly courage with the tenderness of a mother, she said to them: "I know not in what manner you were formed in my womb, for it was not I who inspired you with a soul and with life, nor formed your members; but I am sure that the Creator of the world, who fashioned man, and who gave being to all things, will one day restore you to life by his infinite mercy, in return for your having despised it here, out of the love you bear to his laws."

There still remained her youngest son. Antiochus began to exhort him to compliance; assuring him, with an oath, that he would raise him to riches and power, and rank him in the number of his favourites, if he would forsake the laws of his forefathers. But the youth being insensible to all these promises, the king called his mother, and advised her to counsel the young man so as to save his life. This she promised; and going up to her son, and laughing at the tyrant's cruelty, she said to him in her native language, "Son, have pity on me, who bore you nine months in my womb; who for three years fed you with milk from my breasts, and brought you up ..

your present age. I conjure you, dear child, to look upon heaven and earth, and every thing they contain, and to consider that God formed them all of things that were not, as well as man. Fear not that cruel executioner; but show yourself worthy of your brethren, by submitting cheerfully to death: in order that, by the mercy of God, I may receive you, together with your brothers, in the glory which awaits us."

As she was speaking in this manner, the young man cried aloud: "What is it you expect from me? I do not obey the king's command, but the law which was given us by Moses. As to you, from whom all the calamities with which the Hebrews are afflicted flow, you shall not escape the hand of the Almighty. Our sufferings, indeed, are owing to our sins: but if the Lord our God, to chasten and correct us, be for a little time angry with us, he at last will be appeased and be reconciled to his servants. But as for you, the most wicked, the most impious of men, do not flatter yourself with vain hopes. You shall not escape the judgment of God, who is all-seeing and omnipotent. As to my brothers, they, after having suffered a moment the most cruel tortures, have entered into the eternal covenant. In imitation of the example they have set me, I freely give up my body and life for the laws of my forefathers; and I beseech God to extend his mercy soon to our nation; to force you by plagues and tortures to confess that he is the only God; and that his anger, which is justly fallen on the Hebrews, may end by my death and that of my brethren."

The king, now transported with fury, and unable to bear these insults, caused this last youth to be tortured more grievously than the rest. Thus he died in the same holy manner as his brethren, and with a full confidence in God. At last the mother also suffered death.

Mattathias,¹ before he died, sent A. M. 3838. for his five sons, and after exhorting Ant. J. C. 166. them to fight valiantly for the law of God against their persecutors, he appointed Judas for their general, and Simon as president of the council. He afterwards died, and was interred at Modin, in the burying-place of his ancestors, much regretted and lamented by all the faithful Israelites.

Antiochus,² finding that Paulus Æmilius, after having defeated Perseus and conquered Macedonia, had solemnized games in the city of Amphipolis, situated on the river Strymon, was desirous of doing the same at Daphne near Antioch. He appointed the time for them, sent to all places to invite spectators, and drew together prodigious multitudes. The games were celebrated with incredible pomp, cost immense sums, and lasted several days. The part he there acted during the whole time, answered in every respect the character given of him by Daniel,³ who calls him a vile or contemptible person, as I have said elsewhere. He there committed so many extravagant actions before that infinite multitude of people, assembled from different parts of the earth, that he became the laughing stock of them all: and many of them were so much disgusted, that, to prevent their being spectators of a conduct so unworthy a prince, and so repugnant to the rules of modesty and decorum, they refused to go any more to the feasts to which he invited them.

He had scarce ended the solemnization of those games,⁴ when Tiberius Gracchus arrived as ambassador from the Romans, in order to have an eye on Antiochus's actions. That prince gave him so polite and friendly a reception, that the ambassador not only laid aside all suspicion with regard to him, and did not perceive that he retained any resentment for what had happened in Alexandria, but even blamed those who had spread such reports of him. And indeed Antiochus, besides other civilities, quitted his palace to make room for Tiberius Gracchus and his train, and was even going to resign his crown to him. The ambassador ought to have been politician enough to suspect all these civilities: for it is certain that Antiochus was meditating, at that time, how he might best revenge himself of the Romans: but he disguised his sentiments, in order to gain time, and to be the better able to carry on his preparations.

Whilst Antiochus was amusing himself with celebrating games at Daphne,⁵ Judas was acting a very different part in Judea. After having levied an army, he fortified the cities, rebuilt the fortresses, threw strong garrisons into them, and thereby awed the whole country. Apollonius, who was governor of Samaria under Antiochus, thought he should be able to check his progress, and accordingly marched directly against him. However, Judas defeated him, killed him, and made a great slaughter of his troops. Seron, another commander, who had flattered himself with the hopes of revenging the affront his master had received, met with the same fate as Apollonius, and like him was also defeated and killed in the battle.

When news was brought to Antiochus of this double defeat, he was exasperated to fury. Immediately he assembled all his troops, which formed a mighty army, and determined to destroy the whole Jewish nation, and to settle other people in the country. But when his troops were to be paid, he had not sufficient sums in his coffers, having exhausted them in the foolish expenses he had lately been at. For want of money he was obliged to suspend the vengeance he meditated against the Jewish nation, and all the plans he had formed for the immediate execution of that design.

He had squandered immense sums on the games.⁶ Besides this, he had been extravagantly profuse in every other respect, particularly in the presents he bestowed on private persons and whole bodies of men. He would often throw handfuls of money among his attendants and others; sometimes seasonably enough, but most frequently without sense or reason. On these occasions he verified what the prophet Daniel had foretold of him, that he should "scatter among them the prey and spoil of riches;"⁷ and the author of the Maccabees says,⁸ that he had been exceedingly liberal, and had "abounded above the kings that were before him." We are told by Athenæus,⁹ that the funds which enabled him to defray so prodigious an expense were, first, the spoils he had taken in Egypt, contrary to the promise he had made Philometor in his minority; secondly, the sums he had raised among his friends, by way of free gifts; lastly, (which was the most considerable article,) the plunder of a great number of temples, which he had sacrilegiously pillaged.

Besides the difficulties to which the want of money reduced him,¹⁰ others arose, according to Daniel's prophecy, "from the tidings" which came to him "out of the east and out of the north." For, northward, Artaxias, king of Armenia, had rebelled against him; and Persia, which lay eastward, discontinued the regular payment of the tribute. There,¹¹ as in almost every other part of his dominions, all things seemed in the utmost confusion, occasioned by the new ordinance, by which the ancient customs of so many of his subjects were abolished; and those of the Greeks, of which he was ridiculously fond, established in their stead. These commotions occasioned great confusion with respect to the payments, which till then had been very regular throughout that vast and rich empire, and had always supplied sums sufficient to defray the great expense it was necessary to incur.

To remedy these grievances,¹² as well as a multitude of others, he resolved to divide his forces into two parts; to give the command of one of his armies to Lysias, descended from the blood-royal, in order that he might subdue the Jews; and to march the other himself into Armenia, and afterwards into Persia, to regulate affairs and restore order in those provinces. He accordingly left to Lysias the government of all the countries on this side of the Euphrates; and the care of his son's education, who was then only seven years old, and who afterwards was called Antiochus Epistator. After passing mount Taurus, he entered Armenia, defeated Artaxias, and took him prisoner. He marched from thence into Persia, where he supposed he should have no other trouble than to receive the tribute of that rich province, and those in its neighbourhood. He fondly flattered himself that he should there find sums sufficient to fill his coffers, and reinstate all his affairs upon as good a footing as ever.

Whilst he was revolving all these projects, Lysias was meditating how he might best put in execution the orders he had left him; especially those which related to the Jews. The king had commanded him to extirpate them, so as not to leave one Hebrew in the country; which he intended to people with other inhabitants, and to distribute the lands among them by lot. He thought it necessary for him to make the more despatch in this expedition, because advice was daily brought him that the arms of Judas made prodigious progress, and increased in strength by taking all the fortresses which he approached.

Philip, whom Antiochus had left governor of Judea, seeing Judas's success, had sent expresses, with advice of this, to Ptolemy Macron, governor of Cœle-syria and Palestine, on which Judea depended; and had pressed him, by letter, to employ such measures as might best support the interests of their common sovereign in this important juncture. Macron had communicated his advices and letters to Lysias. A resolution was therefore immediately taken, to send an army, of which Ptolemy Macron was appointed generalissimo, into Judea. He appointed Nicanor, his intimate friend, his lieutenant general; sent him before, at the head of 20,000 men, with Gorgias, a veteran officer of consummate experience, to assist him. Accordingly they entered the country, and were soon followed by Ptolemy, with the rest of the forces intended for that expedition. The army, after their junction, came and encamped at Emmaus, near Jerusalem. It consisted of 40,000 foot and 7000 horse.

Thither also repaired an army of another kind. It consisted of merchants who came to purchase the slaves who, it was supposed, would certainly be taken in that war. Nicanor, who had flattered himself with the hopes of levying large sums of money by this means, sufficient to pay the 2000 talents¹ which the king still owed the Romans, on account of the ancient treaty of Sipylus, published a proclamation in the neighbouring countries, declaring that all the prisoners taken in that war should be sold, at the rate of ninety for a talent². A resolution indeed had been taken to cut to pieces all the men grown; to reduce all the rest to a state of captivity; and 180,000 of the latter, at the price above mentioned, would have sold exactly for the sum in question. The merchants, therefore, finding this would be a very profitable article to them, (as it was a very low price), flocked thither in crowds, and brought considerable sums with them. We are told that 1000, all of them very considerable merchants, arrived in the Syrian camp on this occasion, without including their domestics, and the persons that would be wanted to look after the captives they intended to purchase.

Judas and his brethren, perceiving the danger with which they were threatened by the approach of so powerful an army, which they knew had been commanded to extirpate entirely the Jewish nation, resolved to make a very vigorous defence; to fight for themselves, their law, and their liberty; and either to conquer or die sword in hand. Accord-ly, they divided the 6000 men under their command into four bodies of 1500 men each. Judas put himself at the head of the first, and gave the command of the three others to his brethren. He afterwards marched them to Maspha, there to offer together their prayers to God, and to implore his assistance in the extreme danger to which they were now exposed. He made choice of this place, because, as Jerusalem was in the hands of their enemies, and the sanctuary trodden down, they could not assemble in it to solemnize that religious act; and Maspha seemed the fittest place for that purpose, because God was worshipped there before³ the foundation of the temple.

Here are now two armies ready to engage; the numbers on each side very unequal, and the disposition of their minds still more so. They agree, however, in one point; that is, both are firmly persuaded they shall gain the victory; the one, because they have a mighty army of well-disciplined troops, commanded by brave and experienced generals; the other, because they put their whole trust in the God of armies.

After proclamation had been made according to the law,⁴ that those who had built a house that year, or married a wife, or planted a vine, or were afraid, had liberty to retire; Judas's 6000 men were reduced to half that number. Nevertheless, this valiant captain of the people of God, resolutely determined to fight the mighty host of the enemy with only this handful of men, and to leave the issue to Providence, advanced with his few forces, encamped very near the enemy, and told his soldiers, after having animated them by all the motives which the present conjuncture supplied, that he intended to give the Syrians battle on the morrow, and therefore that they must prepare for it.

But receiving advice that same evening, that Gorgias had been detached from the enemy's camp with 5000 foot and 1000 horse, all chosen troops, and that he was marching by a by-way, through which the apostate Jews led him, in order to come and surprise his camp in the night; he was not satisfied with frustrating that design, but even made use of the very stratagem which the enemy intended to employ against him, and was successful in it; for raising his camp immediately, and carrying off all the baggage, he marched and attacked the enemy's camp, weakened by the best troops having been detached from it; and spread such terror and confusion into every part of it, that after 3000 Syrians had been cut to pieces, the rest fled, and left him the whole plunder of their camp.

As Gorgias was still to be apprehended, at the head of this formidable detachment, Judas, like a wise captain, kept his troops together, and would not suffer them to straggle about after plunder, or in pursuit of the enemy, till they should have defeated that body also. He was successful, without coming to a battle; for Gorgias, after failing to meet with Judas in his camp, and having sought for him in vain in the mountains, whither he supposed he had retired, withdrew at last into his camp, and finding it in flames, and the army routed and put to flight, it was impossible for him to keep his soldiers in order; so that these threw down their arms and fled also. Then Judas and the men under his command pursued them vigorously, and cut to pieces a greater number on this occasion than they had before done in the camp. Nine thousand Syrians were left dead in the field, and the greatest part of those who escaped were either maimed or wounded.

After this Judas marched back his soldiers, in order to plunder the camp, where they met with immense booty; and great numbers of those who were come as to a fair, to buy the captive Jews, were themselves taken prisoners and sold. The next day, being the sabbath, was kept in the most religious manner. The Hebrews, on that occasion, gave themselves up to a holy joy, and returned a solemn thanksgiving to God for the great and signal deliverance he had wrought in their favour.

⁴ Deut. xx. 5, &c.

We have here a sensible image of the feeble opposition which an arm of flesh is able to make against that of the Almighty, on whom alone the fate of battles depends. It is evident that Judas was fully sensible of his own weakness. "How can we," says he to the Almighty before the battle, "stand before them, unless thou thyself assistest us?" And it is as evident that he was no less firmly persuaded of the success of his arms. "The victory," he had said before, "does not depend on the number of soldiers, but it is from Heaven that all our strength comes." But although Judas had so entire a confidence in God, he employs all those expedients which the most experienced and bravest general could use, in order to obtain the victory. How excellent a pattern have we here for generals! to pray with humility, because all things depend on God; and to act with vigour, as if all things depended on man. We still possess (thanks to the Almighty) generals who glory in entertaining such thoughts; and who, at the head of great armies, composed of as brave soldiers as ever were, as well as of officers and commanders of an almost unparalleled courage and zeal, do not rely on all those human advantages, but solely on the protection of the God of armies.

Judas,¹ encouraged by the important victory he had gained, and reinforced by a great number of troops whom this success brought to him, employed the advantage which this gave him to distress the rest of his enemies. Knowing that Timotheus and Bacchides, two of Antiochus's lieutenants, were raising troops to fight him, he marched against them, defeated them in a great battle, and killed upwards of 20,000 of their men.

Lysias hearing of the ill success
A. M. 3339. which Antiochus's arms had met with
Ant. J. C. 165. in Judea,² and the great losses he had sustained in that country, was in great astonishment and perplexity. However, knowing that the king had a strong desire to extirpate that nation, he made mighty preparations for a new expedition against the Jews. Accordingly he levied an army of 60,000 foot and 5000 horse, all chosen troops, and putting himself at their head, he marched into Judea, firmly resolved to lay waste the whole country, and destroy all the inhabitants.

He encamped at Bethsura, a city standing to the south of Jerusalem, towards the frontiers of Idumæa. Judas advanced towards him at the head of 10,000 men; and fully persuaded that the Lord would assist him, he engaged the enemy with this disproportionate body of troops, killed 5000 of them, and put the rest to flight. Lysias, dismayed at the surprising valour of Judas's soldiers, who fought with intrepid courage, determined to conquer or die, led back his defeated army to Antioch; intending, nevertheless, to come and attack them again the next year with a still more powerful body of forces.

Judas,³ being left master of the country by the retreat of Lysias, took advantage of this interval of rest, and marched to Jerusalem, where he recovered the sanctuary from the heathens, purified and dedicated it to the service of God. This solemn dedication continued for eight days, which were spent in thanksgiving for the deliverance that God had vouchsafed them; and it was ordained that the anniversary of it should be solemnized every year. The neighbouring nations, jealous of the prosperity of the Jews, made a league to destroy them, and resolved to join Antiochus, in order to extirpate that people.

This prince was then in Persia.⁴
A. M. 3340. levying the tribute which had not Ant. J. C. 164. been paid regularly. He was informed that Elymais was thought to abound with riches; and especially, that in a temple of that city, which according to Polybius was dedicated to Diana, and to Venus according to Appian, prodigious sums were laid up. He went thither with a design to take the city, and plunder the temple, as he had before done to Jerusalem: but his design having been discovered, the country people and the inhabitants of the city took up arms to defend their temple, and gave him a shameful repulse. Antiochus, enraged at this disgrace, withdrew to Ecbatana.

To add to this affliction, news was there brought him of the defeat of Nicanor and Timotheus in Judea. In the violence of his rage he set out with all possible expedition, in order to make that nation feel the dreadful effects of his wrath; venting nothing but menaces on his march, and breathing only final ruin and destruction. Advancing in this disposition towards Babylonla, which was in his way, fresh expresses came to him with advice of Lysias's defeat, and also that the Jews had retaken the temple, thrown down the altars and idols which he had set up in them, and re-established their ancient worship. At this news his fury increased. Immediately he commands his coachman to drive with the utmost speed, in order that he might sooner have an opportunity of fully satiating his vengeance; threatening to make Jerusalem the burying-place of the whole Jewish nation, and not to leave one single inhabitant in it. He had scarce uttered that blasphemous expression, when he was struck by the hand of God. He was seized with incredible pains in his bowels, and the most excessive pangs of the colic. "Thus the murderer and blasphemer," says the author of the Maccabees, "having suffered most grievously, as he treated other men, so died he a miserable death."

But still his pride was not abated by this first shock; so far from it, that suffering himself to be hurried away by the wild transports of his fury, and breathing nothing but vengeance against the Jews, he gave orders for proceeding with all possible speed in the journey. But as his horses were running forwards impetuously, he fell from his chariot, and, thereby bruised, in a grievous manner, every part of his body; so that his attendants were forced to put him into a litter, where he suffered inexpressible torments. Worms crawled from every part of him; his flesh fell away piecemeal; and the stench was so great, that it became intolerable to the whole army. Being himself unable to bear it, "it is meet,"⁵ says he, "to be subject unto God; and man, who is mortal, should not think of himself as if he were a God." Acknowledging that it was the hand of the God of Israel which struck him, because of the calamities he had brought upon Jerusalem, he promises to exert the utmost liberality towards his chosen people; to enrich with precious gifts the holy temple of Jerusalem which he had plundered; to furnish from his revenues the sums necessary for defraying the expense of the sacrifices; to turn Jew himself; and to travel into every part of the world in order to publish the power of the Almighty. He hoped he should calm his wrath by these mighty promises, which the violence of his present affliction, and the fear of future torments, extorted from his mouth, but not from his heart. But, adds the author of the Maccabees, "This wicked person vowed unto the Lord, who now no more would have mercy upon him."⁶ And indeed this murderer and blasphemer, (these are the names which this writer substitutes in the place of illustrious, which men had bestowed on that prince,) being struck in a dreadful manner, and treated as he treated others, finished an impious life by a miserable death.⁷

Before he expired, he sent for Philip, who had been brought up with him from his infancy, and was his favourite; and bestowed on him the regency of Syria during the minority of his son, then nine years of age. He put into his hands the diadem, the seal of Philip caused the king's body to be conveyed to Antioch. This prince had reigned eleven years.

SECTION IV.—PROPHECIES OF DANIEL RELATING TO ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

As Antiochus Epiphanes was a violent persecutor of the people of God, who formed the Jewish church, and was at the same time the type of the Antichrist, who in after ages was to afflict the Christian church; Daniel details much more fully his prophecy respecting this prince, than those which relate to any other of whom he makes mention. This prophecy consists of two parts: one of which relates to his wars in Egypt, and the other to the persecution carried on by him against the Jews. We shall treat these separately, and unite together the various places where mention is made of them.

I. The wars of Antiochus Epiphanes against Egypt, foretold by Daniel the prophet.

"And in his,"¹ Seleucus Philopator's, "estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries." This verse, which points out the accession of Antiochus to the crown, has been already explained.

"And with the arms of a flood shall they,"² the Syrians, "be overflowed before him;" Antiochus Epiphanes, "and shall be broken; yea, also the prince of the covenant."³ Heliodorus, the murderer of Seleucus and his adherents, as also those of the Egyptian king, who had formed designs against Syria, were defeated by the forces of Attalus and Eumenes, and dispersed by the arrival of Antiochus, whose presence disconcerted all their projects. By the prince of the covenant, we may suppose to be meant, either Heliodorus, the ringleader of the conspirators, who had killed Seleucus; or rather Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, who lost his life by a conspiracy of his own subjects, at the very time that he was meditating a war against Syria. Thus Providence removed this powerful adversary, to make way for Antiochus, and raise him to the throne.

It appears that the prophet, in the following verses, points out clearly enough the four different expeditions of Antiochus into Egypt.

Antiochus's first expedition into Egypt.

"And after the league made with him,"⁴ with Ptolemy Philometor his nephew, king of Egypt, "he shall work deceitfully; for he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people." Antiochus, though he was already determined on the war, still assumed a specious appearance of friendship for the king of Egypt. He even sent Apollonius to Memphis, to be present at the banquet given on occasion of that prince's coronation, as a proof that it was agreeable to him. Nevertheless, soon after, on pretence of defending his nephew, he marched into Egypt with a small army, in comparison with those which he levied afterwards. The battle was fought near Pelusium. Antiochus was strong, that is, victorious: and afterwards returned to Tyre. Such was the end of his first expedition.

Antiochus's second expedition into Egypt.

"He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places of the pvince, (Egypt),⁵ and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers: he shall scatter among them (his troops); the prey and spoil and riches: yea, and he shall forecast his devices against the strong-holds, even for a time."

"And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the South (of Egypt) with a strong army, and the king of the South shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand, for they shall forecast devices against him.

"Yea,⁶ they that feed of the portion of his (the king of Egypt's) meat shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow; and many shall fall down slain."

In these three verses appear the principal characters of Antiochus's second expedition into Egypt; his mighty armies, his rapid conquests, the rich spoils he carried from thence, and the dissimulation and treachery he began to put in practice towards Ptolemy.

Antiochus, after employing the whole winter in making preparations for a second expedition into Egypt, invaded it both by sea and land, the instant the season would permit. "Wherefore he entered into Egypt with a great multitude,⁷ with chariots, and elephants, and horsemen, and a great navy. And made war against Ptolemy, king of Egypt: but Ptolemy was afraid of him, and fled; and many were wounded to death. Thus they got the strong cities in the land of Egypt, and he took the spoils thereof."

Daniel, some verses after, is more minute and circumstantial in his prophecy of this event.

"And at the time of the end shall the king of the South push at him, (Ptolemy is here meant;) and the king of the North (Antiochus) shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over."

"He shall enter also into the glorious land,⁸ and many countries shall be overthrown: but he shall escape out of his hand."

"He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries,⁹ and the land of Egypt shall not escape."

"But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver,¹⁰ and over the precious things of Egypt."

If we compare the relation given by the author of the Maccabees with Daniel's prophecy, we find a perfect resemblance, except that the prophet is even more clear and particular than the historian.

Diodorus relates,¹¹ that Antiochus, after this victory, conquered all Egypt, or at least the greatest part of it: for all the cities, Alexandria excepted, opened their gates to the conqueror. He subdued Egypt with an astonishing rapidity, and did that "which his fathers had not done,"¹² nor his fathers' fathers.

Ptolemy either surrendered himself, or fell into the hands of Antiochus, who at first treated him with kindness; had but one table with him; seemed to be greatly concerned for his welfare, and left him the peaceable possession of his kingdom, reserving to himself Pelusium, which was the key to it. For Antiochus assumed this appearance of friendship with no other view than to have the better opportunity of ruining him. "They that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him."¹³

Antiochus did not make a long stay in Egypt at that time; the news which was brought of the general revolt of the Jews obliging him to march against them.

In the mean time, the inhabitants of Alexandria, offended at Philometor for having concluded an alliance with Antiochus, raised Euergetes his younger brother, to the throne in his stead.

Antiochus, who had advice of what had passed in Alexandria, took this opportunity to return into Egypt, upon pretext of restoring the dethroned monarch, but in reality to make himself absolute master of the kingdom.

Antiochus's third expedition into Egypt.

"And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief;¹⁴ and they shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper: for yet the end shall be at the time appointed."

"Then shall he (Antiochus) return into his land with great riches."¹

Antiochus's third expedition could scarce be pointed out more clearly. That prince, hearing that the Alexandrians had raised Euergetes to the throne, returned to Egypt upon the specious pretence of restoring Philometor: *Per honestam speciem majoris Ptolemæi reducendi in regnum.*² After having overcome the Alexandrians in a sea-fight at Pelusium, he laid siege to Alexandria. But finding the inhabitants made a strong opposition, he was contented with making himself again master of the rest of Egypt, in the name of his nephew, in whose behalf he pretended to have drawn the sword: *Cui regnum quæri suis viribus simulabat.*³ They were then at Memphis, at the same table, and behaved towards one another with all the outward marks of a sincere friendship. The uncle seemed to have his nephew's interest at heart, and the nephew to repose the highest confidence in his uncle; but all this was mere show and outside, both dissembling their real sentiments. The uncle endeavoured to crush his nephew; *Cui regnum quæri suis viribus simulabat,*⁴ ut mox virorem aggrederetur; and the nephew, who saw through this design, voluntatis ejus non ignarus, strove immediately to be reconciled to his brother. Thus did neither prosper in deceiving of the other: nothing was yet determined, and Antiochus returned into Syria.

Antiochus's fourth expedition into Egypt.

"And at the time appointed he shall return and come towards the South,⁵ but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter.

"For the ships of Chittim shall come against him.⁶ Therefore he shall be grieved and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant."

Advice being brought Antiochus, that the two brothers were reconciled, he threw off the mask, and declared publicly, that he intended to conquer Egypt for himself. And to support his pretensions, "he returned towards the South," that is, into Egypt, but was not so successful in this expedition as before. As he was advancing forward to besiege Alexandria,⁷ Popilius and other Roman ambassadors, who were on board a fleet composed of Macedonia, or Greek ships (for this the Hebrew word Chittim signifies,) which they found at Delos, obliged him to lay down his arms, and leave Egypt. He obeyed; but "was grieved and returned, and had indignation against the holy covenant," and the city and temple of Jerusalem, as will be presently seen.

Had the prophet been eye-witness to this event, would it have been possible for him to point it out in a clearer and more exact manner?

II. Cruel persecutions exercised by Antiochus against the Jews, and foretold by the prophet Daniel.

I have mentioned and explained, in another place, the account which Daniel the prophet gives of Alexander the Great's reign, and those of his four successors.

"Behold a he-goat came from the West,⁸ on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground." Is it possible to denote more plainly the rapidity of Alexander's conquests?—"The he-goat waxed very great,⁹ and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones towards the four winds of heaven." These are Alexander's four successors. "And out of one of them came forth a little horn,¹⁰ which waxed exceeding great towards the South, and towards the East, and towards the pleasant land." This is Antiochus Epiphanes, who gained several victories towards the South and the East, and who strongly opposed the army of the Lord and the Jewish people, of whom God was the strength and the protector.

The prophet afterwards points out the war which Epiphanes proclaimed against the people of God, the priests of the Lord, his laws and his temple.

"And it waxed great, (the horn,) even to the host of heaven, and it cast down some of the host, and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. Yea,¹¹ he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, (to God); and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. And a host was given him against the daily sacrifice, by reason of transgression,¹² and it cast down the truth to the ground, and it practised and prospered."

Daniel gave still greater extent to the same prophecy in his eleventh chapter.

"His heart shall be against the holy covenant,¹³ and he shall do exploits. He shall return, and have indignation against the holy covenant."

During the siege of Alexandria,¹⁴ a report had prevailed that Antiochus was dead, and the Jews had been accused of expressing great joy at it. He thereupon marched to their city, stormed it, and exercised all the barbarity that his fury could suggest. About 40,000 men were killed in the compass of three days,¹⁵ and the same number sold as slaves. Antiochus went into the temple, polluted it, and carried off all the vessels, treasures and rich ornaments.

After Popilius had forced him to leave Egypt,¹⁷ he turned the fury with which he was inflamed upon that occasion against the Jews. He sent Apollonius into Judea, with orders to kill all the men capable of bearing arms, and to sell the women and children. Accordingly, Apollonius made dreadful havoc in Jerusalem, set fire to the city, beat down the walls, and carried the women and children into captivity.

"He shall return,¹⁸ and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant. And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall set up the abomination that maketh desolate. And such as do wickedly against the covenant, shall be corrupt by flatteries."

Antiochus declared openly for all those who should renounce the law.¹⁹ Having published an ordinance, by which all the Jews in general were commanded, upon pain of death, to change their religion, he sent some officers to Jerusalem, ordering them to pollute the temple, and abolish the worship of the Most High. They accordingly dedicated this temple to Jupiter Olympius, and placed his statue in it. They raised in every part of the city profane temples and altars, where they forced the Jews to offer sacrifices, and eat of meats sacrificed to idols. Many, from the dread of the torture, seemed to comply in all things required of them; and even prompted others to imitate their dissimulation in order to countenance their base apostasy.

"And such as do wickedly against the covenant,²⁰ shall he (Antiochus) corrupt by flatteries; but the people that do know their God, shall be strong and do exploits." This manifestly points at old Eleazar, the seven Maccabees, and their mother, and a great number of other Jews, who courageously opposed the impious orders of the king.

"And they that understand among the people,²¹ shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days." This relates chiefly to Mattathias and his sons.

"Now when they shall fall,²² they shall be holpen with a little help: but many shall cleave to them with flatteries." Mattathias and Judas Maccabeus supported the distressed nation, and the almost universally abandoned religion, with so small a number of forces, that we can consider the success which the Almighty gave to their arms no otherwise than as a miracle. Their troops grew more numerous by degrees, and afterwards formed a very considerable body.

"And some of them of understanding shall fall,¹ to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end, because it is yet for a time appointed." The sufferings and death of those who steadfastly refused to obey the king's decree, was their glory and triumph.

"And the king shall do according to his will,² and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation (of God) be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done.

"Neither shall he regard the god of his fathers,³ nor the desire of women, nor regard any god: for he shall magnify himself above all."

Epiphanes ridiculed all religions. He plundered the temples of Greece, and wanted to rob that of Elymais. He exercised his impious fury chiefly against Jerusalem and the Jews, and almost without any resistance. The Almighty seemed to wink for a time at all the abominations which were committed in his temple, till his wrath against his people was satisfied.

"But tidings out of the East,⁴ and out of the North, shall trouble him: therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly make away many."

Antiochus was troubled when news was brought him, that the provinces of the East, and Artaxias king of Armenia towards the North, were in arms, and going to throw off his yoke.

Tacitus⁵ tells us, that when Antiochus had formed a resolution to force the Jews to change their religion, and embrace that of the Greeks, the Parthians had revolted from Antiochus. Before he set out for the provinces on the other side of the Euphrates,⁶ he gave Lysias, whom he appointed regent of the kingdom in his absence, half his army; commanding him to extirpate all the Jews, and to settle other nations in their country.

"He shall plant the tabernacles of his palace [in Apadno]⁷ between the seas in the glorious mountain [of Zabi];⁸ yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him." The former part of this verse, which is translated literally from the Hebrew, is very difficult to be explained, because of the two words Apadno and Zabi, which are not to be found in the ancient geography. The reader knows that I do not take upon me to clear up these kind of difficulties. Porphyry, whom we have no reason to suspect, imagined that this verse alluded to Antiochus's expedition beyond the Euphrates, and to his death, which happened on that march. This is the opinion of the greatest part of the interpreters, and therefore we ought to be satisfied with it.

The prophet therefore declares, that Antiochus shall pitch his camp near mount Zabi, (doubtless the same with Taba,⁹ where, according to Polybius,¹⁰ he died,) and that there "he shall come to his end," being abandoned by God, and having none to "help him." We have seen how he expired in the most cruel agonies, and struck with an unavailing repentance, which only increased his torments.

Theodor. et. St. Jerom. and several interpreters, take all the, the prophet Daniel speaks concerning Antiochus Epiphanes in a double sense, as alluding to Antichrist. It is certain that this prince, who was equally impious and cruel, is one of the most sensible, as well as most expressive, types of that enemy of Christ Jesus and our holy religion.

It is impossible for us, whilst we are reading this prophecy, not to be prodigiously struck when we see the justness and accuracy with which the prophet traces the principal characteristics of a king, whose history is so much blended with that of the Jews: and we perceive evidently, that for this reason the Holy Spirit, either entirely omitting, or taking only a transient notice of the actions of other much more famous princes, dwells so long on those of Antiochus Epiphanes.

With what certainty does Daniel foretell a multitude of events, so very remote, and¹¹ which depended on so many arbitrary circumstances! How manifestly did the Spirit, which presented futurity to his view, show it him as present, and in as clear a light, as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes! Do not the divine authority of the Scriptures, and by a necessary consequence, the certainty of the Christian religion become by such proofs, in a manner, palpable and self-evident?

No prophecy was ever fulfilled in so clear, so perfect, and so incontrovertible a manner as this. Porphyra¹² the professed enemy of the Christian religion, as well as of the Holy Scriptures both of the Old and New Testament, being infinitely perplexed at finding so great a conformity between the events foretold by Daniel and the relations given by the best historians, did not pretend to deny this conformity, for that would have been repugnant to plain sense, and denying the shining of the sun at noon-day. However, he took another course, in order to undermine the authority of the Scriptures. He himself laboured, by citing all the historians extant at that time, and which are since lost, to show, at great length, that whatever is written in the eleventh chapter of Daniel, happened exactly as foretold by that prophet: and he inferred from this perfect uniformity, that so exact a detail of so great a number of events, could not possibly have been written by Daniel so many years before they happened; and that this work must certainly have been written by some person who lived after Antiochus Epiphanes, and borrowed Daniel's name.

In this contest between the Christians and Heathens, the former would indisputably carry their cause, could they be able to demonstrate, by good proofs, that Daniel's prophecies were really written by him. Now this they proved unanswerably, by citing the testimony of a whole people, I mean the Jews; whose evidence could not be suspected nor disallowed, as they were still greater enemies to the Christian religion than the Heathens themselves. The reverence they had for the sacred writings, of which Providence had appointed them the depositaries and guardians, was carried to such a pitch, that they would have thought him a criminal and sacrilegious wretch, who should have attempted only to transpose a single word, or change one letter in them. What idea, then, would they have entertained of that man who should pretend to introduce any supposititious books among them? Such are the witnesses who attested the genuineness of Daniel's prophecies. And were ever proofs so convincing, or cause so victorious? "Thy testimonies are very sure, O Lord, for ever."¹³

CONTINUED.

BOOK XX

The two first books contain three articles. In the first, the history of Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, is related. He reigned eleven years, and was dethroned in the year of the world 3836. The second article goes on from the defeat of Perseus to the ruin of Corinth, which was taken and burnt in the year of the world 3868, and includes something more than twenty-one years. The third article contains the history of Syria and that of Egypt, which are generally joined together. That of Syria comprises almost one hundred years, from Antiochus Eupator, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, to Antiochus Asiaticus, under whom Syria became part of the Roman empire; that is to say, from the year of the world 3840 to 3939. The history of Egypt includes also 100 years, from the twentieth year of Ptolemy Philometor, till the expulsion of Ptolemy Auletes; that is, from the year of the world 3945 to the year 3946.

ARTICLE I.

This article contains eleven years, being the duration of the reign of Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, from the year of the world 3826 to 3837.

SECTION I.—PERSEUS PREPARES SECRETLY FOR A WAR AGAINST THE ROMANS. HE ENDEAVOURS A RECONCILIATION WITH THE ACHÆANS IN VAIN. HIS SECRET MEASURES NOT UNKNOWN AT ROME. EUMENES ARRIVES THERE, AND INFORMS THE SENATE OF THEM. PERSEUS ATTEMPTS TO RID HIMSELF OF THAT PRINCE, FIRST BY ASSASSINATION, AND AFTERWARDS BY POISON. THE ROMANS BREAK WITH PERSEUS. DIFFERENT OPINIONS AND DISPOSITIONS OF THE KINGS AND STATES, IN REGARD TO THE MACEDONIAN WAR. AFTER SEVERAL EMBASSIES ON BOTH SIDES, THE WAR IS DECLARED IN FORM.

THE death of Philip happened very opportunely for suspending the war against the Romans,¹ and giving them time to prepare for it. That prince had formed a strange design, and had already begun to put it in execution; this was to bring a considerable body of troops, both horse and foot, from European Sarmatia, which now forms part of Poland. Certain Gauls had settled near the mouths of the Borysthenes, now called the Nieper, and had taken the name of Bastarnæ. That people were neither accustomed to till the earth, to feed cattle, nor to engage in commerce: they lived by war, and sold their services to any people that would employ them. After they had passed the Danube, Philip was to have settled them upon the lands of the Dardanians, whom he had resolved utterly to exterminate; because, being very near neighbours of Macedonia, they never failed to take every favourable occasion for making incursions into it. The Bastarnæ were to leave their wives and children in this new settlement, and to march into Italy, in order to enrich themselves with the booty they were in hopes of making there. Whatever the success might be, Philip conceived he should find great advantages in it: if it should happen that the Bastarnæ were conquered by the Romans, he should easily be consoled for their defeat in seeing himself delivered from his dangerous neighbours, the Dardanians, by their means; and if their irruption into Italy succeeded, whilst the Romans were employed in repulsing these new enemies, he should have time to recover all he had lost in Greece. The Bastarnæ were already upon their march, and were considerably advanced, when they received advice of Philip's death. This news, and several accidents that befell them, suspended their first design, and they dispersed into different parts. Antigonus, whom Philip intended for his successor, had been employed against his will in negotiating this affair. At his return, Perseus put him to death; and to secure himself the better on the throne, sent ambassadors to the Romans, to demand that they would renew with him the alliance they had made with his father, and that the senate would acknowledge him king. His sole intent was to gain time.

Part of the Bastarnæ had pursued their march,² and were actually at A. M. 3829. war with the Dardanians. The Ro- Ant. J. C. 175. mans took umbrage at it. Perseus excused himself by his ambassadors, and represented that he had not sent for them, and had no share in their enterprise. The senate, without making any farther inquiry into the affair, contented themselves with advising him to take care that he observed inviolably the treaty made with the Romans. The Bastarnæ, after having gained some advantages at first, were at length reduced, the greatest part of them at least, to return into their own country. It is said, that having found the Danube frozen over, in endeavouring to pass it, the ice broke under them, and a great number of them were swallowed up in the river.

It was known at Rome that Perseus had sent ambassadors to Car- A. M. 3830. thage,³ and that the senate had given Ant. J. C. 174. them audience in the night, in the temple of Æsculapius. It was thought proper to send ambassadors into Macedonia to observe the conduct of that prince. He had lately reduced the Dolopians,⁴ who refused to obey him, by force of arms. After that expedition he advanced towards Delphi, upon pretence of consulting the oracle; but in reality, as it was believed, of having an opportunity to make the tour of Greece, and negotiate alliances. This journey at first alarmed the whole country, and occasioned so general a consternation, that even Eumenes did not think himself safe in Pergamus. But Perseus, as soon as he had consulted the oracle, returned into his own kingdom, passing through Phthiotis, Achaia, and Thessaly, without committing any hostilities in his march. He afterwards sent either ambassadors or circular letters to all the states through which he had passed, to demand that they would forget such subjects of discontent as they might have had under the reign of his father, which ought to be buried in his grave.

His principal attention was to reconcile himself with the Achæans. Their league, and the city of Athens, had carried their hatred and resentment so high against the Macedonians, as by a decree to prohibit all intercourse with them. This declared enmity gave the slaves, who fled from Achaia, the opportunity of retiring into Macedonia, where they found an assured asylum, and where they knew they should not be followed or claimed after that general interdiction. Perseus caused all these slaves to be seized, and sent them back to the Achæans, with an obliging letter, in which he exhorted them to take effectual measures for preventing their slaves from making his dominions their place of refuge any longer. This was tacitly demanding the re-establishment of their ancient intercourse. Xenarchus, who was at that time in office, and desirous of making his court to the king, seconded his demand very strongly, and was supported by those who were most solicitous for recovering their slaves.

Callicrates, one of the principal persons of the assembly, who was convinced that the safety of the league consisted in the inviolable observance of the treaty concluded with the Romans, represented, that a reconciliation with Macedonia was a direct infraction of it, whilst that kingdom was making preparations to declare war against Rome as soon as possible. He concluded, that it was necessary to leave things in their present condition, till time should ascertain whether their fears were just or not. That if Macedonia continued in peace with Rome, it would be time enough, when that appeared, to re-establish an intercourse with them; without which, a reunion would be precipitate and dangerous.

Acron, Xenarchus's brother, who spoke after Callicrates, did his utmost to prove that such terrors were without foundation; that the question did not relate to the making of a new treaty and alliance with Perseus, and much less to coming to a rupture with the Romans, but solely to reverse a decree, for which the injustice of Philip might have given room, but which Perseus, who had no share in his father's conduct, was undoubtedly far from deserving. That that prince could not but be assured, that, in case of a war against the Romans, the league would not fail to declare for them. "But," added he, "whilst the peace subsists, if animosities and dissensions are not made to cease entirely, it is at least reasonable to suspend them, and to let them sleep for a while."

Nothing was concluded in this assembly. As it was taken amiss that the king had contented himself with only sending them a letter, he afterwards sent ambassadors to the assembly, which had been summoned to Megalopolis. But those who apprehended giving Rome offence, used such effectual means, that they were refused audience.

The ambassadors sent by the senate into Macedonia,¹ reported, at Ant. J. C. 173. their return, that they could not get access to the king, upon pretence that he was sometimes abroad, and sometimes indisposed; two subterfuges equally false. That, for the rest, it appeared plainly, that great preparations were making for war, and that it was reasonable to expect it would speedily break out. They gave an account also of the state in which they found Ætolia; that it was in great commotion from domestic divisions, which the violence of two contending parties had carried to the utmost excess; and that their authority had not been capable of uniting and appeasing the persons at the head of them.

As Rome expected a war with Macedonia, preparations were made for it by the religious ceremonies, which amongst the Romans always preceded declarations of war; that is to say, by expiation of prodigies, and various sacrifices offered to the gods.

Marcellus was one of the ambassadors whom the senate had sent into Greece. After having appeared to the utmost of his power the troubles of Ætolia, he went into Peloponnesus, where he had caused the assembly of the Achæans to be summoned. He extremely applauded their zeal, in having constantly adhered to the decree, which prohibited all intercourse with the kings of Macedonia. This was an open declaration of what the Romans thought with regard to Perseus.

That prince was incessantly soliciting the Grecian cities, by frequent embassies and magnificent promises, far exceeding his power to perform. They were sufficiently inclined in his favour, and far more than in that of Eumenes, though the latter had rendered great services to most of those cities; and those who formed a part of his dominions would not have changed condition with such as were entirely free. There was, however, no comparison between the two princes in point of character and manners. Perseus was utterly infamous for his crimes and cruelties. He was accused of having murdered his wife with his own hands, after the death of his father; of having made way with Appelles, whose aid he had used in destroying his brother; and of having committed many other murders, both within and without his kingdom. On the contrary, Eumenes had rendered himself esteemed by his tenderness for his brothers and relations; by his justice in governing his subjects; and by his generous propensity to do good and to serve others. Notwithstanding this difference of character, they gave Perseus the preference; whether it was that the ancient grandeur of the Macedonian kings inspired them with contempt for a state whose origin was wholly recent, and whose birth they had witnessed; or that the Greeks had some change in view; or because they were pleased with having some support in him to hold the Romans in respect.

Perseus was particularly attentive in cultivating the amity of the Rhodians,² and in separating them from the side of Rome. It was from Rhodes that Laodice, the daughter of Seleucus, went to share the Macedonian throne with Perseus, by marrying him. The Rhodians had fitted him out as fine a fleet as could be imagined. Perseus had furnished the materials, and gave gold ribands to every soldier and seaman who came with Laodice. A sentence passed by Rome in favour of the Lycians against the people of Rhodes, had extremely exasperated the latter. Perseus endeavoured to take advantage of their resentment against Rome to attach them to himself.

The Romans were not ignorant of the measures taken by Perseus to A. M. 3832. bring over the states of Greece into Ant. J. C. 172. his views;³ Eumenes came expressly to Rome to inform them at large of his proceedings. He was received there with all possible marks of distinction. He declared that, besides his desire to pay his homage to the gods and men, to whom he owed an establishment which left him nothing to wish, he had undertaken this voyage expressly to advise the senate in person to be upon their guard against the enterprises of Perseus. That that prince had inherited his father's hatred for the Romans as well as his crown, and omitted no preparations for a war which he believed in a manner fallen to him in right of succession. That the long peace Macedonia had enjoyed supplied him with the means of raising numerous and formidable troops; that he had a rich and powerful kingdom; that he was himself in the flower of his youth, full of ardour for military expeditions, to which he had been early inured in the sight and under the conduct of his father, and in which he had since much exercised himself, in different enterprises against his neighbours. That he was highly considered by the cities of Greece and Asia, though it was impossible to say by what sort of merit he had acquired that influence, unless it were by his enmity for the Romans.

That he was upon as good terms with powerful kings. That he had espoused the daughter of Seleucus, and given his sister in marriage to Prusias. That he had found means to engage the Bœotians in his interest, a very warlike people, whom his father had never been able to bring over; and that, but for the opposition of a few persons well affected to the Romans, he certainly would have renewed the alliance with the Achæan confederates. That it was to Perseus the Ætolians applied for aid in their domestic troubles, and not to the Romans. That, supported by these powerful allies, he made such preparations for war himself, as put him into a condition to dispense with any foreign aid. That he had 30,000 foot, 5000 horse, and provisions for ten years. That, besides his immense annual revenues from the mines, he had enough to pay 10,000 foreign troops for a like number of years, without reckoning those of his own kingdom. That he had laid up in his arsenals a sufficient quantity of arms to equip three armies as great as that he had actually on foot; and that, though Macedonia should be incapable of supplying him with troops, Thrace (which was an inexhaustible nursery of soldiers) was at his devotion. Eumenes added, that he advanced nothing upon simple conjecture, but upon the certain knowledge of facts, founded upon the best information. "For the rest," said he, in concluding, "having discharged the duty which my regard and gratitude for the Roman people made indispensable, and delivered my conscience, it only remains for me to implore all the gods and goddesses, that they would inspire you with sentiments and measures consistent with the glory of your empire, and the preservation of your friends and allies, whose safety depends upon yours."

The senators were much affected with this discourse. Nothing that passed in the senate, except that king Eumenes had spoken, was known abroad, or suffered to take air at first; so inviolably were the deliberations of that august assembly kept secret.

The ambassadors from king Perseus had audience some days after. They found the senate highly prejudiced against their master; and what Harpalus (one of them) said in his speech, inflamed them still more against him. It was, that Perseus desired to be believed upon his own word, when he declared he had neither done nor said any thing that argued an enemy. That, as for the rest, if he discovered that they were absolutely bent upon a rupture with him, he should know how to defend himself with valour. That the fortune and events of war are always hazardous and uncertain.

The cities of Greece and Asia, anxious for the effect which these embassies might produce at Rome, had also sent deputies thither under different pretences, especially the Rhodians, who suspected that Eumenes had joined them in his accusation against Perseus; and they were not deceived. In an audience granted them, they inveighed violently against Eumenes, reproaching him with having stirred up Lycia against the Rhodians, and of having rendered himself more insupportable to Asia than Antiochus himself. This discourse was very agreeable to the Asiatic people, who secretly favoured Perseus; but very much displeased the senate, and had no other effect than to make them suspect the Rhodians, and hold Eumenes in higher consideration, from this kind of conspiracy which they saw formed against him. He was dismissed in consequence with the highest honours and great presents.

Harpalus having returned into Macedonia with the utmost diligence, reported to Perseus, that he had left the Romans in a disposition not to defer long a declaration of war against him. The king was not displeased with his account, believing himself in a condition, with the great preparations he had made, to support it with success. He was more particularly glad of a rupture with Eumenes, from whom he suspected that Rome had been apprized of his most secret measures; and began with declaring against him, not by the way of arms, but by that of the most criminal treachery. He dispatched Evander of Crete, the general of his auxiliary forces, with three Macedonians, who had already been employed by him upon like occasions, to assassinate that prince. Perseus knew that he was preparing for a journey to Delphi, and directed his assassins to Praxo, a woman of condition, in whose house he had lodged when he was in that city. They lay in ambush in a defile, so narrow that two men could not pass abreast. When the king came there, the assassins, from the heights where they had posted themselves, rolled two great stones down upon him, one of which fell upon his head, and laid him senseless upon the earth, and the other wounded him considerably in the shoulder; after which they pelted a hail of lesser stones upon him. All that were with him fled, except one who stayed to assist him. The assassins, believing the king dead, went off to the top of mount Parnassus. His officers, when they returned, found him without motion, but not without life. When he came a little to himself, he was carried to Corinth, and from thence into the island of Egina, where great care was taken to cure his wounds, but with so much secrecy that no one was admitted into his chamber; which gave reason to believe him dead. That report spread even to Asia. Attalus gave credit to it too readily for a good brother; and looking upon himself already as king, was preparing to espouse the widow Eumenes, at their first interview, could not forbear making him some gentle reproaches upon that head though he had at first resolved to dissemble his sentiments of his brother's imprudence.

Perseus had attempted at the same time to poison him by the means of Rammius, who had made a voyage into Macedonia. He was a rich citizen of Brundisium, who received in his house all the Roman generals, foreign noblemen, and even princes, who passed through that city. The king put into his hands a very subtle poison, for him to give to Eumenes when he should come to his house. Rammius did not dare to refuse this commission, however great his horror for it, lest the king should make a trial of the draught upon himself; but he set out with a full resolution not to execute it. Having been informed that Valerius was at Chalcis, upon his return from his embassy into Macedonia, he went to him, discovered the whole, and attended him to Rome. Valerius also carried Praxo thither along with him, at whose house the assassins had lodged in Delphi. When the senate had heard these two witnesses, after such black attempts, they thought it unnecessary to deliberate longer upon declaring war against a prince who made use of assassinations and poison to rid himself of his enemies, and proceeded to take due measures for the success of so important an enterprise.

Two embassies which arrived at Rome about the same time, gave the senate great pleasure. The first came from Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, the fifth of that name. He sent the son whom he intended for his successor, to Rome, to be educated there, from his earliest infancy, in the principles of the Romans, and to form himself in the great art of reigning, by the conversation and study of their great men; and he desired that the Roman people would take him under their care and tuition. The young prince was received with all the marks of distinction that could be shown him; and the senate caused a commodious house to be provided for him and his train at the expense of the public. The other embassy was from the Thracians, who desired to be admitted into the alliance and amity of the Romans.

As soon as Eumenes was entirely recovered, he repaired to Pergamus, and applied himself in making preparations for war with uncommon ardour, inflamed more than ever by the new crime of his enemy. The senate sent ambassadors to compliment him upon the extreme danger he had escaped; and despatched others at the same time to confirm the kings, their allies, in their ancient amity with the Roman people.

They had sent also to Perseus to make their complaints, and to demand satisfaction. These ambassadors, seeing they could not have audience, though many days had elapsed, set out in order to return to Rome. The king caused them to be recalled. They represented that by the treaty concluded with Philip his father, and afterwards renewed with him, it was expressly stipulated, that he should not carry the war out of his own kingdom, nor attack the Roman people. They then enumerated all his infractions of that treaty, and demanded that restitution should be made to the allies of all he had taken from them by force. The king replied only with rage and reproaches, taxing the Romans with their avarice and pride, and the insupportable haughtiness with which they treated kings, to whom they pretended to dictate laws as to their slaves. Upon their demanding a positive answer, he referred them to the next day, as he intended to give it them in writing. The substance of it was, that the treaty concluded with his father did not affect him: that if he had accepted it, it was not because he approved it, but because he could not do otherwise, not being sufficiently established upon the throne: that if the Romans were willing to enter into a new treaty, and would propose reasonable conditions, he should consider what it was necessary for him to do. The king, after having delivered this writing, withdrew abruptly; and the ambassadors declared that the Roman people renounced his alliance and amity. The king returned in great wrath, and told them in a menacing tone, that they were to take care to quit his kingdom in three days. At their return to Rome, they reported the result of their embassy; and added, that they had observed, in all the cities of Macedonia through which they passed, that great preparations were making for war.

The ambassadors that had been sent to the kings in alliance with the Romans, reported that they found Eumenes in Asia, Antiochus in Syria, and Ptolemy in Egypt well inclined to the Roman people, and ready to do every thing that should be desired of them. The senate would not grant audience to the ambassadors of Gentius king of Illyria, who was accused of holding intelligence with Perseus; and deferred hearing those from the Rhodians, who had also rendered themselves suspected, till the new consuls entered upon their office. However, not to lose time, orders were given for fitting out a fleet of fifty galleys, to sail as soon as possible for Macedonia, which was executed without delay.

P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus, were elected consuls, A. M. 3833. Ant. J. C. 171. and Macedonia fell by lot to Licinius.

Not only Rome and Italy, but all the kings and cities, as well of Europe as Asia, had their eyes fixed upon the two great powers on the point of entering into a war.

Eumenes was animated by an ancient hatred against Perseus, still more by the new crime, which had almost cost him his life in his journey to Delphi.

Prusias, king of Bithynia, had resolved to stand neuter, and wait the event. He flattered himself that the Romans would not insist upon his taking up arms against his wife's brother; and hoped that, if Perseus were victorious, that prince would easily acquiesce in his neutrality at the request of his sister.

Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, besides having promised to aid the Romans, inviolably adhered, either in war or peace, to the party which Eumenes espoused, after having contracted an affinity with him, by giving him his daughter in marriage.

Antiochus had formed a design to possess himself of Egypt, relying upon the weakness of the king's youth, and the indolence and cowardice of those who had the care of his person and affairs. He imagined that he had found a plausible pretext for making war upon that prince, by disputing Coele-syria with him; and that the Romans, employed in the war with Macedonia, would not obstruct his ambitious designs. He had, however, declared to the senate by his ambassadors, that they might dispose of all his forces, and had repeated the same promise to the ambassadors whom the Romans had sent to him.

Ptolemy, through his tender age, was incapable of resolving for himself. His guardians were making preparations for the war with Antiochus, in defence of Coele-syria, and promised to contribute every thing in their power to aid the Romans in the Macedonian war.

Masinissa supplied the Romans with corn, troops, and elephants, and intended to send his son Misa-genes to join them. His plan and political motives were the effect of his desire to possess himself of the Carthaginian territories. If the Romans conquered, he conceived it impossible to execute that project, because they would never suffer him to ruin the Carthaginians entirely; in which case he should continue in his present condition. If, on the contrary, the Roman power, which alone, out of policy, prevented him from extending his conquests, and at that time supported Carthage, should happen to be reduced, he expected, in consequence, to make himself master of all Africa.

Gentius, king of Illyria, had only rendered himself much suspected by the Romans, without knowing, however, which party he should choose; and it seemed, that if he had adhered to either, it would be rather out of caprice and by chance, than from any fixed plan or regular project.

As for Cotys of Thrace, king of the Odrysæ, he had declared openly for the Macedonians.

Such was the disposition of the kings with regard to the Macedonian war. As for the states and free cities, the populace were universally inclined in favour of Perseus and the Macedonians. The opinions of the persons in authority amongst those states and cities were divided into three classes. Some of them abandoned themselves so abjectly to the Romans, that by their blind devotion to them they lost all credit and authority among their citizens; and of these, few concerned themselves about the justice of the Roman government; most of them having no views but to their private interest, convinced that their influence in their cities would prevail in proportion to the services they should render the Romans. The second class was of those who gave entirely in to the king's measures; some because their debts and the bad state of their affairs made them desire a change; others, because the pomp that reigns in the courts of kings, upon which Perseus valued himself, agreed best with their own pride and vanity. A third class, which were the most prudent and judicious, if it were absolutely necessary to take either part, would have preferred the Romans' to the king's; but had it been left to their choice, they would have been best satisfied that neither of the parties should become too powerful by reducing the other; but, preserving a kind of equality and balance, should always continue in peace; because then one of them, by taking the weaker states under its protection, whenever the other should attempt to oppress them, would render the condition of them all more happy and secure. In this kind of indeterminate neutrality they saw as from a place of safety, the battles and dangers of those who had engaged either in one party or the other.

The Romans, after having, according to their laudable custom, discharged all the duties of religion, offered solemn prayers and sacrifices to the gods, and made vows for the happy success of the enterprise for which they had been so long preparing, declared war in form against Perseus, king of Macedonia, except he made immediate satisfaction in regard to the several grievances already more than once explained to him.

At the same time arrived ambassadors from him, who said that the king their master was much amazed at their having made troops enter Macedonia, and that he was ready to give the senate all the satisfaction that could be required. As it was known that Perseus sought only to gain time, they were answered, that the consul Licinius would be soon in Macedonia, with his army; and that if the king desired peace in earnest, he might send his ambassadors to him, but that he need not give himself the trouble of sending any more into Italy, where they would not be received: and for themselves, they were ordered to quit it in twelve days.

The Romans omitted nothing that might contribute to the success of their arms. They despatched ambassadors on all sides to their allies, to animate and confirm those who persisted to adhere to them, to determine such as were fluctuating and uncertain, and to intimidate those who appeared inclined to break with them.

Whilst they were at Larissa, in Thessaly, ambassadors arrived there from Perseus, who had orders to address themselves to Marcus, one of the Roman ambassadors, to remind him of the ancient ties of friendship his father had contracted with king Philip, and to demand an interview between him and their master. Marcus answered, that his father had often spoken of king Philip's friendship and hospitality; and appointed a place near the river Peneus for the interview. They went thither some days after. The king had a great train, and was surrounded with a crowd of great lords and guards. The ambassadors were no less attended; many of the citizens of Lariana, and of the deputies from other states, who had repaired thither, making it a duty to go with them, well pleased with that occasion of carrying home what they should see and hear. They had besides a curiosity to be present at an interview between a great king and the ambassadors of the most powerful people in the world.

After some difficulties which arose about the ceremonial, and which were soon removed in favour of the Romans, who had the precedence, they began to confer. Their meeting was highly respectful on both sides. They did not treat each other like enemies, but rather as friends, bound by the sacred ties of hospitality. Marcus, who spoke first, began by excusing himself for the unhappy necessity he was under of reproaching a prince for whom he had the highest consideration. He afterwards expatiated upon all the causes of complaint the Roman people had against him, and his various infractions of treaties with them. He insisted very much on his attempt upon Eumenes, and concluded with professing, that he should be very glad the king would supply him with good reasons for his conduct, and thereby enable him to plead his cause, and justify him before the senate.

Perseus, after having touched lightly upon the affair of Eumenes, which he seemed astonished that any one should presume to impute to him without any proof, rather than to so many others of that prince's enemies, entered into a long detail, and replied, as well as he was able, to the several heads of the accusation against him. "Of this I am assured,"¹ said he, in concluding, "that my conscience does not reproach me with having committed any fault knowingly, and with premeditated design, against the Romans; and if I have done any thing unwarily, apprized as I now am, it is in my power to amend it. I have certainly done nothing to deserve the implacable enmity with which I am pursued, as if I had been guilty of the blackest and most enormous crimes, which were neither to be expiated nor forgiven. It must be without foundation, that the clemency and wisdom of the Roman people are universally extolled, if for such slight causes as scarce merit complaint and remonstrance, they take up arms and make war upon kings in alliance with them."

The result of this conference was, that Perseus should send new ambassadors to Rome, in order to try all possible means to prevent a rupture and open war. This was a snare laid by the artful commissioner for the king's inadvertency, in order to gain time. He feigned at first great difficulties in complying with the truce demanded by Perseus, for time to send his ambassadors to Rome, and seemed at last to accede to it only out of consideration for the king. The true reason was, because the Romans had not yet either troops or general in a condition to act; whereas on the side of Perseus every thing was ready; and if he had not been amused by the vain hope of a peace, he might have taken the advantage of a conjuncture so favourable for himself, and so contrary to his enemies, to have entered upon action.

After this interview the Roman ambassadors advanced into Bœotia, where there had been great commotions; some declaring for Perseus, and others for the Romans; but at length the latter party prevailed. The Thebans, and the other people of Bœotia, by their example, made an alliance with the Romans; each by their own deputies, and not by the consent of the whole body of the nation according to ancient custom. In this manner the Bœotians, from having rashly engaged in the party of Perseus, after having formed, through a long course of time, a republic which on several occasions had preserved itself from the greatest dangers, saw themselves separated and governed by as many councils as there were cities in the province; all of which in the sequel remained in dependent of each other; and formed no longer one united league as at first. And this was an effect of the Roman policy, which divided them, to make them weak; well knowing that it was much easier to bring them into their measures, and subject them by that means, than if they were still all united together. No other cities in Bœotia, except Coronea and Halicartus, persisted in the alliance with Perseus.

From Bœotia the commissioners went into Peloponnesus. The assembly of the Achean league was summoned to Argos. They demanded only 1000 men, to garrison Chalcis, till the Roman army should enter Greece: which troops were ordered thither immediately. Marcus and Atilius, having terminated the affairs of Greece, returned to Rome in the beginning of the winter.

About the same time Rome sent new commissioners into the most considerable islands of Asia,² to exhort them to send powerful aid into the field against Perseus. The Rhodians signalized themselves upon this occasion. Hegesilochus, who was at that time prytanis, (the principal magistrate was so called,) had prepared the people, by representing to them that it was necessary to efface by actions, and not by words only, the bad impressions with which Eumenes had endeavoured to inspire the Romans in regard to their fidelity. So that upon the arrival of the ambassadors, they showed him a fleet of forty ships, entirely equipped, and ready to sail upon the first orders. This agreeable surprise was highly pleasing to the Romans, who returned from thence exceedingly satisfied with so conspicuous a zeal, which had even anticipated their demands.

Perseus, in consequence of his interview with Marcus, sent ambassadors to Rome to treat there upon what had been proposed in that conference.

He despatched other ambassadors with letters for Rhodes and Byzantium, in which he explained what had passed in the interview, and deduced at large the reasons upon which his conduct was founded. He exhorted the Rhodians in particular to remain quiet, and wait as mere spectators till they saw what resolutions the Romans would take. "If, contrarily to the treaties subsisting between us, they attack me, you will be," said he, "the mediators between the two nations. All the world is interested in their continuing to live in peace, but it behoves none more than you to endeavour to reconcile them. Defenders not only of your own, but of the liberty of all Greece, the more zeal and ardour you have for so great a good, the more ought you to be upon your guard against every one who should attempt to inspire you with different sentiments. You cannot but know, that the certain means to reduce Greece into slavery,³ is to make it dependent upon one people only, without leaving it any other to have recourse to." The ambassadors were received with great respect; but were answered that, in case of war, the king was desired not to rely upon the Rhodians, nor to demand any thing of them to the prejudice of the alliance they had made with the Romans. The same ambassadors went also into Bœotia, where they had almost as little reason to be satisfied; only a few small cities separating from the Thebans to embrace the king's party.⁴

Marcus and Atilius at their return to Rome reported to the senate the success of their commission. They dwelt particularly upon their address, in their stratagem to deceive Perseus, by granting him a truce, which prevented him from beginning the war immediately with advantage, as he might have done, and gave the Romans time to complete their preparations, and to take the field. They did not forget their dexterity in dissolving the general assembly of the Bœotians, to prevent their uniting with Macedonia by common consent.

The greatest part of the senate expressed much satisfaction in so wise a conduct, which argued profound policy and uncommon dexterity in negotiation. But the old senators, who had imbibed other principles, and persevered in their ancient maxims, said, they did not recognize the Roman character in such dealing: that their ancestors, relying more upon true valour than stratagem, used to make war openly, and not in disguise and under cover; that such unworthy artifices should be abandoned to the Carthaginians and Grecians, with whom it was reckoned more glorious to deceive an enemy, than to conquer him with open force; that indeed stratagem sometimes, in the moment of action, seemed to succeed better than valour; but that a victory, obtained vigorously in a battle, where the force of the troops on each side was closely tried, and which the enemy could not ascribe either to chance or cunning, was of a much more lasting effect, because it left a strong conviction of the victor's superior force and bravery.

Notwithstanding these remonstrances of the elder senators, who could not relish these new maxims of policy, that part of the senate which preferred the useful to the honourable were much the majority upon this occasion, and the conduct of the two commissioners was approved. Marcus was sent again with some galleys into Greece, to regulate affairs as he should think most consistent with the service of the public; and Atilius into Thessaly, to take possession of Larissa, lest, upon the expiration of the truce, Perseus should make himself master of that important place, the capital of the country. Lentulus was also sent to Thebes, to have an eye upon Boeotia.

Though the war with Perseus was resolved at Rome, the senate gave audience to his ambassadors. They repeated the same things which had been said in the interview with Marcius, and endeavoured to justify their master, principally upon the attempt he was accused of having made on the person of Eumenes. They were heard with little or no attention, and the senate ordered them and all the Macedonians at Rome to quit the city immediately, and Italy in thirty days. The consul Licinius, who was to command in Macedonia, had orders to march as soon possible with his army. The prætor Lucretius, who had the command of the fleet, set out with five-and-forty galleys from Naples, and arrived in five days at Cephalonia, where he waited for the arrival of the land forces.

SECTION II.—THE CONSUL LICINIUS AND KING PERSEUS TAKE THE FIELD. THEY BOTH ENCAP NEAR THE RIVER PENEUS, AT SOME DISTANCE FROM EACH OTHER. ENGAGEMENT OF THE CAVALRY, IN WHICH PERSEUS HAS CONSIDERABLY THE ADVANTAGE, AND MAKES AN ILL USE OF IT. HE ENDEAVOURS TO MAKE A PEACE, BUT INEFFECTUALLY. THE ARMIES ON BOTH SIDES GO INTO WINTER QUARTERS.

THE consul Licinius, after having A. M. 3833. offered his vows to the gods in the Ant. J. C. 171. capitol, set out from Rome, covered with a coat of arms, according to the custom. The departure of the consuls, says Livy,¹ was always attended with great solemnity and an incredible concourse of the people, especially upon an important war, and against a powerful enemy. Besides the interest which every individual might have in the glory of the consul, the citizens were induced to throng about him, out of a curiosity to see the general, to whose prudence and valour the fate of the republic was confided. A thousand anxious thoughts presented themselves at that time to their minds upon the events of the war, which are always precarious and uncertain. They remembered the defeats which had happened through the bad conduct and temerity, and the victories for which they were indebted to the wisdom and courage, of their generals. "What mortal," said they, "can know the fate of a consul at his departure: whether we shall see him with his victorious army return in triumph to the capitol, from whence he sets out, after having offered up his prayers to the gods; or whether the enemy may not rejoice in his overthrow?" The ancient glory of the Macedonians; that of Philip, who had made himself famous by his wars, and particularly by that against the Romans, added very much to the reputation of Perseus; and every body knew, that from the time of his accession to the crown a war had been expected from him. Full of such thoughts, the citizens in crowds conducted the consul out of the city. C. Claudius and Q. Mutius, who had both been consuls, did not think it below them to serve in his army in quality of military tribunes, (or as we may now say, as colonels or brigadiers,) and went with him; as did P. Lentulus and the two Manlii Acidini. The consul repaired in their company to Brundisium, which was the rendezvous of the army; and passing the sea with all his troops, arrived at Nymphæum, in the country of the Apollonians.

Perseus, some days before, upon the report of his ambassadors who had returned from Rome, and assured him that there remained no hope of peace, held a great council, in which opinions were different. Some thought it necessary for him either to pay tribute, if required, or give up part of his dominions, if the Romans insisted upon it; in a word, to suffer every thing that could be endured, for the sake of peace, rather than expose his person and kingdom to the danger of entire destruction. That if a part of his kingdom was left him, time and chance might produce favourable conjunctures, to put him in a condition not only to recover all he had lost, but even to render him formidable to those who at present made Macedonia tremble.

The greater number were of a quite different opinion. They insisted, that by making cession of any part, he must determine to lose all his kingdom. That it was neither money nor lands that incited the ambition of the Romans, but universal empire. That they knew the greatest kingdoms and most powerful empires were subject to frequent revolutions. That they had humbled, or rather ruined Carthage, without taking possession of its territories, contenting themselves with keeping it in awe by the neighbourhood of Masinissa. That they had driven Antiochus and his son beyond mount Taurus. That there was no kingdom but Macedonia that was capable of giving umbrage to, or making head against the Romans. That prudence required Perseus, whilst he was still master of it, seriously to consider with himself, whether by making the Romans sometimes one concession, and sometimes another, he was resolved to see himself deprived of all power, expelled from his dominions, and obliged to ask as a favour of the Romans, permission to retire and confine himself in Samothracia, or some other island, there to pass the rest of his days in contempt and misery, with the mortification of surviving his glory and empire; or whether he would prefer to hazard all the dangers of the war, armed as became a man of courage in defence of his fortunes and dignity; and, in case of being victorious, have the glory of delivering the universe from the Roman yoke. That it would be no more a wonder to drive the Romans out of Greece, than it had been to drive Hannibal out of Italy. Besides, was it consistent for Perseus, after having opposed his brother with all his efforts, when he attempted to usurp his crown, to resign it merely to strangers that endeavoured to wrest it out of his hands? That, in fine, all the world agreed, that there was nothing more inglorious than to give up empire without resistance, nor more laudable than to have used all possible endeavours to preserve it.

This council was held at Pella, the ancient capital of Macedonia. "Since you think it so necessary," said the king, "let us make war then, with the help of the gods." He gave orders at the same time to his generals to assemble all their troops at Citium, whither he went soon after himself, with all the lords of his court and his regiments of guards, after having offered a sacrifice of a hecatomb, or 100 oxen, to Minerva Alcideia. He found the whole army assembled there. It amounted, including the foreign troops, to 39,000 foot, of whom almost half composed the phalanx, and 4000 horse. It was agreed, that place the army Alexander the Great led into Asia, no king of Macedonia commanded one so numerous.

It was twenty-six years since Philip had made peace with the Romans; and as during all that time Macedonia had remained in tranquillity, and without any considerable war, there were in it great numbers of youth capable of bearing arms, who had already begun to exercise and form themselves in the wars which Macedonia had supported against the Thracians their neighbours. Philip besides, and Perseus after him, had long formed the design of undertaking a war with the Romans. Hence it was that at the time we speak of every thing was ready for beginning it.

Perseus, before he took the field, thought it necessary to harangue his troops. He mounted his throne, therefore, and from thence, having his two sons on each side of him, spoke to them with great energy. He began with a long recital of all the injuries the Romans had committed with regard to his father, which had induced him to resolve to take up arms against them; but that a sudden death had prevented him from putting that design in execution. He added, that presently after the death of Philip, the Romans had sent ambassadors to him, and at the same time had marched troops into Greece to take possession of the strongest places; that afterwards, in order to gain time, they had amused him during all the winter with deceitful interviews and a pretended truce, under the specious pretext of negotiating a reconciliation. He compared the consul's army, which was actually on its march, with that of the Macedonians; which, in his opinion, was much superior to the other, both in the number and valour of their troops, as well as in ammunition and provisions of war, collected with infinite care during a great number of years. "You have, therefore, Macedonians," said he, "in concluding, 'only to display the same courage which your ancestors showed, when having triumphed over all Europe, they crossed into Asia, and set no other bounds to their conquests, than those of the universe. You are not now to carry your arms to the extremities of the East, but to defend yourselves in the possession of the kingdom of Macedonia. When the Romans attacked my father, they covered the unjust war with the specious pretence of re-establishing the ancient liberty of Greece; the present they undertake without any disguise, to reduce and enslave Macedonia. That haughty people cannot bear that the Roman empire should have any king for its neighbour, nor that any warlike nation should have arms for their defence. For you may be assured, if you refuse to make war, and will submit to the orders of those insulting masters, that you must resolve to deliver up your arms with your king and his kingdom to them."

At these words the whole army, which had expressed only moderate applause for the rest of his discourse, raised cries of anger and indignation, exhorting the king to entertain the best hopes, and demanding earnestly to be led against the enemy.

Perseus then gave audience to the ambassadors from the cities of Macedonia, who came to offer him money and provisions for the occasions of the army; each according to their power. The king thanked them in the kindest manner, but did not accept their offers; giving for his reason, that the army was abundantly provided with all things necessary. He only demanded carriages to convey the battering-rams, catapultæ, and other military engines.

The two armies were now in motion. That of the Macedonians, after some days' march, arrived at Sycurium, a city situated at the foot of mount Eta: the consul's was at Gomphi in Thessaly, after having surmounted the most incredible difficulties in ways and defiles almost impassable. The Romans themselves confessed, that had the enemy defended those passes, they might easily have destroyed their whole army in them. The consul advanced within three miles of the country called Tripolis, and encamped upon the banks of the river Peneus.

At the same time Eumenes arrived at Chalcis, with his brothers Attalus and Athenæus: Philetærus, the fourth, was left at Pergamus, for the defence of the country. Eumenes and Attalus joined the consul with 4000 foot and 1000 horse. They had left Athenæus with 2000 foot at Chalcis, to reinforce the garrison of that important place. The allies sent also other troops, though not in any considerable number and some galleys. Perseus, in the mean time, sent out several detachments to ravage the neighbouring country of Pheræ, in hopes that if the consul should quit his camp, and march to the aid of the cities in his alliance, that he might surprise and attack him to advantage; but he was disappointed, and obliged to content himself with distributing the booty he had made amongst his soldiers, which was very considerable, and consisted principally in cattle of all sorts.

The consul and king held each of them a council at the same time, in order to resolve in what manner to begin the war. The king, highly proud of having been suffered to ravage the territories of the Pheræans without opposition, thought it advisable to go and attack the Romans in their camp without loss of time. The Romans were very sensible, that their slowness and delays would discredit them very much in the opinion of their allies, and reproached themselves with not having defended the people of Pheræ. Whilst they were consulting upon the measures it was necessary to take, (Eumenes and Attalus present,) a courier came in upon the spur, and informed them that the enemy was very near with a numerous army. The signal was immediately given for the soldiers to stand to their arms, and 100 horse were detached, with as many of the light-armed foot, to take a view of the enemy. Perseus, at ten in the morning, finding himself no farther from the Roman camp than a short half league, made his foot halt, and advanced with his horse and light-armed soldiers. He had scarce marched a quarter of a league, when he perceived a body of the enemy, against which he sent a small detachment of horse, supported by some light-armed troops. As the two detachments were very near equal in number, and neither side sent any fresh troops to their aid, the skirmish ended without its being possible to say which side was victorious. Perseus marched back his troops to Sycurium.

The next day, at the same hour, Perseus advanced with all his troops to the same place. They were followed by carts laden with water, for there was none to be found within six leagues of the place; the way was very dusty, and the troops might have been obliged to fight immediately, fatigued as they were with thirst, which would have incommoded them exceedingly. The Romans keeping close in their camp, and having withdrawn their advanced guards within their intrenchments, the king's troops returned to their camp. They did the same several days, in hopes the Romans would not fail to detach their cavalry to attack their rear-guard, and when they had drawn them on far enough from their camp, and the battle was begun, that they might face about. As the king's horse and light-armed foot were very much superior to those of the Romans, they assured themselves of having no difficulty in defeating them.

This first design not succeeding, the king encamped nearer the enemy, within little more than two leagues of them. At break of day, having drawn up his infantry in the same place as he had done the two preceding days, about 1000 paces from the enemy, he advanced at the head of his cavalry and light-armed foot towards the camp of the Romans. The sight of the dust, which flew nearer than usual, and seemed to be raised by a greater number of troops, gave them the alarm, and the first who brought the news could scarcely persuade them that the enemy was so near, because for several days before they had not appeared till ten in the morning, and the sun at that time was just rising. But when it was confirmed by the cries of many, who ran in crowds from the gates, there was no longer any room to doubt it, and the camp was in very great confusion. All the officers repaired with the utmost haste to the general's tent, as the soldiers did each to his own. The negligence of the consul, so ill informed in the motions of an enemy, whose nearness to him ought to have kept him perpetually upon his guard, gives us no great idea of his ability.

Perseus had drawn up his troops at least 500 paces from the consul's intrenchments. Cotys, king of the Odrysæ in Thrace, commanded the left, with the horse of his nation; the light-armed troops were distributed in the intervals of the front rank. The Macedonian and Cretan horse formed the right wing. At the extremity of each wing, the king's horse and those of the auxiliaries were posted. The king kept the centre with the horse that always attended his person; before whom were placed the slingers and archers, about 400 in number.

The consul, having drawn up his foot in battle array within his camp, detached only his cavalry and light-armed troops, who had orders to form a line in the front of his intrenchments. The right wing, which consisted of all the Italian horse, was commanded by C. Licinius Crassus, the consul's brother; the left, composed of the horse of the Grecian allies, by M. Valerius Levinus; both intermingled with the light-armed troops. Q. Mutius was posted in the centre with a select body of horse; and 200 of the Gaulish cavalry, and 300 of Eumenes's troops, were drawn up in his front. Four hundred Thessalian horse were placed a little beyond the left wing, as a body of reserve. King Eumenes and his brother Attalus, with their troops, were posted in the space between the intrenchments and the rear ranks.

This was only an engagement of cavalry, which in number was almost equal on both sides, and might amount to about 4000 on each, without including the light-armed troops. The action began by the slings and missive weapons, which were posted in front; but that was only the prelude. The Thracians, like wild beasts long pent up, and thereby rendered more furious, threw themselves first upon the right wing of the Romans, who perfectly brave and intrepid as they were, could not support so rude and violent a charge. The light-armed foot, whom the Thracians had amongst them, beat down the lances of the enemy with their swords, sometimes cutting the legs of the horses, and sometimes wounding them in their flanks. Perseus, who attacked the centre of the enemy, soon put the Greeks into disorder; and as they were vigorously pursued in their flight, the Thessalian horse, which at a small distance from the left wing formed a body of reserve, and in the beginning of the action had been only spectators of the battle, were of great service when that wing gave way. For those horse retiring gently and in good order, after having joined the auxiliary troops of Eumenes, gave a safe retreat between their ranks to those who fled and were dispersed; and when they saw the enemy was not warm in their pursuit, were so bold as to advance to sustain and encourage their own party. As this body of horse marched in good order, and always kept their ranks, the king's cavalry, who had broke in the pursuit, did not dare to wait their approach, nor to come to blows with them.

Hippias and Leonatas having learned the advantage gained by the cavalry, that the king might not lose so favourable an opportunity of completing the glory of the day, by vigorously pushing the enemy, and charging them in their intrenchments, brought on the Macedonian phalanx of their own accord, and without orders. It appeared, indeed, that had the king made the least effort, he might have rendered his victory complete; and in the present ardour of his troops, and terror into which they had thrown the Romans, the latter must have been entirely defeated. Whilst he was deliberating with himself between hope and fear, upon what he should resolve, Evander of Crete, in whom he reposed great confidence, upon seeing the phalanx advance, ran immediately to Perseus, and earnestly begged of him not to abandon himself to his present success, nor engage rashly in a new action that was not necessary, and wherein he hazarded every thing. He represented to him, that if he continued quiet, and contented himself with the present advantage, he would either obtain honourable conditions of peace, or, if he should choose to continue the war, this first success would infallibly determine those, who till then had remained neuter, to declare in his favour. The king was already inclined to follow that opinion; wherefore, having praised the counsel and zeal of Evander, he caused the retreat to be sounded for his horse, and ordered his foot to return into the camp.

The Romans lost 2000 of their light-armed infantry at least in this battle: and had 200 of their horse killed, and as many taken prisoners. On the other side, only twenty of their cavalry and forty foot soldiers were left upon the field. The victors returned into the camp with great joy, especially the Thracians, who, with songs of triumph, carried the heads of those they had killed upon the ends of their pikes; it was to them that Perseus was principally indebted for his victory. The Romans, on the contrary in profound sorrow, kept a mournful silence, and filled with terror, expected every moment that the enemy would come and attack them in their camp. Eumenes was of opinion, that it was proper to remove the camp to the other side of the Peneus, in order that the river might serve as an additional fortification for the troops, till they had recovered from their panic. The consul was averse to taking that step, which, as an open profession of fear, was highly dishonourable to himself and his army; but, however, being convinced by reason, and yielding to necessity, he passed with his troops, under cover of the night, and encamped on the other bank of the river.

Perseus advanced the next day to attack the enemy, and to give them battle; but it was then too late; he found their camp abandoned. When he saw them intrenched on the other side of the river, he perceived the enormous error he had committed the day before, in not pursuing them immediately upon their defeat; but he confessed it a still greater fault to have continued quiet and inactive during the night. For without putting the rest of his army in motion, if he had only detached his light-armed troops against the enemy during their confusion and disorder in passing the river, he might, without difficulty, have cut off at least part of their army.

We see here, in a sensible example, to what causes revolutions of states, and the fall of the greatest empires, owe their being. There is no reader but must have been surprised at seeing Perseus stop short in a decisive moment, and let slip an almost certain occasion of defeating his enemy; it requires no great capacity nor penetration to discern so gross a fault. But how came it to pass, that Perseus, who wanted neither judgment nor experience, should be so much mistaken? A notion is suggested to him by a man he confides in. It is weak, rash, and absurd. But God, who rules the heart of man, and who wills the destruction of the kingdom of Macedonia, suffers no other notion to prevail in the king's breast, and removes every thought which might, and naturally ought to have induced him to take quite different measures. Nor is that sufficient. The first fault might have been easily retrieved by a little vigilance during the night. God seems to have laid that prince and his army in a profound sleep. Not one of his officers has the least thought of observing the motions of the enemy in the night. We see nothing but what is natural in all this: but the Holy Scripture teaches us to think otherwise; and we may well apply to this event what was said of Saul's soldiers and officers: "And no man saw it, nor knew it, neither awaked, for they were all asleep, because a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them," 1 Sam. xxvi. 12.

The Romans, indeed, having put the river between them and the enemy, saw themselves no longer in danger of being suddenly attacked and routed; but the check they had lately received, and the wound they had given the glory of the Roman name, made them feel the sharpest affliction. All who were present in the council of war assembled by the consul, laid the fault upon the Ætolians. It was said, that they were the first who took the alarm and fled; that the rest of the Greeks had been drawn away by their example, and that five of the chief of their nation were the first who took to flight. The Thessalians, on the contrary, were praised for their valour, and their leaders rewarded with several marks of honour.

* Perseus made use of him in the intended assassination of Eumenes.

The spoils taken from the Romans were not inconsiderable. They amounted to 1500 bucklers, 1000 cuirasses, and a much greater number of helmets, swords, and darts of all kinds. The king made great presents of them to the officers who had distinguished themselves most; and having assembled the army, he began by telling them, that what had happened was a happy presage for them, and a certain pledge of what they might hope for the future. He made great encomiums upon the troops who had been in the action; and in magnificent terms expatiated upon the victory over the Roman horse, in which the principal force of their army consisted, and which they had before believed invincible; and promised himself from thence a more considerable success over their infantry, who had only escaped their swords by a shameful flight during the night; but that it would be easy to force the intrenchments in which their fear kept them shut up. The victorious soldiers, who carried the spoils of the enemies they had slain upon their shoulders, heard this discourse with sensible pleasure, and promised themselves every thing from their valour, judging of the future by the past. The foot, on their side, especially that which composed the Macedonian phalanx, stimulated by a laudable jealousy, pretended at least to equal, if not to excel, the glory of their companions upon the first occasion. In a word, the whole army demanded, with incredible ardour, only to come to blows with the enemy. The king, after having dismissed the assembly, set forward the next day, passed the river, and encamped at Mopsium, an eminence situate between Tempe and Larissa.

The joy for the good success of so important a battle affected Perseus at first in all its extent. He looked upon himself as superior to a people, who themselves were so with respect to all other princes and nations. This was not a victory gained by surprise, and in a manner stolen by stratagem and address, but carried by open force, and the valour and bravery of his troops, and that in his own sight and under his own conduct. He had seen the Roman haughtiness give way before him three times in one day: at first, in keeping close through fear in their camp; then, when they ventured out of it, shamefully belying themselves to flight; and, lastly, by flying again, during the obscurity of the night, and in finding no other security than by being enclosed within their intrenchments, the usual refuge of terror and apprehension. These thoughts were highly soothing, and capable of deceiving a prince, already too much affected with his own merit.

But when his first transports were a little abated, and the inebriating fume of sudden joy was somewhat evaporated, Perseus came to himself; and reflecting in cold blood upon all the consequences which might attend his victory, he began to be in some sort of terror. The wisest of the courtiers about him, taking advantage of so happy a disposition, ventured to give him the advice which his present temper made him capable of appreciating; this was, to make the best of his late success, and conclude an honourable peace with the Romans. They represented to him, that the most certain mark of a prudent and really happy prince, was not to rely too much upon the present favours of fortune, nor abandon himself to the delusive glitter of prosperity. That, therefore, he would do well to send to the consul, and propose a renewal of the treaty, upon the same conditions as had been imposed by T. Quintius, when victorious, upon his father Philip. That he could not put an end to the war more gloriously for himself, than after so memorable a battle; nor hope a more favourable occasion of concluding a sure and lasting peace, than at a conjuncture when the check the Romans had received would render them more tractable, and better inclined to grant him good conditions. That if, notwithstanding that check, the Romans, out of a pride too natural to them, should reject a just and equitable accommodation, he would at least have the consolation of having the gods and men for witnesses of his own moderation, and the haughty obstinacy of the Romans.

The king acquiesced in these wise remonstrances, to which he never was averse. The majority of the council also applauded them. Ambassadors were accordingly sent to the consul, who gave them audience in the presence of a numerous assembly. They told him they came to demand peace; that Perseus would pay the same tribute to the Romans as his father Philip had done, and abandon all the cities, territories, and places, which that prince had abandoned.

When they withdrew, the council deliberated upon the answer it was proper to make. The Roman firmness displayed itself upon this occasion in an extraordinary manner. It was the custom at that time, to express in adversity all the assurance and loftiness of good fortune, and to act with moderation in prosperity. The answer was, that no peace could be granted to Perseus, unless he submitted himself and his kingdom to the discretion of the senate. When it was related to the king and his friends, they were strangely surprised at so extraordinary, and, in their opinion, so ill-timed a pride; most of them believed it needless to talk any farther of peace, and that the Romans would soon be reduced to demand what they now refused. Perseus was not of the same opinion. He judged rightly, that Rome was not so haughty but from a consciousness of superiority; and that reflection daunted him exceedingly. He sent again to the consul, and offered a more considerable tribute than had been imposed upon Philip. When he saw the consul would retract nothing from his first answer, having no longer any hopes of peace, he returned to his former camp at Scyrium, determined to try again the fortune of the war.

We may conclude, from the whole conduct of Perseus, that he must have undertaken this war with great imprudence, and without having compared his strength and resources with those of the Romans. To think himself fortunate in being able, after a signal victory, to demand peace, and submit to more oppressive conditions than his father Philip had complied with till after a bloody defeat, seems to argue that he had taken his measures and concerted the means of success very ill; since, after a first action entirely to his advantage, he begins to discern all his weakness and inferiority, and in some sort inclines to despair. Why then was he the first to break the peace? Why was he the aggressor? Why was he in such haste? Was it to stop short at the first step? How came he not to know his weakness, till his own victory showed it him? These are not the signs of a wise and judicious prince.

The news of the battle of the cavalry, which soon spread in Greece, made known what the people thought, and discovered in its full light to which side they inclined. It was received with joy, not only by the partizans of Macedonia, but even by most of those whom the Romans had obliged, of whom some suffered with pain their haughty manners and insolence of power.

The pretor Lucretius at the same time was besieging the city of Haliartus in Boeotia. After a long and vigorous defence, it was taken at last by storm, plundered, and afterwards entirely demolished. Thebes soon after surrendered, and then Lucretius returned with his fleet.

Perseus, in the mean time, who was not far from the camp of the Romans, gave them great trouble; harassing their troops, and falling upon their foragers, whenever they ventured out of their camp. He took one day a thousand carriages, laden principally with sheaves of corn which the Romans had been to reap, and made 600 prisoners. He afterwards attacked a small body of troops in the neighbourhood, of which he expected to make himself master with little or no difficulty; but he found more resistance than he had imagined. That small body was commanded by a brave officer called L. Pompeius, who, retiring to an eminence, defended himself there with intrepid courage, determined to die with his troops, rather than surrender. He was upon the point of being borne down by numbers, when the consul arrived to his assistance with a strong detachment of horse and light armed foot; the legions were ordered to follow him. The sight of the consul gave Pompeius and his troops new courage, who were 800 men, all Romans. Perseus immediately sent for his phalanx; but the consul did not wait his coming up, and came directly to blows. The Macedonians, after having made a very vigorous resistance for some time, were at last broken and put to the rout. Three hundred foot were left upon the field, with twenty-four of the best horse, of the troop called the Sacred Squadron, of which the commander himself, Antimachus, was killed.

The success of this action reanimated the Romans and very much alarmed Perseus. After having put a strong garrison into Gonnus, he marched back his army into Macedonia.

The consul having reduced Perrhæbia, and taken Larissa and some other cities, dismissed all the allies, except the Achæans; dispersed his troops in Thessaly, where he left them in winter quarters, and went into Boeotia at the request of the Thebans, upon whom the people of Coronea had made incursions.

SECTION III.—THE SENATE PASS A WISE DECREE TO PUT A STOP TO THE AVARICE OF THE GENERALS AND MAGISTRATES, WHO OPPRESSED THE ALLIES. THE CONSUL MARCIUS, AFTER SUSTAINING GREAT FATIGUE, ENTERS MACEDONIA. PERSEUS TAKES THE ALARM, AND LEAVES THE PASSES OPEN; HE RESUMES COURAGE AFTERWARDS. INSOLENT EMBASSY OF THE RHODIANS TO ROME.

Nothing memorable passed the A. M. 3834. following year.¹ The consul Hostilius had sent Ap. Claudius into Illyria with 4000 foot, to defend such of the inhabitants of that country as were allies of the Romans; and the latter had found means to add 8000 men, raised among the allies, to his first body of troops. He encamped at Lychnidus, a city of the Dassaretæ. Near that place was another city called Uscana, which belonged to Perseus, and where he had a strong garrison. Claudius, upon the promise which had been made him of having the place put into his hands, in hopes of making great booty, approached it with almost all his troops, without any order, distrust, or precaution. Whilst he thought least of it, the garrison made a furious sally upon him, put his whole army to flight, and pursued them a great way with dreadful slaughter. Of 11,000 men, scarce 2000 escaped into the camp, which 1000 had been left to guard: Claudius returned to Lychnidus with the ruins of his army. The news of this loss very much afflicted the senate; and the more, because it had been occasioned by the imprudence and avarice of Claudius.

This was the almost universal disease of the commanders at that time.² The senate received various complaints from many cities, as well of Greece as the other provinces, against the Roman officers, who treated them with unheard of rapaciousness and cruelty. They punished some of them, redressed the wrongs they had done the cities, and dismissed the ambassadors, well satisfied with the manner in which their remonstrances had been received. Soon after, to prevent such disorders for the future, they passed a decree, which expressed that the cities should not furnish the Roman magistrates with any thing more than what the senate expressly appointed; which ordinance was published in all the cities of Peloponnesus.

C. Popilius and Cn. Octavius, who were charged with this commission, went first to Thebes, where they very much praised the citizens, and exhorted them to continue firm in their alliance with the Roman people. Proceeding afterwards to the other cities of Peloponnesus, they boasted every where of the lenity and moderation of the senate, which they proved by their late decree in favour of the Greeks. They found great divisions in almost all cities, especially among the Etolians, occasioned by two factions which divided them, one for the Romans, and the other for the Macedonians. The assembly of Achaia was not exempt from these divisions; but the wisdom of the persons of greatest authority prevented their consequences. The advice of Archon, one of the principal persons of the league, was to act according to conjunctures, to leave no room for calumny to irritate either of the contending powers against the republic, and to avoid the misfortunes into which those were fallen, who had not been sufficiently aware of the power of the Romans. This advice prevailed; and it was resolved that Archon should be made chief magistrate, and Polybius captain-general of the horse.

About this time Attalus, having something to demand of the Achæan league, caused the new magistrate to be sounded; who being determined in favour of the Romans and their allies, promised that prince to support his suit with all his power. The affair in question was, to have a decree reversed, by which it was ordained, that all the statues of king Eumenes should be removed from the public places. At the first council that was held, the ambassadors of Attalus were introduced to the assembly, who demanded, that in consideration of the prince who sent them, Eumenes, his brother, should be restored to the honours which the republic had formerly decreed him. Archon supported this demand, but with great moderation. Polybius spoke with more force, enlarged upon the merit and services of Eumenes, demonstrated the injustice of the first decree, and concluded that it was proper to repeal it. The whole assembly applauded his discourse, and it was resolved that Eumenes should be restored to all his honours.

It was at this time that Rome sent Popilius to Antiochus Epiphanes,³ to prevent his enterprises against Egypt, which we have mentioned before.

The Macedonian war gave the Romans great employment. Q. Marcius Philippus, one of the two consuls lately elected, was charged with it.

Before he set out, Perseus had conceived the design of taking the advantage of the winter to make an expedition against Illyria, which was the only province from whence Macedonia had reason to fear irruptions during the king's being employed against the Romans. This expedition succeeded very happily for him, and almost without any loss on his side. He began with the siege of Uscana, which had fallen into the hands of the Romans, (it is not known how,) and took it, after a defence of some duration. He afterwards made himself master of all the strong places in the country, the most part of which had Roman garrisons in them, and took a great number of prisoners.

Perseus at the same time sent ambassadors to Gentius, one of the kings of Illyria, to induce him to quit the party of the Romans, and to come over to him. Gentius was far from being averse to it; but he observed, that having neither ammunition for the war, nor money, he was in no condition to declare against the Romans; which was explaining himself sufficiently. Perseus, who was avaricious, did not understand, or rather affected not to understand, his demand, and sent a second embassy to him without mention of money, and received the same answer. Polybius observes, that this fear of expense, which denotes a little and mean soul, and entirely dishonours a prince, made many of his enterprises miscarry; and that if he would have sacrificed certain sums, and those far from considerable, he might have engaged several republics and princes in his party. Can such a blindness be conceived in a rational creature! Polybius considers it as a punishment from the gods.

Perseus, having led back his troops into Macedonia, made them march afterwards to Stautus, a very strong city of Etolia, above the gulf of Ambracia. The people had given him hopes that they would surrender it as soon as he appeared before the walls; out the Romans prevented them, and threw succours into the place.

Early in the spring the consul Marcius left Rome, and went to Thessaly, from whence, without losing time, he advanced into Macedonia, fully assured that it was necessary to attack Perseus in the heart of his dominions.

Upon the report that the Roman army was ready to take the field,¹ Archon, chief magistrate of the Achæans, to justify his country from the suspicions and injurious reports that had been propagated against it, advised the Achæans to pass a decree, by which it should be ordained, that they should march an army into Thessaly, and share in all the dangers of the war with the Romans. That decree being confirmed, orders were given to Archon to raise troops, and to make all the necessary preparations. It was afterwards resolved, that ambassadors should be sent to the consul, to acquaint him with the resolution of the republic, and to know from him where and when the Achæan army should join him. Polybius, our historian, with some others, was charged with this embassy. They found the Romans had quitted Thessaly, and were encamped in Perrhæbia, between Azorus and Doliche, greatly perplexed about the route it was necessary to take. They followed them, in order to await a favourable opportunity of speaking to the consul, and shared with him in all the dangers he ran in entering Macedonia.

Perseus,² who did not know what route the consul would take, had posted considerable bodies of troops in two places, by which it was probable he would attempt to pass. For himself, he encamped with the rest of his army near Diium, marching and countermarching without any fixed object.

Marcus, after long deliberation, resolved to pass the forest that covered the heights of Octolophus. He had incredible difficulties to surmount, the ways were so steep and impracticable; but he had had the precaution to seize an eminence, which favoured his passage. From hence the enemy's camp, which was not distant above a thousand paces, and all the country about Diium and Phila, might be discovered; which very much animated the soldiers, who had before their eyes such opulent lands, where they hoped to enrich themselves. Hippas, whom the king had posted to defend this pass with a body of 12,000 men, seeing the eminence possessed by a detachment of the Romans, marched to meet the consul, who was advancing with his whole army, harassed his troops for two days, and distressed them very much by frequent attacks. Marcius was in great trouble, not being able either to advance with safety, or retreat without shame, or even danger. He had no other choice to make, than to pursue with vigour an undertaking, formed perhaps with too much boldness and temerity, but which could not succeed without a determinate perseverance, which is often crowned in the end with success. It is certain, that if the consul had had to deal with an enemy like the ancient kings of Macedonia, in the narrow defile where his troops were pent up, he would infallibly have received a great blow. But Perseus, instead of sending fresh troops to support Hippas, the cries of whose soldiers in battle he could hear in his camp, and of going in person to attack the enemy, amused himself with making useless excursions with his cavalry into the country about Diium, and by that neglect gave the Romans an opportunity of extricating themselves from the dangerous situation into which they had brought themselves.

It was not without infinite pains that they effected this; the horses laden with their baggage sinking under their burdens as they descended the mountain, and falling down at almost every step they took. The elephants, especially, gave them great trouble: it was necessary to find some new means for their descent in such extremely steep places. Having cleared a level on the snow on these declivities, they drove two beams into the earth at the lower part of the road, at the distance of something more than the breadth of an elephant from each other. Upon those beams they laid planks of thirty feet in length and formed a kind of bridge, which they covered with earth. At the end of the first bridge, but at some little distance, they erected a second, then a third, and as many more of the same kind as were necessary. The elephant passed from the firm ground to the bridge; and before he came to the end, they contrived to lower insensibly the beams that supported it, and let him gently down with the bridge: he went on in that manner to the second, and so to all the rest. It was not easy to express the fatigues they underwent in this pass; the soldiers being often obliged to roll down with their arms, because it was impossible for them to keep their footing. It was agreed, that with a handful of men, the enemy might have defeated the Roman army. At length after infinite difficulties and dangers, it arrived in a plain, and found itself in safety.

As the consul seemed then to have happily overcome the greatest difficulties of his enterprise,³ Polybius thought this a proper time for presenting to Marcius the decree of the Achæans, and assuring him of their resolution to join him with all their forces, and to share with him in all the labours and dangers of this war. Marcius, after having thanked the Achæans for their good will in the kindest terms, told them, they might spare themselves the trouble and expense that war would give them; that he would dispense with both; and that, in the present posture of affairs, he had no occasion for the aid of the allies. After this discourse, Polybius's colleagues returned into Achæia.

Polybius alone continued in the Roman army, till the consul, having received advice that Appius, surnamed Cento, had demanded of the Achæans a body of 5000 men to be sent him into Epirus, despatched him home with advice, not to suffer his republic to furnish those troops, or engage in expenses entirely unnecessary, as Appius had no reason to demand that aid. It is difficult, says the historian, to discover the real motives that induced Marcius to talk in this manner. Did he wish to spare the Achæans, or was he laying a snare for them? or did he intend to put it out of Appius's power to undertake any thing?

Whilst the king was bathing, he was informed of the enemy's approach. That news alarmed him terribly. Uncertain what plan to pursue, and changing every moment his resolution, he cried out, and lamented his being conquered without fighting. He recalled the two officers, to whom he had confided the defence of the passes; sent the gilt statues⁴ at Diium on board his fleet, lest they should fall into the hands of the Romans; gave orders that his treasures, which were laid up at Pella, should be thrown into the sea, and all his galleys at Thessalonica burnt. For himself, he retired to Pydna.

The consul had brought the army to a place from whence it was impossible to disengage himself without the enemy's permission. The only passage for him was through two forests; by the one he might penetrate through the valley of Tempe in Thessaly, and by the other, beyond Diium, enter farther into Macedonia; and both these important posts were possessed by strong garrisons whom the king had placed there. So that if Perseus had only stayed ten days without taking fright, it had been impossible for the Romans to have entered Thessaly by Tempe, and the consul would have had no pass by which provisions could be conveyed to him. For the ways through Tempe are bordered by such vast precipices, that the eye could scarce look down from them without dizziness. The king's troops guarded this pass at four several places, of which the last was so narrow, that ten men, well armed, could alone have defended the entrance. The Romans, therefore, not being able either to receive provisions by the narrow passes of Tempe, nor to get through them, must have been obliged to regain the mountains from whence they came down, which was become impracticable, the enemy having possessed themselves of the entrenches. The only choice they had left was to open their way into Macedonia, through their enemies, to Dium; which would have been no less difficult, if the gods, says Livy, had not deprived Perseus of prudence and counsel. For in making a fosse with intrenchments in a very narrow defile at the foot of mount Olympus, he would have absolutely shut them out, and stopped them short. But in the blindness into which his fear had thrown the king, he neither saw nor put in execution any of the various means in his power to save himself, but left all the passes of his kingdom open and unguarded, and took refuge at Pydna with precipitation.

The consul perceived aright, that he owed his safety to the king's timidity and imprudence. He ordered the prætor Lucretius, who was at Larissa, to seize the posts bordering upon Tempe, which Perseus had abandoned, in order to secure a retreat in case of accident; and sent Popilius to take a view of the passes in the way to Dium. When he was informed that the ways were open and unguarded, he marched thither in two days, and encamped his army near the temple of Jupiter, in the neighbourhood, to prevent its being plundered. Having entered the city, which was full of magnificent buildings, and well fortified, he was exceedingly surprised that the king had abandoned it so easily. He continued his march, and made himself master of several places, almost without any resistance. But the farther he advanced, the less provisions he found, and the more the dearth increased; which obliged him to return to Dium. He was also reduced to quit that city, and retire to Phila, where the prætor Lucretius had informed him he might find provisions in abundance. His quitting Dium suggested to Perseus, that it was now time to recover by his courage what he had lost by his fear. He repossessed himself therefore of that city, and soon repaired its ruins. Popilius, on his side, besieged and took Heraclea, which was only a quarter of a league distant from Phila.

Perseus, having recovered his fright and resumed his spirits, would have been very glad that his orders to throw his treasures at Pella into the sea, and burn all his ships at Thessalonica, had not been executed. Andronicus, to whom he had given the latter order, had delayed obeying it, to give time for the repentance which might soon follow that command, as indeed it happened. Nicias, with less precaution, had thrown all the money he found at Pella into the sea. But his fault was soon repaired by divers, who brought up almost the whole money from the bottom of the sea. To reward their services, the king caused them all to be put to death secretly, as well as Andronicus and Nicias; so much was he ashamed of the abject terror to which he had abandoned himself, that he could not bear to have any witnesses or traces of it in being.

Several expeditions passed on both sides by sea and land, which were neither of much consequence nor importance.

When Polybius returned from his embassy into Peloponnesus,² Appius's letter, in which he demanded 5000 men, had been received there. Some time after, the council, which was assembled at Sicyon, to deliberate upon that affair, gave Polybius great perplexity. Not to execute the order he had received from Marcus, had been an inexcusable fault. On the other side, it was dangerous to refuse the Romans the troops they might have occasion for, and of which the Achæans were in no want. To extricate themselves in so delicate a conjuncture, they had recourse to the decree of the Roman senate, that prohibited their paying any regard to the letters of the generals, unless an order of the senate was annexed to them, which Appius had not sent with his. It was his opinion, therefore, that before any thing was sent to Appius, it was necessary to inform the consul of his demand, and to wait for his decision upon it. By that means, Polybius saved the Achæans an expense, which would have amounted to more than 120,000 crowns.

In the mean time arrived at Rome ambassadors from Prusias,³ king of Bithynia, and also from the Rhodians, in favour of Perseus. The former expressed themselves very modestly, declaring that Prusias had constantly adhered to the Roman party, and should continue to do so during the war; but that having promised Perseus to employ his good offices in his behalf with the Romans, in order to obtain a peace, he desired, if it were possible, that they would grant him that favour, and make use of his mediation as they should think convenient. The language of the Rhodians was very different. After having set forth, in a lofty style, the services they had done the Roman people, and ascribed to themselves the greatest share in the victories they had obtained, and especially in that over Antiochus, they added, that whilst the peace subsisted between the Macedonians and Romans, they had negotiated a treaty of alliance with Perseus; that they had suspended it against their will, and without any subject of complaint against the king, because it had pleased the Romans to engage them on their side; that during the three years which this war had continued, they had suffered many inconveniences from it; that their trade by sea being interrupted, the island found itself in great straits, from the reduction of its revenues and other advantages arising from commerce; that being no longer able to support such considerable losses, they had sent ambassadors into Macedonia, to king Perseus, to inform him that the Rhodians thought it necessary that he should make peace with the Romans, and that they were also sent to Rome to make the same declaration; that if either of the parties refused to accede to so reasonable a proposal, the Rhodians should know what they had to do.

It is easy to judge in what manner so vain and presumptuous a discourse was received. Some historians tell us, that all the answer that was given to it was, to order a decree of the senate whereby the Carians and Lycians were declared free, to be read in their presence. This was touching them to the quick, and mortifying them in the most sensible part; for they pretended to an authority over both those nations. Others say, the senate answered in few words; that the disposition of the Rhodians, and their secret intrigues with Perseus, had been long known at Rome: that when the Roman people should have conquered him, of which they expected advice every day, they should know in their turn what they had to do, and should then treat their allies according to their respective merits. They made the ambassadors, however, the usual presents.

The consul Q. Marcus's letter was then read; in which he gave an account of the manner he had entered Macedonia, after having suffered incredible difficulties in passing a very narrow defile. He added, that by the wise precaution of the prætor, he had sufficient provisions for the whole winter; having received from the Epirots 20,000 measures of wheat and 10,000 of barley, for which it was necessary to pay their ambassadors, then at Rome: that it was also necessary to send him clothes for the soldiers: that he wanted 200 horses, especially from Numidia, because there was none of that kind in the country where he was. All these articles were exactly and immediately executed.

After this they gave audience to Onesimus, a Macedonian nobleman. He had always advised the king to maintain peace; and putting him in mind that his father Philip, to the last day of his life, had caused his treaty with the Romans to be constantly read to him twice every day, he had admonished him to do as much, if not with the same regularity, at least from time to time. Not being able to dissuade him from the war, he had begun to withdraw himself from his councils, under different pretexts, that he might not be witness to the resolutions taken in them, which he could not approve. At length, seeing himself become suspected, and 'acutely considered' as a traitor, he had taken refuge among the Romans, and had been of great service to the consul. Having made this relation to the senate, they gave him a very favourable reception, and provided magnificently for his subsistence.

The time for the comitia,¹ or assemblies for the election of consuls at Rome, approaching, all the world were anxious to know upon whom so important a choice would fall, and nothing else was talked of in all conversations. They were not satisfied with the consuls who had been employed for three years against Perseus, and they had very ill sustained the honour of the Roman name. They called to mind the famous victories formerly obtained over his father Philip, who had been obliged to sue for peace; over Antiochus, who was driven beyond mount Taurus, and forced to pay a great tribute; and, what was still more considerable, over Hannibal, the greatest general that had ever appeared as their enemy, or perhaps in the world, whom they had reduced to quit Italy after a war of more than sixteen years' continuance, and conquered in his own country almost under the very walls of Carthage. The formidable preparations made by Perseus, and some advantages gained by him in the former campaigns, augmented the apprehension of the Romans. They plainly discerned that it was no time to confer the command of the armies by faction or favour, and that it was necessary to choose a general for his wisdom, valour and experience; in a word, one capable of conducting so important a war as that now upon their hands.

All the world cast their eyes upon Paulus Æmilius. There are times when distinguished merit unites the voices of the public; and nothing is more grateful than such a judgment, founded upon the knowledge of a man's past services, the army's opinion of his capacity, and the state's pressing occasion for his valour and conduct. Paulus Æmilius was near sixty years old; but age, without impairing his faculties in the least, had rather improved them with maturity of wisdom and judgment: more necessary in a general than even valour and bravery. He had been consul thirteen years before, and had acquired general esteem during his administration. But the people repaid his services with ingratitude, having refused to raise him again to the same dignity, though he had solicited it with sufficient ardour. For several years he had led a private and retired life, solely employed in the education of his children, in which no father ever succeeded better, nor was more gloriously rewarded for his care. All his relations, all his friends, urged him to comply with the people's wishes in taking upon him the consulship: but believing himself no longer capable of commanding, he avoided appearing in public, kept himself at home, and shunned honours with as much solicitude as others generally pursue them. However, when he saw the people assemble every morning in crowds before his door, that they summoned him to the Forum, and exclaimed highly against his obstinate refusal to serve his country, he acceded at last to their remonstrances; and appearing amongst those who aspired to that dignity, he seemed less to receive the command of the army, than to give the people the assurance of an approaching and complete victory. The consulship was conferred upon him unanimously; and, according to Plutarch, the command of the army in Macedonia was assigned to him in preference to his colleague, though Livy says it fell to him by lot.

It is said, that on the very day that he was elected general in the war against Perseus, at his return home, attended by all the people, who followed to do him honour, he found his daughter Tertia, at that time a little infant, crying bitterly. He embraced her, and asked her the cause of her tears. Tertia, hugging him with her little arms, "Do you not know, then, father," said she, "that our Perseus is dead?" She spoke of a little dog she had brought up, called Perseus. "And at a very good time, my dear child," said Paulus Æmilius, struck with the word; "I accept this omen with joy." The ancients carried their superstition with respect to this kind of fortuitous occurrences very high.

The manner in which Paulus Æmilius prepared for the war he was charged with, gave room to judge of the success to be expected from it. He demanded, first, that commissioners should be sent into Macedonia to inspect the army and fleet, and to make their report, after an exact inquiry, of the number of troops which was necessary to be added both by sea and land. They were also to inform themselves, as near as possible, of the number of the king's forces; where they and the Romans actually lay; if the latter were encamped in the forests, or had entirely passed them, and were arrived in the plain; upon which of the allies they might rely with certainty, which of them were dubious and wavering, and whom they might regard as declared enemies; for how long time they had provisions, and from whence they might be supplied with them either by land or water; what had passed during the last campaign, either in the army by land, or in the fleet. As an able and experienced general, he thought it necessary to enter fully into this detail; convinced that the plan of the campaign upon which he was about to enter, could not be formed, nor its operations concerted, without a perfect knowledge of all these particulars. The senate highly approved these wise measures, and appointed commissioners, with the approbation of Paulus Æmilius, who set out two days after.

During their absence, audience was given the ambassadors from Ptolemy and Cleopatra, king and queen of Egypt, who brought complaints to Rome of the unjust enterprises of Antiochus king of Syria, which have been before related.

The commissioners made extraordinary despatch. Upon their return, they reported that Marcus had forced the passes of Macedonia, to get entrance into the country, but with more danger than utility: that the king was advanced into Pieria, and in actual possession of it: that the two camps were very near each other, being separated only by the river Enipeus: that the king avoided a battle, and that the Roman army was neither in a condition to oblige him to fight, nor to force his lines: that, in addition to the other inconveniences, a very severe winter had happened, from which they suffered exceedingly in their mountainous country, and were entirely prevented from acting; and that they had only provisions for six days: that the army of the Macedonians was supposed to amount to 30,000 men; that if Appius Claudius had been sufficiently strong in the neighbourhood of Lychnidus, in Illyria, he might have acted with good effect against king Gentius; but that Claudius and his troops were actually in great danger, unless a considerable reinforcement were immediately sent him, or he be ordered directly to quit the post he then occupied: that after having visited the camp, they had repaired to the fleet; that they had been told, that part of the crews were dead of diseases; that the rest of the allies, especially those of Sicily, were returned home; and that the fleet was entirely in want of seamen and soldiers; that those who remained had not received their pay, and had no clothes; that Eumenes and his fleet, after having just shown themselves, disappeared immediately without any cause that could be assigned; and that it seemed his inclinations neither could nor ought to be relied on; but that as for his brother Attalus, his good will was not to be doubted.

Upon this report of the commissioners, after Paulus Æmilius had given his opinion, the senate decreed that he should set forward without loss of time for Macedonia, with the prætor Cn. Octavius, who had the command of the fleet, and L. Anicius, another prætor, who was to succeed Ap. Claudius in his post near Lynchnidus, in Illyria. The number of troops which each of them was to command was regulated in the following manner:—

The troops of which the army of Paulus Æmilius consisted, amounted to 25,800 men; that is, two Roman legions, each composed of 6000 foot and 300 horse; as many of the infantry of the Italian allies, and twice the number of horse. He had, besides, 600 horse raised in Gallia Cisalpina, and some auxiliary troops from the allies of Greece and Asia. The whole, in all probability, did not amount to more than 30,000 men. The prætor Anicius was to have also two legions; but they consisted of only 5000 foot and 300 horse each; which, with 10,000 of the Italian allies and 800 horse, composed the army under him of 21,200 men. The troops that served on board the fleet were 5000 men. These three bodies together made 56,200 men.

As the war which they were preparing to make this year in Macedonia seemed of the utmost consequence, every precaution was taken that might conduce to the success of it. The consuls and people had the choice of the tribunes who were to serve in it, and each commanded in his turn an entire legion. It was decreed that none should be elected into this employment but such as had already served, and Paulus Æmilius was left at liberty to choose out of all the tribunes such as he approved for his army: he had twelve for the two legions.

It must be allowed that the Romans acted with great wisdom upon this occasion. They had, as we have seen, unanimously chosen as consul and general, the person amongst them who was indisputably the greatest captain of his time. They had resolved that no officers should be raised to the post of tribune, but such as were distinguished by their merit, experience, and capacity, instanced in real service; advantages that are not always the effect of birth or seniority, to which indeed the Romans paid little or no regard. They did more: by a particular exception, compatible with republican government, Paulus Æmilius was left at entire liberty to choose such of the tribunes as he thought fit; well knowing the great importance of a perfect union between the general and the officers who serve under him, in order to ensure the exact and punctual execution of the commands of the former, who is in a manner the soul of the army, and ought to direct all its motions, which cannot be done without the best understanding between them, founded in a love for the public good, with which neither interest, jealousy, nor ambition, is capable of interfering.

After all these regulations were made, the consul Paulus Æmilius repaired from the senate to the assembly of the people, to whom he spoke in this manner. "You seem to me, Romans, to have expressed more joy when Macedonia fell to my lot, than when I was elected consul, or entered upon that office; and to me your joy seemed to be occasioned by the hopes you conceived that I should put an end, in a manner worthy of the grandeur and reputation of the Roman people, to a war, which, in your opinion, has already been of too long continuance. I have reason to believe, that the same gods, who have occasioned Macedonia to fall to my lot, will also assist me with their protection in conducting and terminating this war successfully: but of this I may venture to assure you, that I shall do my utmost not to fall short of your expectations. The senate has wisely regulated every thing necessary for the expedition with which I am charged; and as I am ordered to set out immediately, in which I shall make no delay, I am convinced that my colleague, C. Licinius, out of his great zeal for the public service, will raise and march off the troops appointed for me, with as much ardour and expedition as if they were for himself. I shall take care to remit to you, as well as to the senate, an exact account of all that passes; and you may rely upon the certainty and truth of my letters but I beg of you as a great favour, that you will not give credit to, or attribute consequence by your credulity to, the vague and unauthenticated reports which are frequently spread abroad. I perceive well, in this war, more than any other, that with whatever resolution people may determine to disregard these rumours, they will not fail to make an impression, and inspire some degree of discouragement. There are those, who in company, and even at tables, command armies, regulate the disposition of the forces, and prescribe all the operations of the campaign. They know better than we where we should encamp, and what posts it is necessary for us to seize; at what time, and by what defile, we ought to enter Macedonia; where it is proper to establish our magazines; from whence, either by sea or land, we are to bring provisions; when we are to fight the enemy, and when lie still. They not only prescribe what is best to be done, but for deviating ever so little from their plans they make it a crime in their consul, and cite him before their tribunal. But know, Romans, this is a great impediment with your generals. All have not the resolution and constancy of Fabius, to despise impertinent reports. He could choose rather to suffer the people upon such rumours to invade his authority, than to ruin the business of the state in order to secure to himself their good opinion and an empty name. I am far from believing that generals stand in no need of advice: I think, on the contrary, that whoever would conduct every thing aright, upon his own opinion, and without consulting the judgment of others, shows more presumption than prudence. But some may ask, How then shall we act reasonably? By not suffering any persons to obtrude their advice upon your generals, but such as are, in the first place, versed in the art of war, and have learned from experience what it is to command: and in the second, who are upon the spot, who know the enemy, are witnesses in person to all that passes, and sharers with us in all dangers. If there be any one who conceives himself capable of assisting me with his counsels in the war you have charged me with, let him not refuse to do the republic that service, but let him go with me into Macedonia; a ship, horses, tents, provisions, shall all be supplied at my charge. But if he will not take so much trouble, and prefers the tranquillity of the city to the dangers and fatigues of the field, let him not take upon him to hold the helm, and continue idle in port. The city of itself supplies sufficient matter of discourse on other subjects; but as for these, let it be silent, and know, that we shall pay no regard to any counsels, but such as shall be given us in the camp itself."

This discourse of Paulus Æmilius, which abounds with reason and good sense, shows that men are the same in all ages of the world. People have an incredible itch for examining, criticising, and condemning the conduct of generals, and do not observe, that by so doing they act in manifest contradiction to reason and justice: to reason; for what can be more absurd and ridiculous, than to see persons, without any knowledge or experience in war, set themselves up for censors of the most able generals, and pronounce with a magisterial air upon their actions? to justice; for the most experienced can make no certain judgment without being upon the spot; the least circumstance of time, place, disposition of the troops, secret orders not divulged, being capable of making an absolute change in the general rules of conduct. But we must not expect to see a failing reformed, that has its source in the curiosity and vanity of human nature; and generals would do wisely, after the example of Paulus Æmilius, to despise these city reports, and crude opinions of idle people, who have nothing else to do, and have generally as little judgment as business.

* It was a received opinion in all ages and nations, that the Divinity presides over chance.

Paulus Æmilius, after having discharged, according to custom, the duties of religion, set out for Macedonia, with the prætor Cn. Octavius, to whom the command of the fleet had been allotted.

Whilst they were employed at Rome in making preparations for the war, Perseus, on his side, had not been asleep. The fear of the approaching danger which threatened him having at length got the better of his avarice, he agreed to give Gentius king of Illyria 300 talents of silver, (that is, 300,000 crowns,) and purchased his alliance at that price.

He sent ambassadors at the same time to Rhodes, convinced that if that island, very powerful at that time by sea, should embrace his party, Rome would be very much embarrassed. He sent deputies also to Eumenes and Antiochus, two very potent kings, and capable of giving him great aid. Perseus did wisely in having recourse to these measures, and in endeavouring to strengthen himself by such supports; but he entered upon them too late. He ought to have begun by taking those steps, and to have made them the first foundation of his enterprise. He did not think of putting those remote powers in motion, till he was reduced almost to extremity, and his affairs were almost absolutely desperate. It was rather calling in spectators and associates of his ruin, than aids and supports. The instructions which he gave his ambassadors were very solid and forcible, as we shall soon see; but he should have made use of them three years sooner, and have waited their effect, before he embarked, almost alone, in the war against so powerful a people, and one that had so many resources in case of misfortune.

The ambassadors had the same instructions for both those kings. They represented to them, that there was a natural enmity between republics and monarchies. That the Roman people attacked the kings one after another, and, what added extremely to the indignity, that they employed the forces of the kings themselves to ruin them in succession. That they had crushed his father by the assistance of Attalus; that by the aid of Eumenes, and, in some measure, by that of his father Philip, Antiochus had been subjected, and that at present they had armed Eumenes and Prusias against himself. That after the kingdom of Macedonia should be destroyed, Asia would be the next to experience the same fate; of which they had already usurped a part, under the specious pretext of re-establishing the cities in their ancient liberty; and that Syria's turn would soon follow. That they had already begun to prefer Prusias to Eumenes by particular distinctions of honour, and had deprived Antiochus of the fruits of his victories in Egypt. Perseus requested of them, either to induce the Romans to give Macedonia peace; or, if they persevered in the unjust design of continuing the war, to regard them as the common enemy of all kings. The ambassadors treated with Antiochus openly, and without any reserve.

In regard to Eumenes, they covered their voyage with the pretext of ransoming prisoners, and treated only in secret upon the real cause of their mission. There had passed already several conferences, at different times and places, upon the same subject, which had begun to render that prince very much suspected by the Romans. It was not that Eumenes desired in reality that Perseus should be victorious against the Romans; the enormous power he would then have had would have given him umbrage, and highly alarmed his jealousy; neither was he more willing to declare openly against him, or to make war upon him. But, in hopes to see the two parties equally inclined to peace; Perseus, from his fear of the misfortunes which might befall him; the Romans, from being weary of a war spun out to too great a length; he desired to become the mediator of a peace between them, and to make Perseus purchase his mediation, or at least his inaction and neutrality, at a high price. That was already agreed upon, and was 1500 talents (1,500,000 crowns.) The only difference that remained, was in settling the time for the payment of that sum. Perseus was for waiting till the service was performed, and in the mean time offered to deposit the money in Samothracia. Eumenes did not believe himself secure in that, because Samothracia depended on Perseus; and therefore he insisted upon immediate payment of part of the money. This broke up the treaty.

He failed likewise in another negotiation, which might have been no less in his favour. He had caused a body of Gauls to come from the other side of the Danube, consisting of 10,000 horse and as many foot, and had agreed to give ten pieces of gold to each horseman, five to the infantry, and 1000 to their captains. I have observed above, that these Gauls had taken the name of Bastarnæ. When he received advice that they were arrived upon the frontiers of his dominions he went to meet them with half his troops, and gave orders, that in the towns and villages through which they were to pass, great quantities of corn, wine, and cattle, should be provided for them; he had presents for their principal officers, of horses, arms, and jackets; to these he added some money, which was to be distributed amongst a small number: he imagined he should gain the multitude by this bait. The king halted near the river Axius, where he encamped with his troops. He deputed Antigonus, one of the Macedonian lords, to the Gauls, who were about thirty leagues distant from him. Antigonus was astonished when he saw men of prodigious stature, skilful in all the exercises of the body, and in handling their arms; and haughty and audacious in their language, which abounded with menaces and bravadoes. He set off, in the best terms, the orders his master had given for their good reception wherever they passed, and the presents he had prepared for them: after which he invited them to advance to a certain place he mentioned, and to send their principal officers to the king. The Gauls were not a people to be put off with words. Clondicus, the general and king of these strangers, came directly to the point; and asked, whether he had brought the sum agreed on. As no answer was given to that question, "Go," said he, "and let your prince know, that till he sends the hostages and sums agreed on, the Gauls will not stir from hence." The king, upon the return of his deputy, assembled his council. He foresaw what they would advise; but, as he was a much better guardian of his money than of his kingdom, to disguise his avarice, he expatiated upon the perfidy and ferocity of the Gauls; adding, that it would be dangerous to give such numbers of them entrance into Macedonia, from which every thing was to be feared, and that 5000 horse would be sufficient for him. Every body perceived that his sole apprehension was for his money; but nobody dared to contradict him. Antigonus returned to the Gauls, and told them his master had occasion for no more than 5000 horse. Upon which they raised a universal cry and murmur against Perseus, who made them come so far merely to insult them. Clondicus having asked Antigonus again, whether he had brought the money for the 5000 horse: as the deputy sought for an evasion, and gave no direct answers, the Gauls grew furious, and were just going to cut him in pieces, and he himself was under terrible apprehensions. However, they paid respect to his quality of deputy, and dismissed him without any ill treatment of his person. The Gauls marched away immediately, resumed their route to the Danube and plundered Thrace in their way home.

Perseus, with so considerable a reinforcement, might have given the Romans great trouble. He could have detached those Gauls into Thessaly, where they might have plundered the country, and taken the strongest places. By that means, remaining quiet about the river Enipeus, he might have put it out of the power of the Romans either to have penetrtrated into Macedonia, of which he might have barred the entrance with his troops, or to have subsisted any longer in the country, because they could have drawn no provisions as before from Thessaly, which would have been entirely laid waste. The avarice by which he was governed, prevented his making any use of so great an advantage.

The same vice made him lose another of the same nature. Urged by the condition of his affairs, and the extreme danger that threatened him, he had at length consented to give Gentius the 300 talents, which he had demanded for more than a year, for raising troops and fitting out a fleet. Pantauchus had negotiated this treaty for the king of Macedonia, and had begun by paying the king of Illyria 10 talents (10,000 crowns) in part of the sum promised him. Gentius despatched his ambassadors, and with them persons in whom he could confide, to receive the money. He directed them also, when all should be concluded, to join Perseus's ambassadors, and to go with them to Rhodes, in order to induce that republic to form an alliance with them. Pantauchus had represented to him, that if the Rhodians came into it, Rome would not be able to make head against the three powers united. Perseus received those ambassadors with all possible marks of distinction. After the interchange of hostages, and the taking of oaths on both sides, it only remained to deliver the 300 talents. The ambassadors and agents of the Illyrian repaired to Pella, where the money was told down to them, and put into chests, under the seal of the ambassadors, to be conveyed into Illyria. Perseus had covertly given orders to the persons charged with this convoy, to march slowly, and by short journeys, and when they arrived upon the frontiers of Macedonia to stop for his farther orders. During all this time, Pantauchus, who had remained at the court of Illyria, pressed the king with great earnestness to declare against the Romans by some act of hostility. In the mean while arrived ambassadors from the Romans, to negotiate an alliance with Gentius. He had already received ten talents by way of earnest, and was informed that the whole sum was upon the road. Upon the repeated solicitations of Pantauchus, in violation of all rights human and divine, he caused the two ambassadors to be imprisoned, under the pretence that they were spies. As soon as Perseus had received this news, believing him sufficiently and irretrievably engaged against the Romans by so glaring an act, he recalled those who carried the 300 talents; congratulating himself in secret upon the good success of his perfidy, and his great dexterity in saving his money. But he did not see that he only kept it in reserve for the victor; whereas he ought to have employed it in defending himself against him, and to conquer him, according to the maxim of Philip and his son Alexander, the most illustrious of his predecessors, who used to say, "That victory should be purchased with money, and not money saved at the expense of victory."

The ambassadors of Perseus and Gentius met with a favourable reception at Rhodes. A decree was imparted to them, by which the republic had resolved to employ all their credit and power to oblige the two parties to make peace, and to declare against that which should refuse to accept proposals for an accommodation.

The Roman generals had each of them repaired to their posts in the beginning of the spring; the consul to Macedonia, Octavius to Oreum with the fleet, and Anicius into Illyria.

The success of the latter was as rapid as fortunate. He was to carry on the war against Gentius, and put an end to it before it was known at Rome that it was begun. Its duration was only thirty days. Having treated Scorda, the capital of the country, which had surrendered to him, with great moderation, the other cities soon followed its example. Gentius himself was reduced to come and throw himself at Anicius's feet to implore his mercy; confessing with tears in his eyes, his fault, or rather folly, in having abandoned the party of the Romans. The prætor treated him with humanity. His first care was to take the two ambassadors out of prison. He sent one of them, named Perpenna, to Rome, to carry the news of his victory, and some days after caused Gentius to be conducted thither, with his mother, wife, children, brother, and the principal lords of the country. The sight of such illustrious prisoners very much augmented the people's joy. Public thanksgivings were made to the gods, and the temples were crowded with a vast concourse of persons of all sexes and ages.

When Paulus Æmilius approached the enemy, he found Perseus encamped near the sea, at the foot of mount Olympus, in places which seemed inaccessible. He had the Enipeus in front, whose banks were very high; and on the side where he lay, he had thrown up strong entrenchments with towers at proper distances, on which were placed balistæ, and other machines for discharging darts and stones upon the enemy, if they ventured to approach. Perseus had fortified himself in such a manner, as made him believe himself entirely secure, and gave him hopes of weakening, and at last repulsing, Paulus Æmilius by length of time, and the difficulties he would find in subsisting his troops and maintaining his ground, in a country already eaten up by the enemy.

He did not know what kind of adversary he had to cope with. Paulus Æmilius employed his thoughts solely in preparing every thing for action, and was continually meditating expedients and measures for executing some enterprize with success. He began by establishing an exact and severe discipline in his army, which he found corrupted by the licentiousness in which it had been suffered to live. He reformed several things, as well with regard to the arms of the troops, as the duty of sentinels. It had been a custom amongst the soldiers to criticise their general, to examine all his actions amongst themselves, to prescribe his duties, and to point out what he ought, or ought not, to do. He spoke to them with resolution and dignity. He gave them to understand that such discourses did not become a soldier; that he ought to make only three things his business: the care of his body, in order to render it robust and active; that of his arms, to keep them always clean and in good condition; and that of his provisions, that he might be always in readiness to march upon the first notice that for the rest, he ought to rely upon the goodness of the immortal gods, and the vigilance of his general. That for himself, he should omit nothing that might be necessary, to give them occasion to evince their valour; and that they had only to take care to do their duty well when the signal was given them.

It is incredible how much they were animated by this discourse. The old soldiers declared that they had never known their duty aright till that day. A surprising change was immediately observed in the camp. Nobody was idle in it. The soldiers were seen sharpening their swords, polishing their helmets, cuirasses, and shields; practising an active motion under their arms; whirling their javelins, and brandishing their naked swords; in short, forming and inuring themselves to all military exercises: so that it was easy to foresee that, upon the first opportunity they should have of coming to blows with the enemy, they were determined to conquer or die.

The camp was situated very commodiously, but wanted water, which was a great inconvenience to the army. Paulus Æmilius, whose thoughts extended to every thing, seeing mount Olympus before him very high, and covered all over with trees extremely green and flourishing, judged, from the quantity and quality of those trees, that there must be springs of water in the caverns of the mountain, and at the same time ordered openings to be made at the foot of it, and pits to be dug in the sand. The surface² was scarce broken up, when springs of water were seen to run, muddy at first, and in small quantities, but in a little while very clear, and in great abundance. This event, though natural, was looked upon by the soldiers as a singular favour of the gods, who had taken Paulus Æmilius under their protection; and made him more beloved and respected by them than before.

When Perseus saw what passed in the Roman camp,—the ardour of the soldiers, their active behaviour, and the various exercises by which they prepared themselves for combat,—he began to be truly disquieted, and perceived plainly that he had no longer to deal with a Licinius, an Hostilius, or a Marcius; and that the Roman army was entirely changed, together with the general. He redoubled his attention and application on his side, animated his soldiers, employed himself in forming them by different exercises, added new fortifications to the old, and used all means to secure his camp from danger or insult.

In the mean time came the news of the victory in Illyria, and of the taking of the king with all his family. This caused incredible joy in the Roman army, and excited amongst the soldiers an inexpressible ardour to signalize themselves also on their side. For it is common, when two armies act in different parts, for the one to be unwilling to give place to the other, either in valour or glory. Perseus endeavoured at first to suppress this news, but his care to stifle it only served to make it more public and certain. The alarm was general amongst his troops, and made them apprehensive of the same fate.

At this time arrived the Rhodian ambassadors, who came to make the same proposals to the army in regard to peace, that at Rome had so highly offended the senate. It is easy to judge in what manner they were received in the camp. Some, in the height of their anger, were for having them dismissed with insult. The consul thought the best way to express his contempt for them, was to reply coldly, that he would give them an answer in fifteen days. To show how little he valued the pacific mediation of the Rhodians, he assembled his council to deliberate upon the means of entering upon action. It is probable that the Roman army, which the year before penetrated into Macedonia, had quitted it, and returned into Thessaly; perhaps upon account of provisions; for at present they consulted upon measures for opening a passage into Macedonia. Some, and those the oldest officers, were for attempting to force the enemy's intrenchments upon the bank of the Enipeus. They observed that the Macedonians, who the year before had been driven from higher and better fortified places, could not sustain the charge of the Roman legions. Others were of opinion that Octavius, with the fleet, should go to Thessalonica, and ravage the sea-coasts, in order to oblige the king, by that diversion, to detach part of his troops from the Enipeus for the defence of his country, and thereby leave the passage open. It is highly important for an able and experienced general to have it in his power to choose what measures he pleases. Paulus Æmilius had quite different views. He saw that the Enipeus, as well from its natural situation as from the fortifications which had been added to it, was inaccessible. He knew besides, without mentioning the machines disposed on all sides, that the enemy's troops were much more expert than his own in discharging javelins and darts. To undertake the forcing of such impenetrable lines as those were, had been to expose his troops to inevitable slaughter; and a good general spares the blood of his soldiers, because he looks upon himself as their father, and believes it his duty to preserve them as his children. He kept quiet, therefore, for some days, without making the least movement. Plutarch says, that it was believed there never was an example of two armies so numerous, that lay so long in the presence of each other, in such profound peace and so perfect a tranquillity. At any other time the soldiers would have murmured through ardour and impatience; but Paulus Æmilius had taught them to acquiesce in the conduct of their leader.

At length, after diligent inquiry, and using all means for information, he was told by two Perrhæbian merchants, whose prudence and fidelity he had experienced, that there was a way through Perrhæbia, which led to Pythium, a town situated upon the brow of mount Olympus: that this way was not of difficult access, but was well guarded. Perseus had sent thither a detachment of 5000 men. He conceived that in causing an attack to be made in the night and at unawares, by good troops, the enemy might be beaten from this post, and he take possession of it. It was necessary therefore to amuse the enemy, and to conceal his real design. He sent for the prætor Octavius, and having imparted his plan to him, he ordered him to go with his fleet to Heraclea, and to take ten days' provisions with him for 1000 men; in order to make Perseus believe that he was going to ravage the sea-coast. At the same time he made his son Fabius Maximus, then very young, with Scipio Nasica, the son-in-law of Scipio Africanus, set out: he gave them a detachment of 5000 chosen troops, and ordered them to march by the sea-side towards Heraclea, as if they were to embark there, according to what had been proposed in the council. When they arrived there, the prætor told them the consul's orders. As soon as it was night, quitting their route by the coast, they advanced without halting towards Pythium, over the mountains and rocks, conducted by the two Perrhæbian guides. It had been concluded that they should arrive there the third day before it was light.

In the mean time Paulus Æmilius, to amuse the enemy, and prevent his having any other thoughts, the next day in the morning detached his light-armed troops, as if he intended to attack the Macedonians. They came to a slight engagement in the very channel of the river, which was then very low. The banks on each side, from the top to the bed of the river, had a declivity of 300 paces, and the stream was 1000 paces broad. The action passed in the sight of the king and consul, who were each with his troops in the front of their camps. The consul caused the retreat to be sounded towards noon. The loss was almost equal on both sides. The next day the battle was renewed in the same manner, and almost at the same hour; but it was warmer and continued longer. The Romans had not only those upon their hands with whom they fought; but the enemy, from the tops of the towers placed along the banks, poured volleys of darts and stones upon them. The consul lost many more of his people this day, and made them retire late. The third day Paulus Æmilius lay still, and seemed to design to attempt a passage near the sea. Perseus did not suspect in the least the danger that threatened him.

Scipio had arrived in the night of the third day near Pythium. His troops were very much fatigued, for which reason he made them rest themselves the remainder of the night. Perseus in the mean time was very quiet. But on a sudden a Cretan deserter, who had gone off from Scipio's troops, roused him from his security, by letting him know the compass the Romans had taken to surprise him. The king, terrified with the news, detached immediately 10,000 foreign soldiers, with 2000 Macedonians, under the command of Milo, and ordered them with all possible diligence to take possession of an eminence, which the Romans had still to pass before they arrived at Pythium. He accordingly got thither before them. A very severe engagement ensued upon this eminence, and the victory was for some time in suspense. But the king's detachment at length gave way on all sides, and were put to the rout. Scipio pursued them vigorously, and led his victorious troops into the plain.

When those who fled came to the camp of Perseus, they occasioned so great a terror in it, that he immediately decamped, and retired by his rear, overwhelmed with terror and almost in despair. He held a great council in order to deliberate upon the measures he was to pursue. The question was, whether it was best to halt under the walls of Pydna, to try the chance of a battle, or to divide his troops among his towns, supply them well with provisions, and expect the enemy there, who could not long subsist in a country, which he would take care to lay waste, and which could furnish neither forage for the horse, nor provisions for the men. The latter resolution was attended with great inconveniences, and betokened a prince reduced to the last extremity, and destitute of either hope or resource; not to mention the hatred he would draw upon himself by ruining the country, which was to be not only commanded but executed in person by the king himself. Whilst Perseus, uncertain what to resolve, fluctuated in doubt, the principal officers represented to him, that his army was much superior to that of the Romans; that his troops were determined to behave well, having their wives and children to defend; that being himself witness of all their actions, and fighting at their head, they would behave with double ardour, and give proofs of their valour in emulation of each other. These reasons reanimated the prince. He retired under the walls of Pydna, where he encamped, and prepared for a battle. He forgot nothing that might conduce to the advantage of his ground, assigned every one his post, and gave all his orders with great presence of mind; resolved to attack the Romans as soon as they appeared.

The place where he encamped was a bare level country, very fit for drawing up a great body of heavy-armed foot in battle. Upon the right and left there was a ridge of little hills, which joining together, gave the light-armed foot and the archers a secure retreat, and also afforded them the means of concealing their march to surround the enemy, and to charge them in flank. The whole front of the army was covered by two small rivers, which had not much water at that time, in consequence of the season (for it was then about the end of summer,) but whose steep banks would give the Romans great trouble, and break their ranks.

Paulus Æmilius being arrived at Pythium, and having joined Scipio's detachment, marched down into the plain, and advanced in order of battle against the enemy; keeping always on the sea-coast, for the convenience of having provisions brought in barks from the Roman fleet. But when he came in view of the Macedonians, and had considered the good disposition of their army, and the number of their troops, he halted, to deliberate upon what he had to do.

The young officers, full of ardour and impatience for the battle, advanced at the head of the troops, and came to him to entreat him to give battle without any delay. Scipio, whose boldness was increased by his late success upon mount Olympus, distinguished himself above all the rest by his earnestness, and the urgency of his request. He represented to him that the generals, his predecessors, had suffered the enemy to escape out of their hands by delays. That he was afraid Perseus would fly in the night, and they should be obliged to pursue him, with great danger and difficulty, to the remotest parts of his kingdom, in making the army take great compasses through defiles and forests, as had happened in the preceding years. He advised him, therefore, whilst the enemy were in the open field, to attack him immediately, and not to let slip so fair occasion of conquering him.

"Formerly," replied the consul to young Scipio, "I thought as you do now, and one day you will think as I do. I shall give you the reasons of my conduct another time; at present, rely upon the discretion of an old general." The young officer was silent, well convinced that the consul had good reasons for acting as he did.

After having spoken thus, he commanded the troops who were at the head of the army, in view of the enemy, to draw up in order of battle, and to present a front, as if they intended to engage. They were disposed, according to the custom of the Romans, in three lines: at the same time the pioneers, covered by those lines, were employed in forming a camp. As there were a great number, the work was soon completed. The consul then made the battalions file off gradually, beginning with the rear, which was nearest the workmen, and drew off the whole army into the intrenchments, without confusion, disorder, or being perceived by the enemy. The king, on his side, seeing the Romans declined fighting, retired also into his camp.

It was an inviolable law amongst the Romans, though they were to stay only one day or night in a place, to enclose themselves in a well-fortified camp: by that means they placed themselves out of the reach of insult, and avoided all surprise. The soldiers looked upon this military abode as their city; the intrenchments served instead of walls, and the tents, of houses. In case of a battle, if the army was over-come, the camp served for their retreat and refuge; and, if victorious, they found it a place of quiet and security.

The night being come, and the troops having taken their refreshment; whilst they had no other thoughts than of going to rest, on a sudden the moon, which was then at full, and already very high, began to grow dark; and the light failed by little and little, it changed its colour several times, and was at length totally eclipsed. A tribune, called C. Sulpitius Gallus, one of the principal officers of the army, having assembled the soldiers the day before, with the consul's permission, had apprized them of the eclipse, and pointed out to them the exact moment when it would begin, and how long it would continue. The Roman soldiers therefore were not astonished at this accident; they only believed that Sulpitius had more than human knowledge. But the whole camp of the Macedonians were seized with horror and dread; and it was whispered throughout all the army, that this prodigy foretold the ruin of the king.

The next day Paulus Æmilius, who was a very religious observer of all the ceremonies prescribed for the sacrifices, or rather very superstitious, employed himself in offering oxen to Hercules. He sacrificed twenty, one after another, without finding any favourable sign in the entrails of those victims. At length, at the one-and-twentieth, he imagined he saw such as promised him the victory, if he only defended himself, without attacking the enemy. At the same time he vowed a sacrifice to the same god of 100 oxen, with public games. Having made an end of all these religious ceremonies, about nine in the morning he assembled his council. He had heard complaints of his slowness in attacking the enemy. He was anxious therefore to give this assembly an account of his conduct, especially out of regard for Scipio, to whom he had promised it. The reasons for his not having given battle the day before, were, first, because the enemy's army was much superior in number to his own, which he had been obliged to weaken considerably by the great detachment requisite to guard the baggage. In the second place, would it have been consistent with prudence to engage troops entirely fresh, with his, exhausted as they were by a long and painful march, by the excessive weight of their arms, by the heat of the sun, with which they had been almost broiled, and by thirst, which gave them almost insupportable pain? In the last place, he insisted strongly on the indispensable necessity a good general was under not to fight till he had a well intrenched camp behind him, which might, in case of accident, serve the army for a retreat. He concluded his discourse with bidding them prepare for battle the same day.

We see here, that there is a wide difference between the duty of soldiers and subaltern officers, and that of a general; the former have only to desire to engage, and behave well in battle; but the general's business is to foresee, weigh, and compare every thing, in order to choose his measures with mature deliberation; and frequently by a wise delay of some days, or even hours, he preserves an army, which an inconsiderate precipitation might have exposed to ruin.

Though the resolution for fighting had been taken on both sides, it was, however, rather a kind of chance that drew on the battle, than the order of the generals, who were not in great haste on either side. Some Thracian soldiers charged a party of Romans in their return from foraging. Seven hundred Ligurians ran to assist those foragers. The Macedonians caused troops to advance, to support the Thracians; and the reinforcements on both sides continually increasing, the battle at length became general.

It is a misfortune that we have lost the passage of Polybius, and after him of Livy, which describes the order of this battle; this puts it out of my power to give a just idea of it, what Plutarch says being quite different from the little which remains of it in Livy.

In the beginning of the charge, the Macedonian phalanx distinguished themselves from all the king's troops in a particular manner. Upon which Paulus Æmilius advanced to the front ranks, and found that the Macedonians, who formed the head of the phalanx, drove the points of their pikes into the shields of his soldiers in such a manner, that the latter, in spite of all their efforts, were unable to reach them with their swords; and he saw, at the same time, that the whole front line of the enemy joined their bucklers, and presented their pikes. This rampart of brass and forest of pikes, impenetrable to his legions, filled him with astonishment and terror. He often spoke afterwards of the impression that dreadful sight made upon him, so strong as to make him doubt the success of the battle. But not to discourage his troops, he concealed from them his anxiety; and appearing with a gay and serene countenance, rode through all the ranks without helmet or cuirass, animating them with his expressions, and much more by his example. The general, more than sixty years of age, was seen exposing himself to danger and fatigue like a young officer.

The Pelignians, a people of Italy, who had attacked the Macedonian phalanx, not being able to break it with their utmost endeavours, one of their officers took the standard of his company, and tossed it into the midst of the enemy. The rest threw themselves, in consequence, like desperate men, upon that battalion. Astonishing actions of valour ensued on both sides, with a most dreadful slaughter. The Pelignians endeavoured to cut the pikes of the Macedonians with their swords, or to push them back with their bucklers; striving sometimes to pull them out of their hands, or to turn them aside in order to open themselves an entrance between them. But the Macedonians always keeping close order, and holding their pikes in both hands, presented that iron rampart, and gave such violent strokes to those that rushed upon them, that, piercing shields and cuirasses, they laid the boldest of the Pelignians dead, who, without any caution, continued to throw themselves headlong, like wild beasts, upon the spears of their enemies, and to rush upon a death they saw before their eyes.

The whole front line being thus put into disorder, the second was discouraged, and began to fall back. They did not indeed fly; but, instead of advancing, they retreated toward mount Olocris.^{*} When Paulus Æmilius saw that, he tore his clothes, and was struck with extreme sorrow to see, upon the first troops having given way, that the Romans were afraid to face the phalanx. It presented a front covered thick with pikes, and close as an impenetrable intrenchment; and continuing invincible, it could neither be broken nor opened. But at length the inequality of the ground, and the great extent of the front of battle, not admitting the enemy to continue every where that line of bucklers and pikes, Paulus Æmilius observed that the Macedonian phalanx was the day was employed in the pursuit, which was carried very far; so that the troops did not return till late in the night. All the servants in the army went out to meet their masters with great shouts of joy, as must necessarily happen in great armies, when the troops, not always acting with the same vigour, fight also with different success.

Paulus Æmilius, as an able general, who knew how to improve all advantages, dividing his troops into platoons, gave orders for them to fall into the void spaces of the enemy's line, and to attack them no longer in front by a general charge, but by small detachments, and in different places at the same time. This order, so critically given, occasioned the gaining of the battle. The Romans immediately fell into the void spaces, and thereby put it out of the enemy's power to use their long pikes, charging them in flank and rear, where they were uncovered. The phalanx was broken in an instant; and all its force, which consisted solely in its union and the weight of the whole body together, vanished and disappeared. When they came to fight man to man, or platoon to platoon, the Macedonians with their short swords struck upon the Roman shields, which were very strong and solid, and covered them almost from head to foot; and on the contrary, they opposed only small bucklers against the swords of the Romans, which were heavy and strong, and handled with such force and vigour, that they scarce discharged a blow which did not either cut deep, or make shields and armour fly in pieces, and draw blood. The phalanx having lost their advantage, and being taken upon their weak side, stood their ground with great difficulty, and were at length overthrown.

The king of Macedonia, abandoning himself to his fear, rode off full speed in the beginning of the battle, and returned into the city of Pydna, under pretence of going to offer a sacrifice to Hercules; as if, says Plutarch, Hercules were a god that would receive the sacrifices of abject cowards, or give ear to unjust vows; for it is not just, that he should be victorious, who durst not face his enemy: whereas the same god received the prayer of Paulus Æmilius, because he asked victory with sword in hand, and invoked his aid while he fought valiantly.

It was in the attack of the phalanx where the battle was warmest, and where the Romans found the greatest resistance. It was there also, that the son of Cato, Paulus Æmilius's son-in-law, after having done prodigies of valour, unhappily lost his sword which slipped out of his hand. Upon this accident, quite distracted and inconsolable, he ran through the ranks, and assembling a body of brave and resolute young soldiers, he rushed headlong and furious upon the Macedonians. After extraordinary efforts, and a most bloody slaughter, they made the latter give way; and remaining masters of the ground, they proceeded to search for the sword, which they found at last with great difficulty under heaps of arms and dead bodies. Transported with that good fortune, and raising shouts of victory, they fell with new ardour upon such of the enemy as yet stood firm; so that at length the 3000 Macedonians who remained, and were a distinct body from the phalanx, were entirely cut to pieces; not a man of them quitting his rank, or ceasing to fight to the last moment of his life.

After the defeat of this body, all the rest fled; and so great a number of them were killed, that the whole plain, to the foot of the mountain, was covered with the dead; and the next day, when the Romans passed the river Leucus, they found the waters still stained with blood. It is said that upwards of 25,000 men on the side of the Macedonians perished in this battle. The Romans lost only 100, and made 11 or 12,000 prisoners. The cavalry, which had no share in this battle, seeing the foot put to the rout, had retired; and the Romans, whose fury was principally directed against the phalanx, did not think at that time of pursuing them.

This great battle was decided so suddenly, that the charge, which began at three in the afternoon, was followed by the victory before four. The rest of the day was employed in the pursuit, which was carried very far; so that the troops did not return till late in the night. All the servants in the army went out to meet their masters with great shouts of joy, and conducted them with torches to the camp, where they had made illuminations, and covered the tents with wreaths of ivy and crowns of laurel.¹

But in the midst of this great victory, the general was in extreme affliction. Of the two sons he had in the battle, the youngest, who was but seventeen years old, and whom he loved with most tenderness, because he had already given great hopes of himself, did not appear. The camp was in a universal alarm, and the cries of joy were changed into a mournful silence. They searched for him with torches amongst the dead, but to no purpose. At length, when the night was very far advanced, and they despaired of ever seeing him more, he returned from the pursuit, attended by only two or three of his comrades, all covered with the blood of the enemy. Paulus Æmilius thought he had recovered him from the dead, and did not begin to taste the joy of his victory till that moment. He was reserved for other tears, and losses no less to be deplored. The young Roman, of whom we speak, was the second Scipio, who was afterwards called Africanus, and Numantinus, from having destroyed Carthage and Numantia. He was adopted by the son of Scipio, the conqueror of Hannibal. The consul immediately despatched three couriers of distinction (of whom his son Fabius was one) to carry the news of this victory to Rome.

In the mean time, Perseus, continuing his flight, had passed the city of Pydna, and endeavoured to gain Pella, with all his cavalry, which had escaped from the battle without striking a blow. The foot soldiers that fled in disorder, meeting them upon the road, reproached them in the sharpest terms, calling them cowards and traitors; and carrying their resentment farther, they pulled them off their horses, and wounded a great number of them. The king, who dreaded the consequence of that tumult, quitted the high road, and that he might not be known, folded up his royal mantle, put it behind him, took the diadem from his head, and carried it in his hand; and, in order to discourse with his friends with the more ease, he alighted and led his horse in his hand. Several of those who attended him took different routes from his, under various pretexts; less to avoid the pursuit of the enemy, than to shun the fury of their prince, whose defeat had only served to irritate and inflame his natural ferocity. Of all his courtiers, three only remained with him, and those all foreigners. Evander of Crete, whom he had employed to assassinate king Eumenes, was one of them. He retained his fidelity for him to the last.

When he arrived about midnight in Pella, he stabbed two of his treasurers with his own hands, for being so bold as to represent to him the faults he had committed, and with ill-timed freedom to give him their advice upon what was necessary to be done for the retrieving his affairs. This cruel treatment of two of the principal officers of his court, who had failed only out of an imprudent and ill-timed zeal, entirely lost him the affection of every one. Alarmed by the almost universal desertion of his officers and courtiers, he did not think himself safe at Pella, and left it the same night to go to Amphipolis, carrying along with him the greatest part of his treasures. When he arrived there, he sent deputies to Paulus Æmilius, to implore his mercy. From Amphipolis he went into the island of Samothracia, and took refuge in the temple of Castor and Pollux. All the cities of Macedonia opened their gates to the victor, and made their submission.

The consul having quitted Pydna, arrived the next day at Pella, the happy situation of which he admired. The king's treasures had been kept in this city; but only the 300 talents he had sent to Gentius, king of Thrace, and afterwards caused to be brought back, were found there. Paulus Æmilius having been informed that Perseus was in Samothracia, repaired to Amphipolis, in order to pass from thence into that island.

He was encamped at Siræ,² in the country of the Odomantes,³ when he received a letter from Perseus, which was presented to him by three deputies of in considerable birth and condition. He could not for bear shedding tears when he reflected upon the uncertainty of human affairs, of which the present condition of Perseus was a sensible example. But when he saw this title and inscription upon the letter, "Perseus the king, to the consul Paulus Æmilius, greetings;" the stupid ignorance of his condition in which that prince seemed to be, extinguished in him all sense of compassion; and though the tenor of the letter was couched in an humble and suppliant style, and little consistent with the royal dignity, he dismissed the deputies without an answer. How haughty were these proud republicans, to degrade an unfortunate king immediately in this manner! Perseus perceived what name he was henceforth to forget. He wrote a second letter, to which he only put his name, without the addition of his quality. He demanded, that commissioners should be sent to treat with him, which was granted. This negotiation had no effect, because, on the one side, Perseus would not renounce the royal dignity, and Paulus Æmilius, on the other, insisted, that he should submit his fate entirely to the determination of the Roman people.

During this time the prætor Octavius, who commanded the fleet, arrived at Samothracia. He did not take Perseus by force out of that asylum, through respect to the gods who presided in it; but he endeavoured by promises and threats to induce him to quit it, and surrender himself to the Romans. His endeavours were ineffectual.

A young Roman, (named Acilius,) either of his own accord, or in concert with the prætor, took another course to draw the king out of his sanctuary. Having entered the assembly of the Samothracians, which was then held, he said to them: "Is it a truth, or is it without any foundation, that your island is held a sacred and inviolable asylum throughout all its extent?" Upon being answered, by all present, that it was undoubtedly so; "How then, (continued he) do you suffer its sanctity to be violated by a homicide, contaminated with the blood of king Eumenes? And as all religious ceremonies begin by the exclusion of those whose hands are impure, how can you suffer your temple to be profaned and defiled by the presence of an infamous murderer?" This accusation was directed against Perseus; but the Samothracians chose rather to apply it to Evander, whom all the world knew to have been the agent in the intended assassination of Eumenes. They sent therefore to tell the king, that Evander was accused of assassination, and that he must appear, according to the custom of their sanctuary, to justify himself before the judges; or, if he was afraid to do that, that he should take measures for his safety, and quit the temple. The king, having sent for Evander, advised him in the strongest terms not to submit to that trial. He had his reasons for giving this advice, apprehending he would declare, that the assassination had been undertaken by his order. He therefore gave him to understand, that the only method he could take was to kill himself. Evander seemed at first to consent to it, and professing that he had rather die by poison than the sword, he intended to make his escape by flight. The king was aware of that design, and fearing the Samothracians would let the weight of their resentment fall on him, as having withdrawn the offence from the punishment he deserved, he ordered him to be killed. This was polluting the sanctuary with a new crime; but he corrupted the principal magistrate with presents of money, who declared in the assembly, that Evander had laid violent hands upon himself.

The prætor not being able to persuade Perseus to quit his asylum, could do no more than deprive him of all means to embark and make his escape. How ever, notwithstanding his precautions, Perseus gained secretly a certain Cretan, called Oroandes, who had a merchant ship, and prevailed upon him to receive him on board with all his treasures: they amounted to 2000 talents, that is, about 300,000*l*. But, from his extreme suspicion, he did not dispossess himself of the whole; he sent only a part of it to the ship, and reserved the rest of it to be carried on board with himself. The Cretan, following the genius of his country upon this occasion, shipped all the gold and silver that had been sent him in the evening, and let Perseus know, that he had only to come to the port at midnight with his children, and such of his people as were absolutely necessary to attend his person.

The appointed time approaching, Perseus, with infinite difficulty, crept through a very narrow window, crossed a garden, and got out through a ruinous house, with his wife and son. The remainder of his treasures followed him. His grief and despair were inexpressible, when he was informed that Oroandes, with his rich freight, was under sail. He was therefore compelled to return to his asylum with his wife and Philip his eldest son. He had trusted his other children to Ion of Thessalonica, who had been his favourite, and who betrayed him in his misfortunes; for he delivered up his children to Octavius; which was the principal cause that induced Perseus to put himself into the power of those who had his children in their hands.

He accordingly surrendered himself and Philip his son to the praetor Octavius, who made him embark, in order to his being carried to the consul; having first apprized him of his coming. Paulus Æmilius sent his son-in-law Tubero to meet him. Perseus, in a mourning habit, entered the camp, attended only by his son. The consul, who waited for him with a sufficiently numerous train, seeing him approach, rose from his seat, and advancing some few steps, offered him his hand. Perseus threw himself at his feet; but he raised him immediately, and would not suffer him to embrace his knees. Having introduced him into his tent, he made him sit down, facing those who formed the assembly.

He began by asking him, "What cause of discontent had induced him to enter with so much animosity into a war with the Roman people, that exposed himself and his kingdom to the greatest dangers?" As, instead of the answer which every body expected, the king, fixing his eyes upon the ground, and shedding tears, kept silence, Paulus Æmilius continued to this effect: "Had you ascended the throne a youth, I should be less surprised at your being ignorant of what it was to have the Roman people for your friends or enemies. But having been present in the war made by your father against us, and certainly remembering the peace, which we have punctually observed on our side, how could you prefer war, rather than peace, with a people, whose force in the former, and fidelity in the latter, you had so well experienced?" Perseus making no more answer to this reproach than he had done to the first question: "In whatsoever manner, notwithstanding, (resumed the consul,) these affairs have happened, whether they are the effects of error, to which all mankind are liable, or of chance, or of that fatal destiny which superintends all things, take courage. The clemency with which the Roman people have behaved towards many other kings and nations, ought to inspire you. I do not say with some hope only, but with almost entire confidence, that you will meet with the same treatment." He spoke this in Greek to Perseus: then turning towards the Romans, "You see (said he in his own language) a great example of the inconstancy of human affairs. It is to you principally, young Romans, I address this discourse. The uncertainty of what may happen to us every day, ought to teach us never to treat any one with insolence and cruelty in our prosperity, nor rely too much upon our present advantages. The proof of real merit and true valour is neither to be too elate in good, nor too dejected in bad fortune." Paulus Æmilius having dismissed the assembly, charged Tubero with the care of the king. He invited him that day to his table, and ordered him to be treated with all the honours his present condition would admit.

The army went afterwards into winter quarters. Amphipolis received the greatest part of the troops; the rest were distributed into the neighbouring cities. Thus ended the war between the Romans and Perseus, which had continued four years; and with it a kingdom so illustrious both in Europe and Asia. Perseus had reigned eleven years.² He was reckoned the fortieth king from Caranus,³ who was the first that reigned in Macedonia. So important a conquest cost Paulus Æmilius only fifteen days.

The kingdom of Macedonia had been very obscure till the time of Philip, son of Amyntas. Under that prince, and by his great exploits, it made considerable acquisitions, which did not extend, however, beyond the bounds of Europe; he annexed to it a part of Thrace and Illyria, and acquired a kind of empire over all Greece. It afterwards extended into Asia; and in the thirteen years of the reign of Alexander, subjected all the provinces, of which the vast empire of the Persians was composed, and carried its victorious arms to the extremities of the earth; I mean to Arabia on one side, and the Indies on the other. This empire of Macedonia, the greatest in the world, divided, or rather torn into different kingdoms after the death of Alexander, by his successors, who each took part to himself, subsisted during something more than 150 years: from the exalted height to which the victorious arms of that prince had raised it, to the entire ruin of Macedonia. Such was the period of the so-much-boasted exploits of that famous conqueror, the terror and admiration of the universe; or, to speak more justly, the example of the most vain and most frantic ambition the world ever knew.

The three deputies whom Paulus Æmilius had sent to Rome, to carry thither the news of his victory over Perseus, used all possible diligence on their journey. But long before their arrival, and only the fourth day after the battle, whilst the games were celebrating in the Circus, it was whispered about, that a battle had been fought in Macedonia, and Perseus entirely defeated. This news was attended with clapping of hands and cries of victory throughout the whole Circus. But when the magistrates, after a strict inquiry, had discovered that it was a rumour without either author or foundation, that false and short-lived joy ceased, and left only a secret hope, that it was perhaps the presage of a victory, which either was already or would soon be obtained.

The arrival of the deputies put Rome out of pain. They were informed, that Perseus had been entirely defeated; that he was flying, and could not escape falling into the hands of the victor. The people's joy, which had been suspended till then, broke out immoderately. The deputies read a circumstantial narrative of the battle, first in the senate, and afterwards in the assembly of the people. Public prayers and sacrifices were decreed, and all the temples filled in an instant with infinite crowds of people, of every age and sex, who went thither to return thanks to the gods for the signal protection which they had vouchsafed to the republic.

lar, that the Macedonians and Illyrians should be declared free, in order that all nations might know, that the end of the Roman arms was not to subject free people, but to deliver such as were enslaved; so that the one, under the protection of the Roman name, might always retain their liberty, and the other, who were under the rule of kings, might be treated with more lenity and justice by them through consideration for the Romans, or that, whenever war should arise between those kings and the Roman people, the nations might know that the issue of those wars would be victory for the Romans and liberty for them. The senate also abolished certain duties upon the mines and landed estates, because those duties could not be collected but by the intervention of farmers of the taxes, commonly called publicans; and that wherever such sort of farmers are suffered, the laws are of no force, and the people are always oppressed. They established a general council for the nation, lest the populace should cause the liberty granted them by the senate to degenerate into a destructive licentiousness. Macedonia was divided into four regions, each of which was to have a distinct council, and to pay the Romans one moiety of the tributes which they had been accustomed to pay their kings. These were in part the orders with which the commissioners of Macedonia were charged. Those for Illyria had almost the same instructions, and arrived there first. After having communicated their commission to the pro-pætor Anicius, who came to Scodra to meet them, they summoned an assembly of the principal persons of the nation. Anicius having ascended his tribunal, declared to them, that the senate and people of Rome granted liberty to the Illyrians, and that the garrison should be withdrawn from all the cities and forts of the country as soon as possible. As to some nations, who either before or during the war had declared for the Romans, an exemption from all taxes was added to their liberty; and all the rest were exonerated from one half of the imposts formerly paid to the king. Illyria was divided into three regions or parts, which had each of them their public council and magistrates.

Before the deputies for Macedonia arrived there, Paulus Æmilius, who was at leisure, visited, during the autumn, the most celebrated cities of Greece, to see those things with his own eyes which all the world talked of, without knowing them. Having left the command of the camp to Sulpicius Gallus, he set out with a small train, accompanied by young Scipio his son, and Athenæus, king Eumenes's brother.

He passed through Thessaly in his way to Delphi, the most celebrated oracle in the universe. The multitude and value of the presents, statues, vases, and tripods, with which that temple was filled, surprised him extremely. He there offered a sacrifice to Apollo. Having seen a great square pillar of white marble, on which a golden statue of Perseus was to have been placed, he caused his own to be set upon it, saying, "That the vanquished ought to give place to the victors."

He saw at Lebadeia the temple of Jupiter, surnamed Trophonius, and the entrance of the cavern, into which those who consulted the oracle descended. He offered a sacrifice to Jupiter, and the goddess Hercynna, who was believed to be the daughter of Trophonius.

At Chalcis he gratified his curiosity in seeing the Euripus, and the ebb and flow of the sea, which is very frequent and extraordinary.

From thence he went to the city of Aulis, from which port the famous fleet of Agamemnon formerly set sail for Troy. He made a visit to the temple of Diana in that place, upon whose altar that king of kings sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia, to obtain a prosperous voyage from the goddess.

After having passed through Oropus in Attica, where the soothsayer Amphilocheus was honoured as a god, he came to Athens, a city celebrated for its ancient renown, where abundance of objects presented themselves to his view, well capable of inspiring and gratifying his curiosity; the citadel, the ports, the walls which joined the Piræus to the city, the arsenals for the navy, erected by illustrious generals, the statues of gods and men, in which it was hard to know whether the materials or art were most worthy of admiration. He did not forget to offer a sacrifice to Minerva, the tutelary goddess of the citadel.

Whilst Paulus Æmilius was in that city, he demanded of the Athenians an excellent philosopher to finish the education of his children, and a skilful painter to design the ornaments of his triumph. They immediately cast their eyes upon Metrodorus, who excelled both in philosophy and painting; a very singular and extraordinary praise, which was confirmed by experience, and the approbation of Paulus Æmilius. We here see the attention paid by the great men of antiquity to the education of their children. The sons of that Roman general were then of some age, the youngest of the two, who made the campaign in Macedonia with his father, being at that time seventeen years old. He thought it necessary, however, to have a philosopher with them, capable of forming both their minds by the study of the sciences, and their manners by that of moral virtue, which of all studies is the most important and yet the most neglected. If we are anxious to know the effects of such an education, we have only to call to mind the demeanour of the youngest of the two sons of this consul, who inherited the name and merit of Scipio Africanus, his grandfather by adoption, and of Paulus Æmilius, his natural father: who ruined Carthage and Numantia; who distinguished himself as much by his acquaintance with polite learning and the sciences, as by his military valour; who reckoned it an honour to have Polybius the historian, Panætius the philosopher, and Terence the poet, for his friends and companions: who, in a word to use the terms of a very judicious writer, never said, did, or thought, any thing unworthy of a Roman. Paulus Æmilius having found the precious treasure he sought, in the person of Metrodorus, left Athens well satisfied.

He arrived in two days at Corinth. The citadel and isthmus were an agreeable sight to him: the first, which was situated upon the top of a mountain, abounded with streams and fountains of exceedingly pure water; and the isthmus, which separated by a very narrow neck of land two neighbouring seas, the one on the east, and the other on the west of it.

Sicyon and Argos, two very illustrious cities, were the next in his way; and afterwards Epidaurus, less opulent than the two others, but well known from the famous temple of Æsculapius, where at that time were to be seen an infinite multitude of rich presents, the offerings of sick persons, out of gratitude for the cures they imagined they had received from that god.

Sparta was not distinguished by the magnificence of its buildings, but by the wisdom of its laws, customs, and discipline.

Having taken Megalopolis in his way, he arrived at Olympia, where he saw abundance of things worthy of admiration; but when he cast his eyes upon the statue of Jupiter, Phidias's masterpiece, he was as much struck, says Livy, as if he had seen the god himself, and cried out, that "This Jupiter of Phidias was the exact Jupiter of Homer." Imagining himself in the Capitol, he offered a more solemn sacrifice here than he had done any where else.

Having made the tour of Greece in this manner, without giving himself any trouble to know people's thoughts in regard to Perseus, that he might avoid giving the allies any cause of discontent, he returned to Demetrias. He had met on his way a number of Ætolians, who came to inform him of an unhappy accident which had befallen their city. He ordered them to attend him at Amphipolis. Having received advice that the ten commissioners had already passed the sea, he quitted all other affairs, and went to meet them at Apollonia, which was only one day's journey from Amphipolis. He was very much surprised to meet Perseus there, whom his guards suffered to go about with abundance of liberty, for which he afterwards warmly reproved Sulpicius, to whose care he had confided that important prisoner. He put him, with Philip his son, into the hands of Posthumus, with others to guard him better. As for his daughter and younger son, he caused them to be brought from Samothracia to Amphipolis, where he ordered such care to be taken of them as their birth and condition required.

The commissioners being come hither,† as had been agreed on by them, and having entered the chamber of the assembly, where a great number of Macedonians were present, he took his seat on his tribunal, and after having raised silence to be proclaimed by the crier, Paulus Æmilius repeated in Latin the regulations made by the senate and by himself, in conjunction with the commissioners, relating to Macedonia. The principal articles were, That Macedonia was declared free: that it should pay the Romans one half the tribute paid the king, which was fixed at the sum of 100 talents or 100,000 crowns: that it should have a public council composed of a certain number of senators, wherein all affairs should be discussed and adjudged: that it should be divided for the future into four regions or districts, that should each have their council, in which their particular affairs should be examined: and that no person should contract marriage, or purchase lands or houses, out of their own district. Several other articles of less importance were annexed to these. The prætor Octavius, who was present in this assembly, explained the several articles in Greek, as Paulus Æmilius pronounced them in Latin. The article of liberty, and that of the diminution of tribute, gave the Macedonians exceeding pleasure, who little expected them; but they looked upon the division of Macedonia into different regions, that were not to have their usual intercourse with each other, like the rending a body in pieces, by separating its members, which have no life, nor subsist, but in their mutual support of each other.

The consul afterwards gave audience to the Ætolians.‡ I shall relate elsewhere the subject of it.

After those foreign affairs were settled,§ Paulus Æmilius recalled the Macedonians into the assembly, in order to put the last hand to his regulations. He spoke at first on the subject of the senators who were to compose the public council, wherein the national affairs were to be transacted, and the choice of them was left to the people. A list was then read of the principal persons of the country, who were to be sent into Italy with such of their children as had attained the age of fifteen. This article seemed very hard at first; but it was soon perceived, that it had been resolved upon only for the better security of the people's liberty. For this list included the great lords, generals of the army, commanders of the fleet, all such as had any offices at the court, or had been employed in embassies, with many other officers accustomed to pay their court to the king in the abject manner of slaves, and to command others with insolence. These were all rich persons who lived at a great expense, had magnificent equipages, and would not easily be reduced to a quite different kind of life, in which liberty makes the whole people equal, and subjects all to the laws. They were therefore all ordered to quit Macedonia, and transport themselves into Italy, upon pain of death for such as disobeyed. The regulations made for Macedonia by Paulus Æmilius were so reasonable, that they did not seem calculated for conquered enemies, but for faithful allies, with whom there was every reason to be satisfied, and the execution of them, from which the nature of laws is best known, proved that there was nothing to be amended in the institutions of that wise magistrate.

To these serious affairs* succeeded a celebration of games for which preparations had long been making, and to which care had been taken to invite all the most considerable persons in the cities of Asia and Greece. The Roman general offered magnificent sacrifices to the gods, and gave superb feasts, the king's treasures supplying him abundantly with the means of defraying such great expenses; but for the good order and fine taste observable in them, he was indebted solely to himself. For although he had so many thousands to receive, he displayed so nice a discernment, and so exact a knowledge of the quality of all the guests, that every one was lodged, placed, and treated, according to his rank and merit; and there was nobody who had not reason to praise his politeness and affability. The Greeks could not sufficiently express their admiration, that even in games, till then unknown to the Romans, he should evince so accurate a judgment and attention; and that a man, employed in the greatest, should not neglect the least propriety in small affairs.

He had caused all the spoils that he did not think fit to carry to Rome, to be piled up in one great heap: bows, quivers, arrows, javelins; in a word, arms of all sorts; and caused them to be arranged in the form of trophies. With a torch in his hand, he set fire to them first himself, as his principal officers did after him.

He afterwards exposed to the view of the spectators, upon a place raised expressly for the occasion all that was richest and most magnificent in the spoils he had taken in Macedonia, and which were to be carried to Rome; rich furniture, statues, and paintings by the greatest masters, vessels of gold, silver, copper, and ivory. Never had Alexandria, in the time of its greatest opulence, beheld any thing like what was now exhibited.

But the highest satisfaction Paulus Æmilius received from his magnificence, and that which was most grateful to self-love, was to see, that in the midst of so many extraordinary objects and curious sights, nothing was thought so wonderful, or so worthy of attention and admiration, as himself. And as people were surprised at the fine order of his table, he said, with an air of pleasantry, that the same genius which was necessary in disposing a battle, would serve also in regulating a feast; in the first, it rendered an army formidable to enemies; in the latter, an entertainment agreeable to guests.

His disinterestedness and magnanimity were no less praised than his magnificence and politeness, for he never so much as saw the gold and silver found amongst the king's treasures, which amounted to very great sums, but ordered it all to be delivered to treasurers, in order to be applied to the use of the public. He only permitted his sons, who were fond of study, to keep the books of Perseus's library for their own use. The young noblemen of those times, and such as were designed one day for the command of armies, did not profess a contempt for learning, nor believe it either unworthy of their birth, or unnecessary to the profession of arms.

When Paulus Æmilius had regulated all the affairs of Macedonia, he took leave of the Greeks,¶ and after having exhorted the Macedonians not to make a bad use of the liberty granted them by the Romans, and to preserve it by good government and union, he set out for Epirus with a decree of the senate, which enjoined him to abandon all the cities that had revolted to the king's party to be plundered by his troops. He had sent also Scipio Nasica, and Fabius his son, with part of the army, to ravage the country of the Illyrians, who had given aid to that prince.

The Roman general being arrived at Epirus, thought it proper to proceed with caution in the execution of his commission, in order that his design should not be foreseen. He therefore sent officers into all the cities, under pretence of withdrawing the garrisons, in order that the Epirots should enjoy the same liberty as the Macedonians. So disgraceful a stratagem was called prudence. He then signified to ten of the principal persons of each city, that they were to bring all the gold and silver in their houses and temples, upon a certain day, into the market-place to be laid up in the public treasury, and distributed his troops into all the cities. Upon the day prefixed, all the gold and silver was brought early in the morning into the public square, and at ten of the clock, in all the cities, the soldiers fell furiously upon the houses, which were abandoned to them to be plundered at their mercy. A hundred and fifty thousand men were made slaves, and after the cities were pillaged, their walls were demolished, the number of which amounted nearly to seventy. The whole booty was sold, and of the sum raised by it, each of the horse had for his share about 10*l.* sterling, (400 denarii.) and each of the foot about 5*l.* (200 denarii.)

After Paulus Æmilius, contrary to his natural disposition, which was gentle and humane, had caused this decree to be put in execution, he advanced to the sea at the city of Oricum. Some days after, Anicius, having assembled the remainder of the Epirots and Acarnanians, ordered the principal persons among them, whose cause had been reserved for the judgment of the senate, to follow him into Italy.

Paulus Æmilius being arrived at the mouth of the Tiber,¹ went up that river in king Perseus's galley, which had sixteen benches of oars, and wherein were displayed, not only the arms which had been taken, but all the richest stuffs and finest carpets of purple found among the booty. All the Romans, who came out to meet that galley, accompanied it in crowds along the banks of the river, and seemed to give the proconsul by anticipation the honours of that triumph which he had so well deserved. But the soldiery, who had looked with a greedy eye upon the immense treasures of the king, and had not had all the share of them which they had promised themselves, retained a warm resentment upon that account, and were very ill satisfied with Paulus Æmilius. They openly reproached him with having treated them with too much rigour and authority, and seemed determined to refuse him the honour of a triumph by their suffrages. The soldiers called that general's exactitude, in causing discipline to be observed, rigour; and their discontent, occasioned by avarice, threw a veil over the excellent qualities of Paulus Æmilius; to whom, however, they were obliged to do justice in their hearts, by acknowledging the superiority of his merit in every respect.

After some debates, a triumph was granted him. Never had any thing been so magnificent. It continued three days successively. I do not enter here into a particular account of it; as that seems foreign to the Grecian history. The money in specie carried in it, without reckoning an infinite number of gold and silver vessels, amounted to more than 1,250,000*l.* sterling. One single cup of massy gold, which Paulus Æmilius had caused to be made, and weighed ten talents,² was valued, for the gold only, at 100,000 crowns. It was adorned with jewels, and consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus.

After these rich spoils and treasures, which were carried in procession, was seen the chariot of Perseus with his arms, and upon his arms, his royal diadem. At some distance followed his children, with their governors, preceptors, and all the officers of their household, who, shedding tears, held out their hands to the people, and taught those little captives to do the same, and to endeavour, by their supplications and prayers, to move them in their favour. They were two sons and a daughter, who from the tenderness of their years were little sensible of the greatness of their calamity; a circumstance which still more excited compassion. All eyes were fixed upon them, whilst their father was scarce regarded, and in the midst of the public joy, the people could not refrain from tears at so mournful a sight.

King Perseus walked after his children and all their train, wrapped in a morning cloak. His air and behaviour seemed to argue, that the excess of his misfortunes had turned his brain. He was followed by a troop of his friends and courtiers, who hanging down their heads, and weeping with their eyes always fixed upon him, sufficiently explained to the spectators, that, little affected with their own misfortunes, they were sensible solely to those of their king.

It is said, that Perseus sent to desire Paulus Æmilius not to exhibit him as a spectacle to the Romans and to spare him the indignity of being led in triumph. Paulus Æmilius replied coldly, "The favour he asks of me is in his own power; he can procure it for himself." He reproached him, in those few words, with his cowardice and excessive love of life which the Pagans thought incumbent on them to sacrifice generously in such conjunctures. They did not know, that it is never lawful to make an attempt upon one's own life. But Perseus was not prevented by that consideration.

Paulus Æmilius, seated in a superb car, and magnificently adorned, closed the march. He had his two sons on each side of him.

Whatever compassion he had for the misfortunes of Perseus, and however inclined he might be to serve him, all he could do for him, was to have him removed from the public prison to a more commodious place. Himself and his son Alexander were carried by the order of the senate, to Alba, where he was guarded, and supplied with money, furniture, and people to serve him. Most authors agree, that he occasioned his own death by abstaining from food. He had reigned eleven years. Macedonia was not reduced into a province till some years afterwards.

Cn. Octavius and L. Anicius were also granted the honour of a triumph; the first for his naval victories, and the other for that he had gained in Illyria.

Cotys, king of Thrace, sent to demand his son, who had been confined in prison, after having been led in triumph. He excused himself for his attachment to the party of Perseus, and offered a great ransom for the prisoner. The senate, without receiving his excuses, replied, that having more regard to his former services than his late fault, they would send back his son, but without accepting any ransom: that the favours conferred by the Roman people were free and voluntary, and that they chose rather to leave the price of them to the gratitude and affection of those they obliged, than to be paid immediately for them.

ARTICLE II.

This second article includes the space of some thing more than twenty years, from the defeat of Perseus, to the taking and destruction of Corinth by Mummius, at which time Greece was reduced into a Roman province.

mitted by the Asiatic Gauls in the kingdom of Pergamus, had laid Attalus under the necessity of going to Rome, to implore the aid of the republic against those barbarians. Another still more specious reason had obliged him to make the voyage. It was necessary to congratulate the Romans upon their late victory, and to receive the applauses he deserved for the part he had taken in the war against Perseus, and for having shared with them in all the dangers of it. He was received at Rome with all the marks of honour and amity that a prince could expect who had proved, in the army in Macedonia, a constant and determinate attachment for the Romans. He had a most favourable reception, and made his entrance into the city attended by a very numerous train.

All these honours, the real cause of which he did not penetrate, made him conceive thoughts and hopes which perhaps had never entered into his mind, if they had not been suggested to him. The greatest part of the Romans had no longer any esteem or affection for Eumenes. His secret negotiation with Perseus, of which they had been apprized, made them believe that that prince had never been heartily on their side, and that he only waited an occasion to declare against them. Full of this prejudice, some of the most distinguished Romans, in their private conversation with Attalus, advised him not to mention the business on which his brother had sent him to treat; but to speak solely of what related to himself. They gave him to understand that the senate, to whom Eumenes was become suspected, and even odious, from his having appeared to waver between Perseus and the Romans, had thoughts of depriving him of part of his kingdom, and to give it to himself, upon whom they could rely as an assured friend incapable of changing. We here recognize the maxims of the Roman policy; and these detached features may serve to unveil it upon other occasions, when more attentive to conceal itself.

The temptation was delicate to a prince, who, without doubt, did not want ambition, and who was not of a temper to reject such pleasing hopes when they presented themselves to him without being solicited. He listened therefore to these discourses and this proposal; and the rather, because they came from some of the principal persons at Rome, whose wisdom he esteemed, and whose probity he respected. The affair went so far, that he promised them to demand in the senate, that part of his brother's kingdom should be given to him.

Attalus had a physician in his train, called Stratius, whom Eumenes, suspecting his brother, had sent with him to Rome, to have an eye upon his conduct, and to recall him to his duty by good counsel, if he should happen to depart from it. Stratius had wit and penetration, and his manners were very insinuating, and well adapted to persuasion. Having either discovered or learned from Attalus himself, the design that had been instilled into him, he took advantage of some favourable moments to open himself to him. He represented, that the kingdom of Pergamus, weak of itself, and but very lately established, had subsisted, and been augmented, solely by the union and good understanding of the brothers who possessed it. That only one of them, indeed, enjoyed the name of king, and wore the diadem; but that they all reigned in reality. That Eumenes, having no male issue, (for the son he had afterwards, and who succeeded him, was not then in being,) he could leave his throne only to his next brother. That his right to the succession of the kingdom was therefore incontestable; and that, considering the age and infirmities of Eumenes, the time for such succession could not be very remote. And wherefore then should he anticipate and hasten, by a violent and criminal undertaking, what would soon happen in a just and natural manner? Did he desire to divide the kingdom with his brother, or to deprive him of it entirely? If he had only a part of it, both of them, weakened by such a division, and exposed to the enterprises of their neighbours, might be equally deprived of their share. That if he proposed to reign alone, what would become of his elder brother? Would he reduce him to live as a private person, or send him, at his years, into banishment? or, in a word, would he cause him to be put to death? That he did not doubt but such thoughts must give him horror. That not to speak of the accounts related in fabulous history of the tragical effects of fraternal discord, the recent example of Perseus ought to remind him of them. That that unfortunate prince, who had torn the sceptre from his brother, by shedding his blood, pursued by the divine vengeance, had lately laid down the same sceptre at the feet of his conqueror in the temple of Samothracia, and in a manner before the eyes, and by the order, of the gods who preside there, the witnesses and avengers of his guilt. That he was assured that the very persons, who, less out of friendship for him, than ill-will for Eumenes, gave him at present such pernicious counsels, would be the first to praise his tender and constant affection for his brother, if he continued faithfully attached to him to the last. Stratius added the extreme danger to which Attalus would expose the kingdom of Pergamus in the present conjuncture, when the Gauls were preparing to invade it.

How unworthy was it of the Romans to kindle and blow up the fire of discord in this manner between brothers! Of what value must a sincere, prudent, and disinterested friend appear at such a time! What an advantage is it for a prince to give those who approach him the liberty of speaking freely, and without reserve to him: and of being known by them in that light! The wise remonstrances of Stratius produced their intended effect upon the mind of Attalus. That prince, having been introduced into the senate, without speaking against his brother or demanding a division of the kingdom of Pergamus, contented himself with congratulating the senate, in the name of Eumenes and his brothers, upon the victory gained in Macedonia. He modestly dwelt upon the zeal and affection with which he had served in the war against Perseus. He desired, that they would send ambassadors to check the insolence of the Gauls, and to reduce them to their former state; and concluded with requesting, that the investiture of Ænus and Maronea, cities of Thrace, might be given to him, which places had been conquered by Philip, father of Perseus, and the possession disputed with him by Eumenes.

The senate, imagining that Attalus would demand another audience, in order to speak in particular of his pretensions to part of his brother's dominions, promised before hand to send ambassadors according to his request, and made the prince the usual presents. They promised besides to put him into possession of the two cities, as he desired. But when it was known that he had left Rome, the senate, offended to find that he had done nothing of what they had expected from him, and not being able to be revenged upon him, in any other manner, revoked the promise they had made him; and, before the prince was out of Italy, declared Ænus and Maronea free and independent cities. They sent, however, an embassy to the Gauls, at the head of which was P. Licinius; but with very different instructions to those demanded by Attalus. The Roman policy threw off the mask entirely at this time, and showed an aspect very unlike the frankness and probity of their ancestors.

The senate some days after gave audience to the Rhodians, which made a great noise. They were at first refused to be heard, as having rendered themselves unworthy of that honour by their conduct, and even a declaration of war against them was talked of. Rhodes, alarmed at it, sent two new deputies. Having obtained admittance to the senate with great difficulty, they appeared there as suppliants, dressed in mourning habits, and with their faces bathed in tears. Astymedes spoke, and with a voice interrupted with sobs, took upon him the defence of his unfortunate country. He took great care not to show at first his desire to justify it. He avowed, that it had justly incurred the anger of the Roman people; he confessed its faults; he called to mind the indiscreet embassy, which the insolent pride of the orator who spoke had rendered still more criminal: but he begged the senate to make some difference between the entire body of the nation, and a few private persons disavowed by them, whom they were ready to deliver up. He represented that there was no republic nor city that did not include some bad members; that, after all, there were no other crimes objected to them but words; foolish indeed, rash, extravagant, (which he confessed to be the characteristics and failings of his nation,) but such as wise persons seldom lay much stress upon, or punish with exceeding rigour, no more than Jupiter aims his thunders at all that speak with little respect of his divinity. "But," said he, "the neutrality observed by us in the late war is looked upon as a certain proof of our enmity towards you. Is there a tribunal in the world, wherein the intention, when without effect, is punished as the action itself? But allowing your severity to be carried to that excess, at most the punishment can only fall on those who have had this intention, and then the majority of us are innocent. Admitting even that this neutrality and inaction make us all criminal, ought the real services we have rendered you in the two preceding wars to be deemed as nothing, and will they not cover the omission imputed to us in the last? Let Philip, Antiochus, and Perseus, bear witness now in our cause. The voices of the two first will certainly be for us, and absolve us; and, for the third, at most, and in the severest sense, the sentence must appear doubtful and uncertain. Can you then, according to this state of the question, pass sentence of death against Rhodes? for you are now upon the point of deciding, whether it shall subsist any longer, or be entirely destroyed. You may declare war against us; but not a single Rhodian will take up arms against you. If you persist in your resentment, we demand time to go and report the result of our deputation at Rhodes, and at that moment our whole city, men, women, and free persons, will embark with all our estates and effects: we will abandon our household gods, as well public as private, and come to Rome, where, after we have thrown our gold and silver, and all we have, at your feet, we will deliver up ourselves, our wives, and our children, to your discretion. We will suffer here, before your eyes, whatever you shall think fit to inflict upon us. If Rhodes is condemned to be plundered and set on fire, at least we shall spare ourselves the sight of that calamity. You may, by your resolves, declare us to be your enemies: but there is a secret sentiment in the bottom of our hearts that declares quite the contrary, and assures us that, whatever hostilities you may exercise against us, you will never find us otherwise than friends and servants."

After this discourse, the deputies prostrated themselves upon the earth, and held out their hands towards the senators, with olive branches in them, to demand peace. When they were withdrawn, by order of the senate, they proceeded to vote upon the affair. All who had served in Macedonia, in quality of consuls, prætors, or lieutenants, and who had most experienced their foolish pride and enmity to the Romans, were very much against them. M. Portius Cato, the celebrated censor, known by the severity of his character, which often rose to hardness of heart, was softened at this time in favour of the Rhodians, and spoke for them with great warmth and eloquence. Livy does not repeat his discourse, because it was then extant in a work of Cato's own, entitled De Originibus, wherein he had inserted his own orations.

The world has reason to regret the loss of so valuable a collection. Aulus Gellius² has preserved some fragments of this discourse of Cato's, by which it appears he made use of almost the same reasons with the ambassadors from Rhodes. I shall cite some passages of it at the bottom of the page to assist the reader in knowing and distinguishing the manly and energetic style which characterized the Roman eloquence in those ancient times, when more attention was paid to the force of the sentiments than to the elegance of the words.

Cato³ begins his discourse by representing to the Romans that they ought not, in consequence of their victory over the king of Macedon, to abandon themselves to the extravagance of excessive joy. That prosperity generally excites pride and insolence. That he apprehends, in the present case, they may form resolutions which may draw some misfortune upon Rome, and cause the frivolous joy, to which they give themselves up, to vanish like a dream. "Adversity," says he, "in humbling the spirit, restores us to our reason, and teaches us what is necessary to be done. Prosperity, on the contrary, hurries us in a manner out of our way, by the joy it occasions, and makes us lose sight of the measures which a calm temper of mind would enable us to discern and execute. It is therefore, fathers, I am absolutely of opinion, that we should for a few days defer the decision of this affair, till, having recovered from the violent emotions of our joy, we are again masters of ourselves, and capable of deliberating with more maturity." He adds, "That he indeed believes the Rhodians were far from desiring that the Romans should have conquered Perseus; but that they had such sentiments in common with all other states; sentiments, which did not proceed from their enmity to the Romans, but from the love of their own liberty; for which they had just cause to fear, when there should be none in a condition to dispute empire with us, and we should become absolute masters of all nations. For the rest, the Rhodians did not aid Perseus. Their whole crime, by the consent of their most violent accusers, is, that they intended to declare war against us. But how long has the will, the intention only, been a crime? Is there any one amongst us that would be willing to subject himself to this rule? For my part, I am sure I would not. The Rhodians, it is said, are proud: I should be very sorry that my children could justly make me that reproach. But pray, in what does their pride affect us? Would it become us to impute it to them as a crime that they are prouder than we are?"

The opinion of so grave and venerable a senator as Cato prevented a war against the Rhodians. The answer given them did not declare them enemies, nor treat them as allies; but left matters still in suspense. They were ordered to remove their governors from the cities of Lycia and Caria. Those provinces were given up to them after the defeat of Antiochus, and now taken from them by way of punishment. They were ordered also to evacuate Caunus and Stratonice. They had bought the first for 200 talents (about 25,000*l.*) of Ptolemy's generals, and the second had been given them by Antiochus and Seleucus; they drew from those two cities an annual revenue of 120 talents, (or 15,000*l.*) At the same time the senate granted the island of Delos an exemption from customs, which considerably diminished the revenues of the Rhodians. For instead of 1,000,000 of drachmas, (about 25,000*l.* sterling,) to which the revenue from those customs amounted before, it paid afterwards only 150,000 (about 3,750*l.* sterling.)

The senate's answer having dispelled at Rhodes the fear that the Romans would take arms against the republic, made all other evils appear light, as it is common for the expectation of great misfortunes to deaden the sensation of small ones. How hard soever those orders were, they submitted to them, and put them in immediate execution. They decreed at the same time a crown of gold to the Romans, of the value of 10,000 pieces of gold,¹ and chose their admiral Theodotus to present it. He had orders to solicit the alliance of the Romans. The Rhodians had not demanded it till then, though for almost 140 years they had shared in the most glorious expeditions of that republic; which was a feature of their politics. They were unwilling to hamper their liberty with the chains of oaths and treaties; in order that, continuing free, and their own masters, they might either aid the kings in distress, or be supported by them upon occasion. In the present conjuncture they earnestly demanded to be admitted as allies, not to secure themselves against other powers, for they were in no apprehension of any besides the Romans, but to remove, by that change of conduct, all suspicions that might have been conceived to the prejudice of their republic. The alliance was not, however, granted them at this time. They did not obtain it till the following year; nor then without long and warm solicitations. Tiberius Gracchus, on his return from Asia, whither he had been sent in quality of commissioner, to examine into its condition, was of great service to them upon this occasion. He declared that the Rhodians had punctually obeyed the senate's orders, and had condemned the partisans of Perseus to death. After so favourable a report, the Rhodians were admitted into the alliance of the Roman republic.

I have before observed,² that the Ætolians had presented themselves before Paulus Æmilius in mourning habits, at his return from his expedition into Greece, and that he had given them audience at Amphipolis. The subject of their complaints was, that Lyciscus and Tissippus, whom the influence of the Romans, to whose interests they were devoted, rendered very powerful in Ætolia, had surrounded the senate with soldiers, lent them by Bæbius, who commanded in the province for the Romans; that they had put to death 550 of the principal persons of the nation, whose sole crime was their having seemed to favour Perseus; that a great number of others had been sent into banishment; and that the estates, both of the one and the other, had been abandoned to their accusers. Paulus Æmilius listened to their complaints. The investigation was confined to inquiring, not on which side the injustice and violence had been committed, but whether the parties concerned had been for Perseus or the Romans. The murderers were acquitted. The deceased were declared to have been justly put to death, and the exiles to have been justly banished. Bæbius only was condemned for having lent his aid in this bloody execution; but why condemned if it was just? or if not, why were those acquitted who had been the principal authors of it?

This sentence gave great terror to all who had expressed any favourable inclination for Perseus, and exceedingly increased the pride and insolence of the partisans of Rome. The principal persons of each city were divided into three factions. The one were entirely devoted to the Romans; others adhered to the party of the kings; both making their court to their protectors by abject flatteries, and thereby rendering themselves powerful in their cities, which they held in an oppressive subjection. A third kind of citizens, in opposition to the other two, observed a kind of medium, neither taking part with the Romans nor the kings; but publicly asserting the defence of their laws and liberty. The latter, at bottom, were much esteemed and beloved in their several cities; but had no authority. All offices, embassies, honours, and rewards, were conferred solely upon those who espoused the Roman interest, after the defeat of Perseus; and they employed their credit in utterly destroying all those who differed from themselves in opinion.

In this view they repaired in great numbers, from all parts of Greece, to the ten commissioners, appointed by the senate to regulate affairs. They gave them to understand that, besides those who had declared publicly for Perseus, there were abundance of others secretly the enemies of Rome, who, under the pretence of defending their liberty, influenced the whole people against them; and that those cities would never continue quiet, and perfectly subject to the Romans, unless, after the contrary party were entirely reduced, the authority of those who had only the interest of the Roman commonwealth at heart was fully established. The ten commissioners perfectly relished those reasons, and made them the rule of their conduct. What justice could be expected from an assembly that was determined to consider and treat all as criminals who were not of the Roman party; and to reward all who should declare themselves their accusers and enemies, with the highest graces and favours? We see here to what lengths ambition and the lust of empire carry mankind. They make men blind to all sense of duty and decency, and induce them to sacrifice justice, as well as every thing else, when it opposes their views. The virtue of the Pagans was but a weak and very fluctuating principle.

That appeared evidently upon this occasion. The Roman general, to whom a list had been given of all those who were suspected, ordered them to attend him, from Ætolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Boeotia, and to follow him to Rome, there to make their defence. Commissioners were sent also into Asia, in order to take informations against such as, in public or private, had favoured Perseus.

Of all the small states of Greece,³ none gave the Roman republic so A. M. 3637. much umbrage as the Achæan Ant. J.C. 167. league, which till then had continued formidable by the number and valour of their troops, by the ability of their generals, and, above all, by the union that reigned between all the cities of which it was composed. The Romans, jealous of a power that might prove an obstacle to their ambitious designs, especially if they should join the king of Macedonia, or the king of Syria, spared no pains to weaken it by introducing divisions, and gaining creatures, whom they raised by their credit to all employments, and by whose means they influenced the decisions in all the assemblies of the league. We have seen what passed in the affair of the Spartan exiles. But it was in the conjuncture we now speak of, that the Romans gave the last stroke to their liberty.

After the defeat of Perseus, Callicrates, to complete with the Romans, to whom he had sold himself, the ruin of the partisans of liberty, whom he looked upon as his enemies, had the boldness to accuse by name all those to the ten commissioners, whom he suspected to have had any inclination to support Perseus. They did not think it would be sufficient to write to the Achæans, as they had done to other states, commanding them to send such of their citizens to Rome, as were accused of having favoured Perseus; but they sent two deputies to declare in person that order to the league. Two reasons induced them to act in this manner. The first was their fear that the Achæans, who were very jealous of their liberty, and full of valour, should refuse obedience to mere letters that should be written them; and that Callicrates, and the other informers, would run the risk of their lives in the assembly: the second, because in the letters which had been found amongst Perseus's papers, nothing appeared to convict the accused Achæans.

The two commissioners sent into Achaia were C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus. One of them more abandoned to injustice than the other, (Pausanias does not say which,) complained, in the assembly, that many of the most powerful persons of the league had assisted Perseus against the Romans, and demanded that they should be condemned as deserving death, after which he would name them. The whole assembly was shocked at this proposal, and cried out on all sides, that it was an unheard of thing to condemn persons before it was known who they were, and pressed him to make known the guilty. Being urged repeatedly to explain himself, he replied, at the suggestion of Callicrates, that all who had been in office, and commanded the armies, had rendered themselves guilty of that crime. Xenon, upon that, who was a person of great credit, and very much respected by the league, spoke to this effect: "I have commanded the armies, and have had the honour to be the chief magistrate of the league; I protest that I have never acted in any thing contrary to the interests of the Romans, which I am ready to prove either in the assembly of the Achæans, or at Rome before the senate." The Roman took hold of this expression as favourable to his designs, and decreed, that all those who had been charged by Callicrates should be sent to Rome in order to justify themselves there. The whole assembly was in the highest affliction upon this sentence. Nothing like it had ever been known, even under Philip, or his son Alexander. Those princes, though irresistibly powerful, never conceived the thought of raising such as opposed them to be brought into Macedonia, but referred the trying of them to the council of the Amphictyons, their natural judges. The Romans did not imitate their moderation: but, by a conduct which may justly be called tyrannical, caused above 1000 of the most considerable citizens of the Achæan league to be seized and conveyed to Rome. Callicrates became more than ever the object of horror and detestation to all the Achæans. All people avoided meeting him, and shunned him as an infamous traitor; and no one would bathe in the public baths after him, till all the water had been first emptied out of them.

Polybius, the celebrated historian, was of the number of these exiles. We have seen Lycortas, his father, distinguish himself by the fortitude and constancy with which he supported the interests of the Achæan league during his government of it. He had taken particular care of the education of his son. In politics, Polybius had Lycortas his father, a great statesman, for his master; and in war, Philopœmen, one of the most able and intrepid generals of antiquity. It was under these tutors that he imbibed those learned lessons in the art of government and war which he practised himself, and has transmitted to posterity in his writings.

As soon as he arrived at Rome, whither his reputation had reached before him, his merit made the greatest men of the republic cultivate his friendship. He was particularly intimate with the two sons of Paulus Æmilius, the eldest of whom had been adopted into the family of the Fabii, and the youngest into that of the Scipios. The latter had been adopted by P. Cornelius Scipio, son of Scipio Africanus, who conquered Hannibal. I have enlarged sufficiently, in the conclusion of the history of the Carthaginians, upon the intimate friendship of Polybius with this second son of Paulus Æmilius, who afterwards conquered Carthage and Numantia. That young Roman perceived the value of such a friend, and knew how to apply his lessons and advice to the best advantage. It is very probable that Polybius composed the greatest part of his history, or at least collected his materials for it, at Rome.

When the Achæans arrived at Rome, the senate, without hearing or examining their cause, supposing, without any foundation, and contrary to the most known truth, that they had been tried and sentenced in the assembly of the Achæans, banished them into different towns of Italy. Polybius was excepted from that number.

The Achæans,¹ surprised and afflicted with the fate of their countrymen, sent deputies to Rome, to demand that the senate would vouchsafe to take cognizance of their cause. They were answered that it had been done, and that they had adjudged it themselves. Upon that reply, the Achæans sent back the same deputies to Rome (with Euræus at their head) to protest again before the senate, that the Achæans had never been heard by their country, and that their affair had never been brought to a trial. Euræus, in consequence, entered the senate with the other deputies who accompanied him, and declared the orders he had received, praying that they would take cognizance of the accusation, and not suffer the accused to perish without passing sentence upon the crime they were charged with. That it were to be wished the senate would examine the affair themselves, and make known the guilty; but, in case their other great affairs should not afford them leisure for such inquiry, they had only to refer it to the Achæans, who would do them justice in such a manner as should evince the greatness of their aversion for the guilty. Nothing was more equitable than this demand, and the senate was very much at a loss how to answer it.

On the one side, they did not think it proper to try the cause, for the accusation was groundless; on the other, to dismiss the exiles without passing judgment upon them, was to lose irrecoverably all their friends in Achaia. The senate, in order to leave the Greeks no hopes of retrieving their exiles, and to render them thereby more submissive to their orders, wrote into Achaia to Callicrates, and into the other states to the partisans of the Romans, that it did not appear to them that the return of the exiles was consistent with their interest, or with that of their country. This answer not only threw the exiles, but all the people of Greece, into a consternation. A universal mourning succeeded it. They were convinced that there was nothing farther to hope for the accused Achæans, and that their banishment was perpetual.

However, they sent new deputies,² with instructions to demand the return of the exiles: but as suppliants, and as a favour; lest in taking upon them their defence, they should seem in the slightest degree to oppose the will of the senate. There did not escape any thing in their harangue that was not very well weighed, and sufficiently reserved. Notwithstanding which, the senate continued inflexible, and declared that they would persist in the regulations already made.

The Achæans,³ without being disheartened, appointed several deputations at different times, but with A. M. 3844. Ant. J. C. 160. no better success; they were particularly ordered to demand the return of Polybius. They were in the right to persevere thus in their applications to the senate in favour of their countrymen. Though their repeated solicitations had no other effect than to place the injustice of the Romans in full light, they could not be considered as unnecessary. Many of the senators were moved with them, and were of opinion that it was proper to send home the exiles.

The Achæans,⁴ having received advice of their favourable disposition, in order to improve it to their advantage, appointed a last deputation. The exiles had been already banished seventeen years, and a great number of them were dead. There were very warm debates upon the subject in the senate; some being for their return into their own country, and restored to the possession of their estates; and others opposing it.

Scipio, at the request of Polybius, had solicited Cato in favour of the exiles. That grave senator, rising up to speak in his turn; "to see us," said he, "dispute a whole day, whether some poor old men of Greece shall be interred by our grave-diggers, or those of their own country, would not one believe that we had nothing at all to do?" That pleasantry was all that was wanting to make the senate ashamed of their obstinate perseverance, and to induce them to send back the exiles into Peloponnesus. Polybius was anxious that they might be reinstated in all the honours and dignities they possessed before their banishment; but before he presented that request to the senate, he thought proper to sound Cato upon it, who told him, smiling, "Polybius, you do not imitate the wisdom of Ulysses. You are for returning into the cave of the Cyclops for some miserable tatters you have left there."

A. M. 3354. The exiles accordingly returned into Ant. J. C. 150. their country; but of the thousand that left it, only about three hundred remained. Polybius made no use of this permission; or if he did, he soon rejoined Scipio, since, three years after, he was with him at the siege of Carthage.

ANOTHER FROM THE PEOPLE OF MARSEILLES. DIGRESSION UPON THE CITY OF MARSEILLES.

AFTER the defeat of Perseus, new embassies came every day to Rome, either to congratulate the Romans upon their victory, or to justify or excuse themselves for the attachment they had seemed to have to that prince; and some came to lay complaints before the senate in regard to some allies. We have seen hitherto what relates to the Rhodians and Achæans. In this section I shall collect what concerns Eumenes of Pergamus, Prusias king of Bithynia, and some other particular affairs.

Prusias being come to Rome,¹ to pay to the senate and Roman people Ant. J. C. 166. his compliments of congratulation upon the good success of the war against Perseus, dishonoured the royal dignity by his abject flattery. At his reception by the deputies appointed by the senate for that purpose, he appeared with his head shaved, and with the cap, habit, and shoes and stockings of a slave made free; and, saluting the deputies, "You see," said he, "one of your freed-men, ready to fulfil whatsoever you shall please to command, and to conform entirely to all your customs." When he entered the senate, he stood at the door facing the senators, who were seated, and prostrating himself, kissed the threshold. Afterwards, addressing himself to the assembly, "I salute you, ye gods, preservers," cried he; and went on with a discourse suitable to that preamble. Polybius says, that he should be ashamed to repeat it. He concluded with demanding, that the Roman people would renew the alliance with him, and grant him certain lands taken from Antiochus, of which the Gauls had possessed themselves without any right or pretension. He then recommended his son Nicomedes to them. All he asked was granted him; only commissioners were appointed to examine into the condition of the lands in question. Livy, in his account of this audience, omits the abject submissions of Prusias; of which he pretends the Roman historians say nothing: he contents himself with mentioning, in the conclusion, part of what Polybius had said before; and not without good reason. For that base deportment at least dishonoured the senate as much who suffered, as the prince who acted it.

Prusias had scarce left Rome,² when advice came that Eumenes was upon the point of entering it. That news gave the senate great perplexity. Eumenes, in the war against Perseus, had behaved in such a manner that they could neither consider him as a friend nor an enemy. There was ground for violent suspicions, but no certain proofs against him. To admit him to an audience was to declare him innocent: to condemn him as guilty was to lay them under the necessity of a war with him, and to proclaim to all the world that they had been deficient in prudence, by loading a prince with favours and honours, with whose character they were little acquainted. To avoid these inconveniences, the senate made a decree, by which, under the pretext that the reception of kings was too great an expense to the republic, they forbade all kings in general to enter that city, and caused that ordinance to be signed to the king of Pergamus, who was at no loss to comprehend its meaning. He returned, therefore, into his own dominions.

This affront encouraged his enemies and cooled the affection of his allies.³ A. M. 3839. Prusias sent ambassadors to Ant. J. C. 165. Rome, to complain against him for the irruptions he made into Bithynia. He added, that Eumenes held secret intelligence with Antiochus; that he treated all those injuriously who seemed to favour the Romans, and particularly the Gallo-Græcians, his neighbours, in contradiction to the senate's decrees in their behalf. That people had also sent deputies to Rome with their complaints; which they afterwards repeated several times, as well as Prusias. The senate did not yet declare themselves. They contented themselves with covertly aiding and supporting the Gallo-Græcians to the utmost of their power, without doing any manifest injustice to Eumenes.

The king of Pergamus, who had been forbidden entrance into Rome, sent his brothers, Attalus and Athenæus, thither, to answer the accusations with which he was charged. The apology they made seemed fully to confute all the complaints that had been alleged against the king, and the senate were so well satisfied with it, that they sent them back into Asia laden with honours and presents. They did not, however, entirely efface the prejudices conceived against their brother. The senate despatched Sulpicius Gallus and Manius Sergius, with orders to inform themselves secretly whether Antiochus and Eumenes were not concerting some design against the Romans.

Sulpicius acted in this commission with very great imprudence. He was a vain man, and aimed at appearing important, by declaring against Eumenes. When he arrived in Asia, he caused all the cities to be informed, that such as had any complaints to make, in regard to that prince, might repair to him at Sardis. And there for ten days he hearkened quietly to all the accusations people thought fit to form against Eumenes; a liberty that set all malecontents at work, and opened a door for all manner of calumnies.

Tiberius Cracchus, whom the senate sent the following year into Asia upon the same account, was received by Eumenes and Antiochus in a manner which convinced him there was nothing to fear from those two kings, and induced him to make his report to the senate accordingly. He gave an equally favourable account of the conduct of Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, whose sister Eumenes had married. That prince died some time after. His son Ariarathes, surnamed Philopator,⁴ succeeded him. He had him by Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus the Great, and intended, when he came of age, to resign his kingdom to him, to which his son would never consent; from whence he was called Philopator, that is, the lover of his father: an action highly laudable, in an age wherein it was no uncommon thing to acquire kingdoms by parricide.

As soon as the young king ascended the throne, he sent deputies to Rome,⁵ to demand that the treaty, which his father had made with the Romans, should be renewed, which was granted him with praises.

Some time after, notwithstanding
 A. M. 3845. Eumenes aided him with all his forces,
 Ant. J. C. 159. he was dethroned by Demetrius, king of Syria, and one of his elder brothers set in his place, who was a supposititious child, named Holofernes. Ariarathes took refuge at Rome. The usurper and Demetrius sent their ambassadors also

A. M. 3847. thither. The senate decreed, that
 Ant. J. C. 157. the two brothers should reign jointly. It was a policy sufficiently frequent with the Romans to divide kingdoms between brothers, in order to weaken them by that partition, and sow the seeds of an eternal division between them. Attalus, in the first year of his reign, re-established him in the sole possession of the throne, having conquered and expelled his competitor.

Eumenes was always suspected by
 A. M. 3845. the Romans, and almost continually
 Ant. J. C. 155. at war with Prusias, or the Gallogrecians. He died at length, after having reigned thirty-eight years.¹ He left for his successor in the kingdom his son Attalus,² surnamed Philometor, then an infant, whom he had by Stratonice, sister to Ariarathes, and appointed as guardian of his son, and regent of his kingdom, his brother Attalus Philadelphus, who governed the kingdom one-and-twenty years.

Polybius bestows great praises on Eumenes. The body of that prince, says he, was weak and delicate, but his soul great, and abounding with the most noble sentiments. He was inferior to none of the kings⁴ who were his contemporaries in many other qualities, and excelled them all in the nobleness of his inclinations. The kingdom of Pergamus, when he received it from his father, consisted only of a very small number of cities, which scarce deserved that name. He rendered it so powerful, that it might have disputed pre-eminence with almost all the greatest kingdoms. He owed nothing either to chance or fortune;—I still use the words of Polybius. Every thing was the result of his prudence, assiduity, and activity. From his fondness for true glory, he did more good to Greece, and enriched more private persons, than any prince of his time. To finish his character, he possessed so fully the art of engaging the respect of his three brothers, and of keeping them within bounds by his authority, without letting them perceive it, that though they were all of age and capacity to act for themselves, and shared with him in the functions of the sovereignty, they never failed in point of submission, but continued always in perfect union, and, with equal zeal for his service, assisted him in defending and aggrandizing the kingdom. It would be difficult to find such an example of authority over brothers, joined with unalterable concord and union.

I ought not, in this place, to omit one thing, which does great honour to the memory of Eumenes; that is, his having founded the famous library of Pergamus, or at least considerably augmented it.

The division which had almost perpetually subsisted between Prusias and
 A. M. 3848. Eumenes,³ continued under Attalus,
 Ant. J. C. 156. who succeeded the latter. Prusias,

A. M. 3849. having been victorious in a battle, entered
 Ant. J. C. 155. Pergamus, and violently enraged and afflicted that he had failed of seizing

Attalus, let fall the weight of his revenge upon the statues and temples of the gods; burning and destroying all before him in his march. Attalus sent his brother Athenæus to Rome, to implore aid of the senate, who sent several embassies at different times to forbid Prusias to continue the war against Attalus; but he eluded those orders either by delays, or even by treachery, having once attempted, under pretence of an interview, to seize the Roman ambassador and Attalus. His design was discovered, and the execution of it prevented: but his crime was not the less upon that account. Rome at other times would have punished it with the destruction of his kingdom. She was at present contented with sending ten commissioners, with instructions to put an end to this war, and to oblige Prusias to make Attalus satisfaction for the damages he had done him. Attalus, however, with the aid of his allies, had assembled numerous forces both by sea and land. All things were prepared for opening the campaign, when news came that the commissioners were arrived. Attalus joined them. After some conferences upon the present affair, they set out for Bithynia, where they declared to Prusias the orders they were charged with from the senate. That prince was willing to accept part of the conditions prescribed him; but refused to comply with most of the rest. The commissioners, exasperated at his rejecting them, broke the alliance and amity with him, and resuming immediately their route to Pergamus, left Prusias in terrible apprehensions. They advised Attalus to keep with his army upon the frontiers of his kingdom, without being the first to commit hostilities; and some of them returned to Rome, to inform the senate of the rebellion of Prusias. At length he opened his eyes, and new commissioners from Rome obliged him to lay down his arms, and sign a treaty of peace which they presented him. This treaty imported, that Prusias should give immediately twenty decked ships to Attalus; that he should pay 500 talents (500,000 crowns) within twenty years; and that the two kings should keep within the bounds of their own dominions, as they stood before the war; that Prusias, in reparation of the damage he had done upon the lands of some neighbouring cities, which were named, should pay them 100 talents, (100,000 crowns.) When he had accepted and signed these conditions, Attalus drew off his troops both by sea and land into his own kingdom. In this manner ended the war occasioned by the differences between Attalus and Prusias.

Attalus the younger,⁶ the son of Eumenes when the peace was concluded between the two states, made a voyage to Rome, in order to make himself known to the senate, to demand the continuance of their amity, and, without doubt, to thank them also for the protection they had granted his uncle, who reigned in his name. He received from the senate all the marks of favour he could expect, and all the honours suitable to his years; after which he set out for his own dominions.

Prusias also sent afterwards his son
 Nicomedes to Rome;⁷ and knowing
 A. M. 3855. that he was highly respected there, Ant. J. C. 149. he gave him instructions to demand that the senate would remit him the remainder of the sum he was to pay Attalus. He joined Mennas with him in this embassy, to whom he had given secret orders to despatch the young prince, in order to advance his children by a second wife. The favour demanded by Prusias was refused, Attalus's ambassadors demonstrating that the whole sum was far from being equal to the losses his master had sustained.

Mennas, instead of executing the horrid commission he was charged
 A. M. 3856. with, discovered the whole to Ni- Ant. J. C. 148. comedes. The young prince having quitted Rome to return into Bithynia, thought it incumbent on him to prevent the murderous designs of his father. Supported by the assistance of Attalus, he revolted against him, and drew over the greatest part of the people to his side; for Prusias was universally hated for his oppressions and cruelties. That unfortunate prince, abandoned by all his subjects, took refuge in a temple, where he was slain by soldiers sent by Nicomedes, or, according to some, by Nicomedes himself. What horrors on each side. Prusias was called the hunter, and had reigned at least six-and-thirty years. It was with him Hannibal had taken refuge.

⁷ Appian. in Mithridat. p. 175. Justin. l. lxxv. c. 4.

The king of Bithynia's person had nothing in it to prejudice people in his favour; nor was his mind more to his advantage. He was in size but half a man, and a mere woman as to valour and bravery. He was not only timorous, but delicate, and incapable of fatigue; in a word, equally effeminate in body and mind; defects by no means amiable in a king, and least of all amongst the Bithynians. Polite learning, philosophy, and all other liberal sciences connected with them, were entirely foreign to him. In short, he had no manner of idea of moral rectitude or beauty. Night and day he lived a true Sardapalus. So that his subjects, upon the first dawn of hope, joined with the utmost ardour in measures against him, and to punish him in the same manner in which he had governed them.

I have deferred speaking of two embassies, which arrived at Rome very near the same time.

The one came from the Athenians, A. M. 349. who having been condemned by a sentence passed on them by the Sicyonians,¹ but under the authority of the Roman senate, in a fine of 500 talents, for having laid waste the lands of the city of Oropus, sent to demand the remission of that fine. The ambassadors were three celebrated philosophers; Carneades, of the sect of the Academics; Diogenes, of the Stoics; and Critolaus, of the Peripatetics. The taste for eloquence and philosophy had not yet made its way so far as Rome; it was about the time of which we are speaking that it began to spread there, and the reputation of these three philosophers did not a little contribute to it. The young people of Rome, who had any taste for the sciences, made it an honour and amusement to visit them, and were struck with admiration in hearing them, especially Carneades, whose lively and graceful eloquence, in which solidity and elegance were conjoined, transported and enchanted them. It was the general topic of conversation, that a Greek of extraordinary merit was arrived, who, from his great knowledge, was more than man, and who, in calming and softening the most violent passions by his eloquence, inspired youth with a kind of love, which made them renounce all other pleasures and employments, to devote themselves wholly to philosophy. He had for his auditors all the most considerable persons of Rome. His discourses, translated into Latin by one of the senators, were in all hands. All Rome saw, with great joy, their children apply themselves to the Grecian learning, and attach themselves to those wonderful men. Cato alone seemed sorry for it: apprehending that this taste for polite learning would extinguish that for military knowledge; and that they would prefer the glory of speaking to that of acting well. The example of the second Scipio Africanus, educated at the same time under the care of Polybius, in a taste for the sciences, demonstrates how ill-founded that prejudice of Cato's was. Be this as it may, he warmly reproached the senators for keeping the ambassadors so long in the city; and having caused the affair that brought them thither to be despatched, he hastened their departure. By a decree of the senate, the fine, in which the Athenians had been condemned, was mitigated, and the 500 talents reduced to 100.

The other embassy was sent by the people of Marseilles.² They had already been often harassed by the Ligurians: but at the time of which we now speak, they were reduced to the last extremities, and sent ambassadors to Rome to implore aid of the senate. They came to a resolution to send deputies to the Ligurians, to incline them to sentiments of peace and equity by mild measures and negotiation. Such conduct made them only the more haughty, and they carried their insolence so far as to offer indignities to the deputies, and to violate the law of nations in their persons. The senate being informed of this unhappy affair, made the consul Quintus Opimius march immediately against them with an army. He laid siege to the city where the insult had been offered to the Roman ambassadors, took it by storm, made slaves of the inhabitants, and sent the principal authors of the affront bound and fettered to Rome, to be punished there according to their deserts. The Ligurians were beaten in several battles, and cut to pieces. The victor distributed all the conquered lands amongst the people of Marseilles. He ordered the Ligurians to send hostages to Marseilles, which were to be exchanged for theirs from time to time; in order to lay a curb upon them and prevent them from molesting the people of Marseilles, as they had done till then.

Rome had always held the people of Marseilles in extreme consideration, founded upon their extraordinary merit, and the inviolable fidelity with which they had constantly adhered to the party of the Romans. They came originally from Phocæa, a city of Ionia. When Cyrus sent Harpagus to besiege it, the inhabitants, rather than submit to the yoke of the Barbarians, as so many others had done, embarked with their wives and children, and all their effects; and after various adventures, having cast a mass of red-hot iron into the sea, they all engaged themselves by oath never to return to Phocæa, till that iron should swim upon the water. Afterwards, having landed upon the coast of Gaul, near the mouth of the Rhone, they settled there by the consent of the king of the country, and built a city, since called Marseilles. Some authors suppose that this city was already in existence, and had been founded by an ancient colony of those same Phocæans in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, about the second year of the 45th Olympiad, and 600 years before the birth of Jesus Christ; and that those who fled from Harpagus, and came to settle here, were called the founders, because they greatly increased the extent and power of this city. This second foundation took place in the 60th Olympiad, about 540 years before the birth of Jesus Christ, when Servius Tullius reigned at Rome.

The king, who had received them into his dominions with great kindness, being dead, his son³ did not show them equal favour. The growing power of their city gave him umbrage. He was made to understand, that those strangers, whom he had received into his country as guests and suppliants, might one day make themselves masters of it by right of conquest. The fable of the bitch was made use of upon this occasion, that asked her companion to lend her her kennel only for eight days, till she had brought forth her whelps; then, by urgent entreaties, obtained a second term, that she might have time to bring them up; and at last, when they were grown large and strong, made herself absolute mistress and proprietor of the place, from whence she could never afterwards be expelled. The Marseillaise had, in consequence, at first a severe war upon their hands; but having been victorious, they continued in quiet possession of the lands that had been granted them, within the bounds of which they were not long confined.

In process of time they settled several colonies,⁴ and built several cities, Agde, Nice, Antibes, Olbia; which much extended their territory, and augmented their power. They had ports, arsenals, and fleets, which rendered them formidable to their enemies.

So many new settlements contributed to the spreading of the Greeks in Gaul,⁵ and occasioned a wonderful change in that country. The Gauls, quitting their ancient rusticity by degrees, began to be civilized, and to assume more gentle manners. Instead of breathing nothing but war, they accustomed themselves to the observance of the laws of a wise government. They learned to improve their lands, to cultivate vines, and to plant olives. Hence so surprising an alteration ensued,⁶ as well in the provinces as in the people who inhabited them, that it might have been said, Greece was not come to Gaul, but Gaul had been transferred into Greece.

The inhabitants¹ of the new city made very wise laws for its polity and government, which was aristocratical; that is to say, in the hands of the elders. The council of the city was composed of 600 senators, who continued in that function during life. Of that number fifteen were elected to take care of the current affairs, and three to preside in the assemblies, in quality of principal magistrates.

The right of hospitality was in singular estimation among the Marseillaise,² and practised by them with the most exalted humanity. To maintain the security of the asylum which they gave to strangers, no person was suffered to enter the city with arms. Certain persons were placed at the gates, whose business it was to take care of the arms of all who came in, and to return them when they went out.

All entrance was barred to such as might be inclined to introduce sloth and a voluptuous life; and particular care was taken to banish all double-dealing, falsehood, and fraud.

They piqued themselves especially upon sobriety, modesty, and frugality.³ The most considerable portion amongst them did not exceed 100 pieces of gold; that is to say, very near 100 pistoles. They were not allowed to lay out more than five in dress, and as many in jewels. Valerius Maximus,⁴ who lived in the reign of Tiberius, admires the regulations of government observed at Marseilles in his time. "That city," says he, "steadfastly retaining the ancient severity of manners,⁵ excludes from their theatre those comedians whose pieces generally turn upon the subject of unlawful love." The reason given for this maxim is still finer and more remarkable than the maxim itself: "Lest," adds the author, "a familiarity with such sort of shows should make the people the more apt to imitate them."

They would not admit in funeral ceremonies those indecent tears and lamentations with which they are generally attended, and ordered the obsequies to be terminated the same day by a domestic sacrifice, and an entertainment for the friends and relations of the deceased. "For is it consistent to abandon ourselves to immoderate affliction,⁶ or to be offended at the Divinity for not having thought fit to share his immortality with us?"

Tacitus makes mention of the city of Marseilles highly to its praise; the passage occurs in his Life of Julius Agricola, his father-in-law. After having spoken of the excellent education he had received from the care and tender affection of Julia Procilla,⁷ his mother, a lady of extraordinary virtue, who made him pass the early years of his youth in the study of those arts and sciences that suited his birth and age; he adds—"What had preserved him from the dangers and disorders to which youth is generally exposed, was, besides his own excellent disposition, the good fortune of having from his infancy the city of Marseilles for his school, in the manners of whose inhabitants, the politeness of the Greeks, and the simplicity and reserve of the provinces, were happily united."—Arcebat cum ab illecebris peccantium, præter ipsius bonam integramque naturam, quod statim parvulus sedem ac magistrum studiorum Massiliam habuerit, locum Græcæ comitate et provinciali parsimonia mistum ac bene compositum.

From what I have said, it may be seen, that Marseilles was become a celebrated school for politeness, wisdom, and virtue, and at the same time for all arts and sciences. Eloquence, philosophy, physic, mathematics, law, fabulous theology, and all kinds of literature, were publicly professed there. This city produced the most ancient of the learned men of the West,⁸ I mean Pytheas, an excellent geographer and astronomer, who lived in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, or indeed of Alexander the Great.

They persevered constantly in cultivating the arts and sciences with equal ardour and success. Strabo relates, that in his time (he lived in the reign of Augustus) the young nobility of Rome went to Marseilles for education; and he prefers that place to the city of Athens itself; which is saying a great deal. We have already seen that it still retained that privilege in the time of Tacitus the historian.

The Marseillaise distinguished themselves no less by the wisdom of their government, than by their capacity and taste for learning. Cicero, in one of his orations, praises highly their manner of governing their republic.⁹ "I am assured," says he, "that not only in Greece, but almost in all other nations, there is nothing comparable to the wise polity established at Marseilles. That city, so remote from the country, manners, and language, of all other Greeks, situate in Gaul, in the midst of barbarous nations which surround it on all sides, is so prudently directed by the counsels of its elders, that it is more easy to praise than imitate the wisdom of its government."

They laid it down as a fundamental rule of their politics,¹⁰ from which they never departed, to adhere invariably to the Romans, to whose manners their own were more conformable, than to those of the barbarians around them. Besides which, their neighbourhood to the Ligurians, to whom they were equally enemies, could not but contribute to unite them by their common interests; that union enabling each party to make powerful diversions on both sides of the Alps. They accordingly rendered the Romans great services at all times, and also received considerable aids from them upon many occasions.

Justin relates a fact,¹¹ which would be very much to the honour of the Marseillaise, if it were well authenticated. Having received advice that the Gauls had taken and burned Rome, they deplored that disaster which had befallen their allies, as much as if it had happened to their own city. Nor did they confine themselves to fruitless tears. Out of the gold and silver, either belonging to the public or private persons, they raised the sum in which the Gauls had taxed the conquered as the price of peace, and sent it to Rome. The Romans, infinitely affected with so noble an act of generosity, granted Marseilles the privilege of immunity, and the right of sitting amongst the senators at the public shows. It is certain that,¹² during the war with Hannibal, Marseilles aided the Romans with all manner of good offices; without permitting the ill successes which they experienced in the first years of the war, and which had deprived them of almost all their allies, to shake their fidelity in the least.

In the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, that city observed a conduct which well denotes the wisdom of its government. Cæsar,¹³ against whom they had shut their gates, caused the fifteen senators who were in supreme authority to come to his camp, and represented to them that he was sorry the war should begin by attacking their city; that they ought rather to submit to the authority of all Italy, than to abandon themselves blindly to the desires of one man; and he added all the motives most capable of persuading them. After having made their report to the senate, they returned into the camp, and gave Cæsar this answer. That they knew the Roman people were divided into two parties: that it did not belong to them to determine which had the right on their side: that the two heads of those parties were equally the protectors of their city; and at the same time its friends and benefactors. That for this reason, obliged to express their gratitude alike for both, it was incumbent upon them neither to assist nor receive the one into their city or ports to the prejudice of the other. They suffered a long siege, in which they showed all possible valour; but at length, the extreme necessity to which they were reduced, by the want of every thing, obliged them to surrender. However enraged Cesar was at so obstinate a resistance, he could not refuse to the ancient reputation of the city, the favour of saving it from being plundered, and of preserving its citizens.

I should have considered myself as in some measure detracting from the glory of the French nation, and from that of a city which holds one of the highest ranks in the kingdom, if I had not collected in this place part of those favourable reports which antiquity makes of it. I hope the reader will pardon this digression; which, besides, comes within my plan, and forms part of the Grecian history.

The affairs of Greece, Bithynia, Pergamus, and some other countries, which I thought it necessary to treat in a series, and without interruption, have made me suspend those of Macedonia, Syria, and Egypt; to which it is now time to return. I shall begin with Macedonia.

SECTION III.—ANDRISCUS, WHO GAVE HIMSELF OUT FOR THE SON OF PERSEUS, MAKES HIMSELF MASTER OF MACEDONIA, AND CAUSES HIMSELF TO BE PROCLAIMED KING. THE PRÆTOR JUVENTUS ATTACKS HIM, AND IS KILLED IN BATTLE, WITH PART OF HIS ARMY. METELLUS, WHO SUCCEEDS HIM, RETRIEVES THAT LOSS. THE USURPER IS OVERTHROWN, TAKEN, AND SENT TO ROME. A SECOND AND THIRD USURPER ARE ALSO DEFEATED.

FIFTEEN or sixteen years after the A. M. 3852. defeat and death of Perseus,¹ Ant. J. C. 152. Andiscus of Adramyttium, a city of Thracia, in Asia Minor, a person of the meanest birth, giving himself out for the son of Perseus, took upon him the name of Philip, and entered Macedonia, in hopes of making the inhabitants of the country acknowledge him for their king. He had invented a story in regard to his birth, which he reported wherever he passed, pretending that he was the son of Perseus by a concubine, and that the prince his father had caused him to be secretly brought up at Adramyttium, that, in case of ill fortune in the war against the Romans, some shoot of the royal line might remain. That after the death of Perseus, he had been nurtured and brought up at Adramyttium, till he was twelve years of age, and that the person who passed for his father, finding himself at the point of death, had revealed the secret to his wife, and intrusted her with a writing, signed by Perseus with his own hand, which attested all that has been said; which writing she was to deliver to him (Philip) as soon as he should attain to years of discretion. He added, that her husband having conjured her absolutely to conceal the affair till then, she had been most faithful in keeping the secret, and had delivered that important writing to him at the appointed time; pressing him to quit the country before the report should reach the ears of Eumenes, the declared enemy of Perseus, lest he should cause him to be put to death. He was in hopes that he should be believed upon his own word, and make Macedonia rise in his favour. When he saw that every thing there continued quiet, he retired into Syria, to the court of Demetrius Soter, whose sister Perseus had espoused. That prince, who immediately perceived the fraud, caused him to be seized and sent to Rome.

As he did not produce any proof of his pretended nobility, and had nothing in his mien or manners that expressed the prince, no great notice was taken of him at Rome, and he was treated with great contempt, without much trouble to keep a strict guard upon him, or to confine him close. He took advantage of the negligence of his guards, and made his escape from Rome.

Having found means to raise a considerable army amongst the Thracians, who entered into his views for the sake of delivering themselves by his means from the Roman yoke, he made himself master of Macedonia, either by consent or force, and assumed the marks of the royal dignity. Not content with this first conquest, which had cost him little, he attacked Thessaly, and subjected a part of it to his obedience.

The affair then began to seem more important to the Romans. They elected Scipio Nasica to go thither and appease this tumult in its birth, deeming him well qualified for that commission. He had, indeed, the art of managing men's minds, and of bringing them into his measures by persuasion; and if he should find it necessary to decide this affair by arms, he was very capable of forming a project with wisdom, and executing it with valour. As soon as he arrived in Greece, and had been fully informed of the state of affairs in Macedonia and Thessaly, he gave the senate advice of them; and, without loss of time, visited the cities of the allies, in order to the immediate raising of troops for the defence of Thessaly. The Acheans, who continued at that time the most powerful people of Greece, supplied him with the greatest number, forgetting past subjects of discontent. He presently took from the false Philip all the places he had possessed himself of in Thessaly, and drove him back into Macedonia.

However, it was plainly seen at Rome, from Scipio's letters, that Macedonia had occasion for a speedy support. The prætor, P. Juventius Thalna, had orders to repair thither as soon as possible with an army, which he did without loss of time. But looking upon Andiscus as only a pægant king, he did not think it incumbent upon him to take any great precautions against him, and engaged precipitately in a battle, wherein he lost his life, with part of his army; the rest saving themselves only by favour of the night. The victor, elate with this success, and believing his authority sufficiently established, abandoned himself to his vicious inclinations without any moderation or reserve; as if the truly being a king consisted in knowing no law nor rule of conduct but his passions. He was covetous, proud, insolent, and cruel. Nothing was seen every where but violence, confiscation of estates, and murders. Taking advantage of the terror occasioned by the defeat of the Roman army, he soon recovered all he had lost in Thessaly. An embassy sent to him from the Carthaginians, who were at that time actually at war with the Romans, promising him speedy supplies, very much augmented his courage.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus, lately elected prætor, had succeeded Juventius. Andiscus had resolved to advance to meet him, but did not think it proper to remove far from the sea, and halted at Pydna, where he fortified his camp. The Roman prætor soon followed him. The two armies were in view of each other, and skirmished every day. Andiscus gained an advantage of some consequence in a small combat of the cavalry. Success generally blinds and proves fatal to people of little experience. Andiscus believing himself superior to the Romans, sent off a great detachment to defend his conquests in Thessaly. This was a gross error; and Metellus, whose vigilance nothing escaped, did not fail to take advantage of it. The army that remained in Macedonia was beaten, and Andiscus obliged to fly. He retired amongst the Thracians, from whom he returned soon after with another army. He was so rash as to hazard another battle, which was still less successful than the former. He had above 25,000 men killed in these two battles; and nothing was wanted to the Roman glory, but to seize Andriscus, who had taken refuge with a petty king of Thrace, to whose fidelity he had abandoned himself. But the Thracians did not stand much upon breach of faith, and made that conducive to their interest. That prince delivered up his guest and suppliant into the hands of Metellus, to avoid drawing upon himself the wrath and arms of the Romans: Andriscus was sent to Rome.

Another adventurer, who also called himself the son of Perseus, and took upon him the name of Alexander, had the same fate with the first, except being seized by Metellus; he retired into Dardania, where he effectually concealed himself.

It was at this time that Macedonia was entirely subjected to the Romans, and reduced into a province.

A third usurper, some years after, appeared again upon the stage, and set himself up as the son of Perseus, under the name of Philip. His pretended royalty was but of short duration. He was overcome and killed in Macedonia by Tremellius, afterwards surnamed Scrofa, from having said that he would disperse the enemy, ut Scrofa porcos.

SECTION IV.—TROUBLES IN ACHAIA, WHICH DECLARES WAR AGAINST THE LACEDÆMONIANS. METELLUS SENDS DEPUTIES TO CORINTH TO APPEASE THOSE TROUBLES; THEY ARE ILL USED AND INSULTED. THEBES AND CHALCIS JOIN THE ACHÆANS. METELLUS, AFTER HAVING INEFFECTUALLY EXHORTED THEM TO PEACE, GIVES THEM BATTLE, AND DEFEATS THEM. THE CONSUL MUMMIUS SUCCEEDS HIM, AND AFTER HAVING GAINED A BATTLE, TAKES CORINTH, SETS IT ON FIRE, AND ENTIRELY DEMOLISHES IT. GREECE IS REDUCED INTO A ROMAN PROVINCE. VARIOUS ACTIONS AND DEATH OF POLYBIUS. TRIUMPHS OF METELLUS AND MUMMIUS.

METELLUS, after having pacified

A. M. 3857. Macedonia,¹ continued there some Ant. J. C. 147. time. Great commotions had arisen among the Achæan league, occasioned by the timidity and avarice of those who held the first offices in it. The resolutions of their assemblies were no longer guided by reason, prudence, and equity, but by the interest and passions of the magistrates, and the blind caprice of an untractable multitude. The Achæan league and Sparta had sent ambassadors to Rome, upon an affair about which they were divided. Damocritus, notwithstanding, who was the supreme magistrate of the Achæans, had caused war to be declared against Sparta. Metellus had sent to desire that hostilities might be suspended till the arrival of the commissioners from Rome, who had been appointed for terminating their differences. But neither he, nor Diæus, who succeeded him, paid any regard to that request. Both of them entered Laconia with their troops, and laid waste the country.

The commissioners being arrived, the assembly was summoned to Corinth; (Aurelius Orestes was at the head of the commission.) The senate had given them orders to weaken the body of the league; and, for that end, to separate as many cities as they could from it. Orestes notified to the assembly the decree of the senate; whereby Sparta, Corinth, Argos, Heraclea near mount Æta, and Orchomenus of Arcadia, were secluded from the league, under pretence that those cities did not originally compose a part of the body of the Achæans. When the deputies quitted the assembly, and reported this decree to the multitude, they grew furious, and fell upon all the Lacedæmonians they found in Corinth; tore those out of the house of the commissioners who had taken refuge there; and would have treated themselves no better, had they not escaped their violence by flight.

Orestes and his colleagues, on their return to Rome gave an account of what had passed. The senate was highly incensed at it, and immediately deputed Julius, with some other commissioners, into Achæia, but instructed them to complain in moderation, and only to exhort the Achæans not to give ear to bad counsels, lest by their imprudence they should incur disgrace with the Romans, a misfortune it was in their power to avoid, by punishing those who had exposed them to it. Carthage was not yet taken, so that it was necessary to act with caution in regard to allies so powerful as the Achæans. The commissioners met on their way a deputy sent by the seditious to Rome: they carried him back with them to Egium, where the diet of the nation had been summoned to assemble. They spoke in it with great moderation and mildness. They did not let slip a single word in their discourse concerning the ill treatment of the commissioners, or else made a better excuse for it than the Achæans themselves would have done; neither did they make any mention of the cities they had been desirous of separating from the league. They confined themselves to exhorting the assembly not to aggravate their first fault, nor to irritate the Romans any farther; and to leave Lacedæmonia in peace. Such moderate remonstrances were extremely agreeable to all the persons of sense in the assembly. But Diæus, Critolaus, and their faction, all chosen out of the vilest, most impious, and most pernicious persons in each city, blew up the flames of discord; insinuating that the lenity of the Romans proceeded only from the bad condition of their affairs in Africa, where they had been worsted in several engagements, and from the fear they were in lest the Achæan league should declare against them.

The commissioners, however, were treated with sufficient deference. They were told that Thearidas should be sent to Rome; that they had only to repair to Tegæa, to treat there with the Lacedæmonians, and to incline them to peace. They went thither accordingly, and persuaded the Lacedæmonians to an accommodation with the Achæans, and to suspend all hostilities till new commissioners should arrive from Rome to pacify all differences. But Critolaus's cabal took their measures in such a manner, that nobody, except that magistrate, went to the congress, and he did not arrive there till he was almost no longer expected. Conferences were held with the Lacedæmonians; but Critolaus would not accede to any measures. He said that he was not empowered to decide any thing without the consent of the nation, and that he would report the affair in the general diet, which could not be summoned in less than six months. That mean artifice, or rather breach of faith, exceedingly offended Julius. After having dismissed the Lacedæmonians, he set out for Rome, where he described Critolaus as a violent and extravagant man.

The commissioners were no sooner out of Peloponnesus, than Critolaus ran from city to city during the whole winter, and summoned assemblies, under colour of communicating what had been said to the Lacedæmonians, in the conferences held at Tegæa, but in fact to vent invectives against the Romans, and to put an odious construction upon all they had said, in order to inspire the same spirit of animosity and aversion which he himself had against them: and he succeeded but too well. He, besides, prohibited all judges from prosecuting and imprisoning any Achæan for debt, till the conclusion of the affair between the diet and Lacedæmon. By that means, whatever he said had all the effect he desired, and disposed the multitude to receive such orders as he thought fit to give them. Incapable of forming a right judgment of future consequences, they suffered themselves to be caught with the bait of the first advantage he proposed to them.

Metellus having received advice in Macedonia of the troubles in Peloponnesus, deputed thither four Romans of distinction, who arrived at Corinth at the time the council was assembled there. They spoke in it with abundance of moderation; exhorting the Achæans not to draw upon themselves, by imprudent rashness and levity, the resentment of the Romans. They were treated with contempt, and ignominiously turned out of the assembly. An innumerable crowd of workmen and artificers gathered about them, and insulted them. All the cities of Achaia were at that time in a kind of delirium; but Corinth was far more frantic than the rest, and abandoned to a kind of madness. They had been persuaded that Rome intended to enslave them all, and absolutely to destroy the Achaean league.

Critolaus seeing with pleasure that every thing succeeded to his wishes, harangued the multitude, inflamed them against the magistrates, who did not enter into his views; inveighed against the ambassadors themselves, animated them against the Romans; and gave them to understand, that it was not without having previously well concerted his measures that he had undertaken to make head against the Romans; that he had kings in his party, and that republics were also ready to join it. By these seditious discourses he prevailed to have war declared against the Lacedaemonians, and, in consequence, indirectly against the Romans. The ambassadors then separated. One of them repaired to Lacedaemon, to observe the motions of the enemy; another set out for Naupactus; and two waited the arrival of Metellus at Athens.

The magistrate of the Boeotians, whose name was Pytheas, equally rash and violent with Critolaus, entered into his measures, and engaged the Boeotians to join their arms with those of the Achaeans: they were discontented with a sentence Rome had given against them. The city of Chalcis suffered itself also to be drawn into their party. The Achaeans, with such feeble aids, believed themselves in a condition to support all the weight of the Roman power; so much were they blinded by their rage and fury.

The Romans had chosen Mummus for one of the consuls, and Ant. J. C. 146. charged him with the Achaean war.

Metellus, to deprive him of the glory of terminating this war, sent new ambassadors to the Achaeans, and commissioned them to promise that the Roman people should forget all that had passed, and pardon their faults, if they would return to their duty, and consent that certain cities, which had been nominated before, should be dismembered from the league. This proposal was rejected with disdain. Upon which Metellus advanced with his troops against the rebels. He came up with them near the city of Scaphaea in Locris, and obtained a considerable victory over them, in which he took more than 1000 prisoners. Critolaus disappeared in the battle, without its being known what became of him. It was supposed, that in the flight he had fallen into the marshes, and been drowned. Dicus took upon him the command in his stead, gave liberty to the slaves, and armed all the Achaeans and Arcadians capable of bearing arms. That body of troops amounted to 14,000 foot and 600 horse. He gave orders, besides, for the raising of troops in every city. The exhausted cities were in the utmost desolation. Many private persons, reduced to despair, laid violent hands upon themselves; others abandoned an unhappy country, where they foresaw their destruction was inevitable. Notwithstanding the extremity of these misfortunes, they never thought of adopting the only expedient that could prevent them. They detested the rashness of their chiefs, and nevertheless came into their measures.

Metellus, after the battle before-mentioned, fell in with 1000 Arcadians in Boeotia, near Cheronea, who were endeavouring to return into their own country: these were all put to the sword. From thence he marched with his victorious army to Thebes, which he found almost entirely deserted. Moved with the deplorable condition of that city, he ordered that the temples and houses should be spared; and that none of the inhabitants, either in the city or country, should be made prisoners or put to death. He excepted from that number Pytheas, the author of all their miseries, who was brought to him, and put to death. From Thebes, after having taken Megara, the garrison of which had retired upon his approach, he made his troops march to Corinth, where Dicus had shut himself up. He sent thither three of the principal persons of the league, who had taken refuge with him, to exhort the Achaeans to return to their duty, and accept the conditions of peace offered them. Metellus ardently desired to terminate the affair before the arrival of Mummus. The inhabitants, on their side, were equally desirous of seeing a period of their misfortunes; but that was not in their power, the faction of Dicus disposing of every thing. The deputies were thrown into prison, and would have been put to death, if Dicus had not seen the multitude extremely enraged at the punishment he had inflicted upon Socrates, who talked of surrendering to the Romans. The prisoners were therefore dismissed.

Things were in this condition when Mummus arrived. He had hastened his march, from the fear of finding every thing pacified at his arrival; and, lest another should have the glory of concluding this war. Metellus resigned the command to him, and returned into Macedonia. When Mummus had assembled all his troops, he advanced to the city, and encamped before it. A body of his advanced guard being negligent upon their post, the besieged made a sally, attacked them vigorously, killed many, and pursued the rest almost to the entrance of their camp. This small advantage very much encouraged the Achaeans, and thereby proved fatal to them. Dicus offered the consul battle. The latter, to augment his rashness, kept his troops within the camp, as if fear prevented him from accepting it. The joy and presumption of the Achaeans rose to an inexpressible height. They advanced furiously with all their troops, having placed their wives and children upon the neighbouring eminences, to be spectators of the battle, and caused a great number of carriages to follow them, for the purpose of loading them with the booty they should take from the enemy; so fully did they reckon upon the victory.

Never was confidence more rash or ill-founded. The faction had removed from the service and councils all such as were capable of commanding the troops, or conducting public business, and had substituted others in their room, without either talents or ability; in order that they might be more absolute masters of the government, and rule without opposition. The chiefs, without military knowledge, valour, or experience, had no other merit than a blind and frantic rage. They had already committed an excess of folly in unnecessarily hazarding a battle, which was to decide their fate, instead of thinking of a long and brave defence in so strong a place as Corinth, and of obtaining good conditions by a vigorous resistance. The battle was fought near Leucopatra, and the defile of the isthmus. The consul had posted part of his horse in an ambuscade, which they quitted at a proper time for charging the Achaean cavalry in flank; who, surprised by an unforeseen attack, gave way immediately. The infantry made a little more resistance; but, as it was neither covered nor sustained by the horse, it was soon broken and put to flight. If Dicus had retired into the place, he might have held out there for some time, and obtained an honourable capitulation from Mummus, whose sole aim was to put an end to the war. But abandoning himself to despair, he rode full speed to Megalopolis, his native country; and having entered his house, set fire to it, killed his wife to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy, drank poison, and thus ended his life in a manner worthy of the many crimes he had committed.

After this defeat, the inhabitants lost all hopes of defending themselves. As they found they were without counsel, leaders, courage, or fixed views, nobody had any thoughts of rallying the wreck of the army, in order to make any farther resistance, and oblige the victor to grant them some tolerable conditions. So that all the Achaeans who had retired into Corinth, and most of the citizens, quitted it the following night, to save themselves where they could. The consul, having entered the city, abandoned it to be plundered by the soldiers. All the men who were left in it were put to the sword, and the women and children sold; and after the statues, paintings, and richest furniture were removed, in order to their being carried to Rome, the houses were set on fire, and the whole city continued universally in flames for several days. It is pretended, though on no good ground, that the gold, silver, and brass, which were melted, and ran together in this conflagration, formed a new and precious metal. The walls were afterwards demolished, and razed to their very foundations. All this was executed by order of the senate, to punish the insolence of the Corinthians, who had violated the law of nations in their treatment of the ambassadors sent to them by Rome.

Thus was Corinth ruined, the same year that Carthage was taken and destroyed by the Romans, 852 years after its foundation by Alletes the son of Hippotes, sixth in descent from Hercules. It does not appear that they had any thoughts of raising new troops for the defence of the country, or summoned any assembly to deliberate upon the measures it was necessary to take; nor that any one took upon him to propose any remedy for the public calamities, or endeavoured to appease the Romans, by sending deputies to implore their clemency. One would have thought, from this general inactivity, that the Achaean league had been entirely buried in the ruins of Corinth: so much had the dreadful destruction of that city alarmed and universally dismayed the people.

The cities that had joined in the revolt of the Achaeans, were also punished by the demolishing of their walls, and being disarmed. The ten commissioners sent by the senate to regulate the affairs of Greece, in conjunction with the consul, abolished the popular government in all the cities, and established magistrates in them, who were to have a certain revenue out of the public funds. In other respects, they were left in possession of their laws and liberty. They abolished also all the general assemblies held by the Achaeans, Boeotians, Phocaeans, and other people of Greece; but they were re-established soon after. Greece, from that time, was reduced into a Roman province, called the province of Achaia, because at the taking of Corinth, the Achaeans were the most powerful people of Greece: the Roman people sent a praetor thither every year to govern it.

Rome, by destroying Corinth in this manner, thought proper to show that example of severity, in order to strike terror into other nations, whom its too great clemency rendered bold, rash, and presuming, from the hope they had of obtaining from the Roman people pardon for their faults. Besides which, the advantageous situation of that city, where such as revolted might lodge themselves, and make it a place of arms against the Romans, determined them to ruin it entirely. Cicero,¹ who did not disapprove of Carthage and Numantia being used in that manner, could have wished that Corinth had been spared.

The booty taken at Corinth was sold, and considerable sums raised from it. Among the paintings, there was a piece drawn by the most celebrated hand² in Greece, representing Bacchus,³ the beauty of which was not known to the Romans, who were at that time entirely ignorant in the polite arts. Polybius, who was then in the country, as I shall soon observe, had the mortification to see that painting serve the soldiers for a table to play at dice upon. It was adjudged to Attalus, in the sale made of the booty, for 600,000 sesterces, that is, about 3625*l.* sterling. Pliny mentions another picture of the same painter's, which the same Attalus purchased for 100 talents, or 100,000 crowns. That prince's riches were immense, and were become a proverb: Attalicis conditionibus. Nevertheless, those sums seem repugnant to probability.

Be this as it may, the consul, surprised that the price of the painting in question should rise so high, interposed his authority, and retained it, contrary to public faith, and notwithstanding the complaints of Attalus; because he imagined there was some hidden virtue in the piece, unknown to him. He did not act in that manner for his private interest, nor with the view of appropriating it to himself, since he sent it to Rome, to be applied in adorning the city. In doing which,⁴ says Cicero, he adorned and embellished his house much more essentially than if he had placed that picture in it. The taking of the richest and most opulent city of Greece, did not enrich him one farthing. Such noble disinterestedness was at that time common in Rome, and seemed less the virtue of private persons, than of the age itself. To take the advantage of office and command for enriching a man's self, was not only shameful and infamous, but a criminal abuse. The painting we speak of was set up in the temple of Ceres, whither judges went to see it through curiosity, as a masterpiece of art; and it remained there till it was burnt with that temple.

Mummius was a great warrior, and a worthy man, but had neither learning, knowledge of the arts, nor taste for painting or sculpture, the merit of which he did not discern; not believing there was any difference between picture and picture, or statue and statue, nor that the name of the great masters in those arts gave them their value. This he fully exemplified upon the present occasion. He had ordered persons to take the care of transporting many of the paintings and statues of the most excellent masters to Rome.⁵ Never would loss have been so irreparable, as that of such a deposit, consisting of the masterpieces of those rare artists, who contributed almost as much as the great captains, to the rendering of their age glorious to posterity. Mummius, however, in recommending the care of that precious collection to those to whom he confided them, threatened them very seriously, that if the statues, paintings, and other things, with which he intrusted them, should be either lost or spoiled upon the way, he would oblige them to find others at their own cost and charges.

Were it not to be wished, says an historian, who has preserved to us this fact, that this happy ignorance still subsisted; and would not such grossness be infinitely preferable, in regard to the public good, to the extreme delicacy of taste of the present age for such sort of rarities? He spoke at a time when that taste for excellent paintings gave the magistrates an occasion for committing all manner of frauds and robberies in the provinces.

I have said that Polybius, in returning into Peloponnesus, had the affliction to see the destruction and burning of Corinth, and his country reduced into a province of the Roman empire. If any thing was capable of giving him consolation in so mournful a conjuncture,⁶ it was the opportunity of defending the memory of Philopœmen, his master in the science of war. I have already observed, that a Roman having taken it into his head to have the statues erected to that hero taken down, had the impudence to prosecute him criminally, as if he had been still alive and to accuse him before Mummius, of having been an enemy to the Romans, and of having always opposed their designs to the utmost of his power. The accusation was extravagant, but had some colour in it, and was not entirely without foundation. Polybius boldly took upon him his defence. He represented Philopomen as the greatest captain Greece had produced in the latter times: that he might, perhaps, have occasionally carried his zeal for the liberty of his country a little too far, but that he had rendered the Roman people considerable services upon several occasions; as in their wars against Antiochus and the Etolians. The commissioners, before whom he pleaded so noble a cause, moved with his reasons, and still more with his gratitude for his master, decreed, that the statues of Philopomen should continue as they were in every city where they had been erected. Polybius, taking the advantage of Mummus' good disposition, demanded also the statues of Aratus and Achæus; which were granted him, though they had already been carried out of Peloponnesus into Acarnania. The Achæans were so charmed with the zeal which Polybius had expressed upon this occasion for the honour of the great men of his country, that they erected a statue of marble to himself.

He gave at the same time a proof of his disinterestedness, which did him as much honour among his citizens, as his defence of the memory of Philopomen. After the destruction of Corinth, it was thought proper to punish the authors of the insult offered to the Roman ambassadors, and their estates and effects were sold by auction. When those of Dæzus were put up, who had been the principal in that affront, the ten commissioners ordered the quaestor who sold them to let Polybius select whatever he thought fit out of them, without taking any thing from him upon that account. He refused the offer, advantageous as it appeared, and would have thought himself in some measure an accomplice of that wretch's crimes, had he accepted any part of his effects: besides which, he believed it infamous to enrich himself out of the spoils of his fellow-citizen. He would not only accept nothing himself, but exhorted his friends not to desire any thing that had appertained to Dæzus; and all that followed his example were extremely applauded.

This action made the commissioners conceive so high an esteem for Polybius, that upon their leaving Greece, they desired him to go through all the cities which had been lately conquered, and to accommodate their differences, till time had accustomed them to the change which had been made, and to the new laws prescribed them. Polybius discharged that honourable commission with so much mildness, justice, and prudence, that no farther contests arose in Achæa, either in regard to the government in general, or the affairs of private persons. In gratitude for so great a benefit, statues were erected to him in different places; upon the base of one of which was this inscription: "That Greece would have been guilty of no errors, if she had hearkened from the first to the counsels of Polybius; but, that after she had committed these errors, he alone had been her deliverer."

Polybius, after having established order and tranquillity in his country, returned to join Scipio at Rome, from whence he accompanied him to Nunantia, at the siege of which he was present. When Scipio was dead, he returned into Greece; and having enjoyed there the esteem, gratitude, and affection, of his beloved citizens, he died at the age of fourscore and two years, of a hurt he received by a fall from his horse.

Metellus, upon his return to Rome, was honoured with a triumph, as conqueror of Macedonia and Achæa, and surnamed Macedonicus. The false king, Andriceus, was led before his chariot. Among the spoils, he caused what was called the troop of Alexander the Great to be carried in the procession. That prince, at the battle of the Granicus, having lost five-and-twenty of his friends, ordered Lisippus, the most excellent artist in that way, to make, in honour of each of them, an equestrian statue, to which he added his own. These statues were set up in Di-um, a city of Macedonia. Metellus caused them to be transported to Rome, and adorned his triumph with them.

Mummus obtained also the honour of a triumph; and, in consequence of having conquered Achæa, was surnamed Achæicus. He exhibited a great number of statues and paintings in this triumph, which were afterwards the ornaments of the public buildings at Rome, and of several other cities of Italy; but not one of them entered the conqueror's own house.

SECTION V.—REFLECTIONS UPON THE CAUSES OF THE GRANDEUR, DECLENSION AND RUIN OF GREECE.

AFTER having seen the final ruin of Greece, which has supplied us through a series of so many ages with such fine examples of heroic virtues and memorable events, we may be permitted to retrace our steps, and to consider succinctly, and at one view, its rise, progress, and declension. The whole time of its duration may be divided into four ages.

The first and second ages of Greece.

I shall not dwell upon the ancient origin of the Greeks, nor the fabulous times before the Trojan war; which makes the first age, and constitute, if I may so say, the infancy of Greece.

The second age, which extends from the taking of Troy to the reign of Darius I. king of Persia, was in a manner its youth, in which it formed, fortified, and prepared itself for those great things which it was afterwards to perform; and laid the foundations of that power and glory, which at length rose so high, and became the admiration of all future ages.

The Greeks, as Monsieur Bossuet observes,¹ whose mental faculties were naturally vigorous, had been cultivated by settlements and colonies which came from Egypt, who, sitting in several parts of the country, spread, wherever they came, the excellent polity of the Egyptians. It was from them they learned the exercises of the body; wrestling, the horse, foot and chariot races, and the other combats, which they carried to their highest perfection, by means of the glorious crowns given to the victors in the Olympic games. But the best thing taught them by the Egyptians, was to be docile and obedient, and to suffer themselves to be guided by laws for the good of the public. They were not private persons, who regard nothing but their own interests and concerns, and have no sense of the calamities of the state, but as they suffer themselves, or as the repose of their own family is involved in them: the Greeks were taught to consider themselves and their families as part of a greater body, which was that of the state. The fathers brought up their children in this opinion; and the children were taught from their cradle to look upon their country as their common mother, to whom they more strictly appertained than to their parents.

The Greeks, disciplined thus by degrees, believed they were capable of governing for themselves: and most of the cities formed themselves into republics, under different forms of government, which had all of them liberty for their vital principle: but that liberty was wise, reasonable, and subservient to the laws. The advantage of this government was, that the citizens loved their country the better from transacting their affairs in common, and from being all equally capable of attaining to its honours and dignities. Besides this, the condition of private persons, to which all returned when they quitted their office, prevented them from abusing an authority, of which they might soon be deprived; whereas, power often becomes haughty, unjust, and oppressive, when under no restraints, and when it is to have a long or continual duration.

The love of labour removed the vices and passions which generally occasion the ruin of states. They led a laborious and busy life, intent upon the cultivation of their lands, and of the arts, and not excluding the husbandman nor the artificer from the first dignities of the state; preserving between all the citizens and members of the state a great equality, void of pomp, luxury, or ostentation. He who had commanded the army for one year, fought the next in the rank of a private officer, and was not ashamed of the most common functions in the armies either by land or sea.

The reigning characteristic in all the cities of Greece, was a particular affection for poverty, a mediocrity of fortune, simplicity in buildings, furniture, dress, equipage, domestics, and table. It is surprising to consider the small recompense with which they were satisfied for their application in public employments, and for the services which they had rendered the state.

What might not be expected from a people formed in this manner, educated and nurtured in these principles, and imbued from their earliest infancy with maxims so proper to exalt the soul, and to inspire it with great and noble sentiments? The effects exceeded every idea and every hope that could possibly have been conceived of them.

The third age of Greece.

We now come to the glorious times of Greece, which have been, and will for ever be, the admiration of all ages. The merit and virtue of the Greeks, shut up within the compass of their cities, had hitherto but faintly dawned, and shone with but a feeble ray. To produce and place them in their full light, some great and important occasion was necessary, wherein Greece, attacked by a formidable enemy, and exposed to extreme dangers, was compelled in some measure to quit her home, and to show herself abroad in her true character in open day. And this was supplied by the Persians in their invasions of Greece, first under Darius and afterwards under Xerxes. All Asia, armed with the whole force of the East, overflowed on a sudden, like an impetuous torrent, and came pouring with innumerable troops, both by sea and land, against a little spot of Greece, which seemed under the necessity of being entirely swallowed up and overwhelmed at the first shock. Two small cities, however, Sparta and Athens, not only resist those formidable armies, but attack, defeat, pursue, and destroy, the greatest part of them. Let the reader call to mind (for the recollection of them is all I have here in view) the prodigies of valour and fortitude which shone forth at that time, and continued to do so long after on like occasions.

To what were the Greeks indebted for such astonishing successes, so much above all probability, unless to the principles I have mentioned, which were profoundly engraven in their hearts by education, example, and practice; and were become by long habit a second nature in them?

Those principles, we cannot repeat it too often, were the love of poverty, contempt of riches, disregard of self-interest, attachment to the public good, desire of glory, love of their country; but above all, such a zeal for liberty, as no danger was capable of intimidating; and such an irreconcilable abhorrence for every one who in the slightest degree attempted to encroach upon it, as united their counsels, and put an end to all dissension and discord in a moment.

There was some difference between the republics as to authority and power, but none in regard to liberty; on that side they were perfectly equal. The states of ancient Greece were exempt from that ambition which occasions so many wars in monarchies; and had no thoughts of aggrandizing themselves or making conquests, at the expense of each other. They confined themselves to the cultivation, improvement, and defence, of their own territories, but did not endeavour to usurp any thing from their neighbours. The weaker cities in the peaceable possession of their domain, did not apprehend invasion from the more powerful. This occasioned such a multitude of cities, republics, and states of Greece, which subsisted to the latest times in a perfect independence, retaining their own forms of government, with the laws, customs, and usages, derived from their forefathers.

When we examine with some attention the conduct of these people, either at home or abroad, their assemblies, deliberations, and motives for the resolutions they take, we cannot sufficiently admire the wisdom of their government; and we are tempted to ask ourselves, from whence could arise this greatness of soul in the burghers of Sparta and Athens; whence these noble sentiments, this consummate wisdom in politics, this profound and universal knowledge in the art of war; whether as relating to the invention and construction of machines for the attack and defence of places, or to the drawing up of an army in battle, and disposing of all its movements; and lastly, that supreme ability in maritime affairs, which always rendered their fleets victorious, which so gloriously acquired them the empire of the sea, and obliged the Persians to renounce it for ever by a solemn treaty?

We see here a remarkable difference between the Greeks and Romans. The latter, immediately after their conquests, suffered themselves to be corrupted by pride and luxury. After Antiochus had submitted to the Roman yoke, Asia, subdued by their victorious arms, conquered in turn its conquerors by its riches and voluptuousness; and that change of manners was very sudden and rapid, especially after Carthage, the haughty rival of Rome, was destroyed. It was not so with the Greeks. Nothing was more brilliant than the victories they had gained over the Persians; nothing more soothing than the glory they had acquired by their great and illustrious exploits. After that so glorious era, the Greeks still persevered for a long time in the same love of simplicity, frugality, and poverty: the same aversion to pomp and luxury; the same zeal and ardour for the defence of their liberty, and the preservation of their ancient manners. It is well known how much the islands and provinces of Asia Minor, over which the Greeks so often triumphed, were abandoned to effeminate pleasures and luxury; they, however, never suffered themselves to be affected by that contagious softness, and constantly preserved themselves from the vices of the conquered people. It is true, they did not make those countries provinces; but mere intercourse and example alone might have proved very dangerous to them.

The introduction of gold and silver into Sparta, from whence they had till that time been banished under severe penalties, did not happen till about fourscore years after the battle of Salamis, and the ancient simplicity of manners subsisted very long afterwards, notwithstanding that violation of the laws of Lycurgus. As much may be said of the rest of Greece; which did not grow weak and degenerate, but slowly and by degrees. This is what remains for us to show.

The fourth age of Greece.

The principal cause of the weakening and declension of the Greeks was the disunion which rose up amongst themselves. The Persians, who had found them invincible on the side of arms, as long as their union subsisted, applied their whole attention and policy in sowing the seeds of discord amongst them. For that purpose they employed their gold and silver, which succeeded much better than their steel and arms had done before. The Greeks, covertly attacked in this manner by bribes, secretly conveyed into the hands of those who had the greatest share in their government, were divided by domestic jealousies, and turned against themselves those victorious arms which had rendered them superior to their enemies.

Their decline of power from these causes enabled Philip and Alexander to subject them. Those princes, to accustom them to servitude by gentle degrees, assumed as a pretext the design of avenging them upon their ancient enemies. The Greeks fell blindly into that gross snare, which gave the mortal blow to their liberty. Their avengers became more fatal to them than their enemies. The yoke imposed on them by the hands which had conquered the universe could never be removed; those little states were no longer in a condition to shake it off. Greece, from time to time, animated by the remembrance of its ancient glory, roused from its lethargy, and made some attempts to reinstate itself in its ancient condition: but those were the efforts of expiring liberty, ill concerted, and ill sustained, and tended only to augment its slavery, because the protectors, whom it called in to its soon made themselves its masters. So that all it did was to change its fetters, and to make them the heavier.

The Romans at length totally subjected it; but it was by degrees, and with abundance of artifice. As they continually pushed on their conquests from province to province, they perceived that they should find a barrier to their ambitious projects in Macedonia, formidable by its neighbourhood, advantageous situation, reputation in arms, and very powerful in itself, and by its allies. The Romans artfully applied to the small states of Greece, from whom they had less to fear, and endeavoured to gain them by the attractive charms of liberty, which was their darling passion, and of which they knew how to awaken in them their ancient ideas. After having, with great address, made use of the Greeks to reduce and destroy the Macedonian power, they subjected all those states, one after another, under various pretexts. Greece was thus swallowed up at last in the Roman empire, and became a province of it under the name of Achaia.

It did not lose with its power that ardent passion for liberty which was its peculiar characteristic.¹ The Romans, when they reduced it into a province, reserved to the people almost all their privileges; and Sylla,² who punished them so cruelly sixty years after, for having favoured the arms of Mithridates, did not abridge those of their liberty who escaped his vengeance. In the civil wars of Italy, the Athenians were seen to espouse with warmth the party of Pompey,³ who fought for the republic. Julius Cæsar revenged himself upon them no otherwise than by declaring, that he pardoned them out of consideration for their ancestors. But, after Cæsar was killed, their inclination for liberty made them forget his clemency. They erected statues to Brutus and Cassius near those of Harmodius and Aristogiton, the ancient deliverers of Athens, and did not take them down till solicited by Antony, when become their friend, benefactor, and magistrate.

After having been deprived of their ancient power, they still retained another sovereignty, which the Romans could not take from them, and to which themselves were obliged to pay homage. Athens continued always the metropolis of the sciences, the school of polite arts, and the centre and standard of refined taste in all the productions of the mind. Several cities, as Byzantium, Casarea, Alexandria, Ephesus, and Rhodes, shared that glory with Athens, and after her example opened schools which became very famous. Rome, haughty as she was, acknowledged this glorious empire. She sent her most illustrious citizens to be finished and refined in Greece. They were instructed there in all the parts of sound philosophy, the knowledge of mathematics, the science of natural philosophy, the rules of moral duties, the art of reasoning with justice and method: all the treasures of eloquence were imbibed there, and the method taught of treating the greatest subjects with propriety, force, elegance, and perspicuity.

A Cicero, already the admiration of the bar, conceived he wanted something, and did not blush to become the disciple of the great masters whom Greece then produced. Pompey, in the midst of his glorious conquests, did not think it a dishonour to him, in passing through Rhodes, to hear the celebrated philosophers who taught there with great reputation, and to make himself in some measure their disciple.

Nothing shows better the respect retained for the ancient reputation of Greece, than a letter of Pliny the younger.⁴ He writes in this manner to Maximus, who was appointed governor of that province by Trajan: "call to mind, my dear Maximus, that you are going into Achaia, the true Greece; the same Greece where learning and the polite arts had their birth; where even agriculture was invented, according to the common opinion. Remember that you are sent to govern free cities and freemen, if ever any such there were; who by their virtues, actions, alliances, treaties, and religion, have known how to preserve the liberty they received from nature. Reverse the gods, their founders: respect their heroes, the ancient glory of their nation, and the sacred antiquity of their cities; the dignity, great exploits, and even fables and vanity, of that people. Remember, it is from those sources that we have derived our code of equity: that we did not impose our laws upon them, after we had conquered them, but that they gave us theirs at our request before they were acquainted with the power of our arms. In a word, it is to Athens you are going; it is at Lacedæmon you are to command. It would be inhuman and barbarous to deprive them of that faint image, that shadow which they retain of their ancient liberty."

Whilst the Roman empire was declining, that empire of genius of the mind always supported itself, without participating in the revolutions of the other. Greece was resorted to for education and improvement from all parts of the world. In the fourth and fifth centuries, those great lights of the church, St. Basil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. John Chrysostom went to Athens, to imbibe, as at their source, all the profane sciences. The emperors themselves, who could not go to Greece, brought Greece in a manner home to them, by receiving the most celebrated philosophers into their palaces, in order to intrust them with the education of their children, and to improve themselves by their instructions. Marcus Aurelius, even whilst he was emperor, went to hear the philosophers Apollonius and Sextus, and to take lessons from them as a common disciple.

By a new kind of victory, unknown before, Greece had imposed its laws on Egypt and the whole East, from whence she had expelled barbarism, and introduced a taste for the arts and sciences in its room: obliging, by a kind of right of conquest, all those nations to receive her language and adopt her customs: a testimonial highly for the glory of a people, and which argues a much more illustrious superiority than that which is not founded on merit, but solely upon the force of arms. Plutarch observes somewhere, that no Greek ever thought of learning Latin, and that a Roman who did not understand Greek was in no great estimation.

ARTICLE III.

It might be expected, that after the subjection of Macedonia and Greece to the Romans, our history, confined for the future to two principal kingdoms, those of Egypt and Syria, should become more clear and intelligible than ever. I am, however, obliged to own, that it will be more obscure and perplexed than it has been hitherto, especially in regard to the kingdom of Syria, in which several kings not only succeed one another in a short space, but sometimes reign jointly, and at the same time to the number of three or four, which occasions a confusion difficult to unravel, and from which I find it hard to extricate myself. This induces me to prefix in this place the names, succession, and duration, of the reigns of the kings of Egypt and Syria. This short chronological abridgment may contribute to cast some light upon facts which are exceedingly complex, and serve as a clue to guide the reader in a kind of labyrinth, where the most clear-sighted will have occasion for assistance. It enlarges the work a little, but it may be passed over, or be referred to only when it is necessary to be set right: I insert it here only with that view.

This third article contains the space of 100 years for the kingdom of Egypt, from the twentieth year of Ptolemy Philometor, to the expulsion of Ptolemy Auletes from the throne: that is, from the year of the world 3945 to the year 3946.

As to the kingdom of Syria, the same article contains also almost the space of 100 years from Antiochus Eupator to Antiochus Asiaticus, under whom Syria became a province of the Roman empire; that is, from the year of the world 3840 to the year 3939.

A CHRONOLOGICAL ABRIDGMENT OF THE HISTORY IN THE THIRD ARTICLE.

A.M.	KINGS OF EGYPT.	KINGS OF SYRIA.
3824	PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR. He reigned something more than thirty-four years. This article contains only the fourteen latter years of his reign.	ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, aged nine years, succeeds his father Antiochus Epiphanes. He reigns only two years.
3840		DEMETRIUS SOTER, son of Seleucus Philopator, having escaped from Rome, ascends the throne.
3842	Differences between Philometor and his younger brother Euergetes, or Physcon.	Bala, under the name of Alexander, giving himself out for the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, seizes the throne of Syria. He is supported by the Romans.
3854		Demetrius is killed in a battle. He had reigned twelve years.
3856		ALEXANDER BALA. He reigns almost five years. Ptolemy Philometor declares against him in favour of Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter.
3859	PTOLEMY EUERGETES, otherwise called Physcon, brother of Philometor, ascends the throne, and marries Cleopatra, Philometor's wife.	DEMETRIUS NICATOR.
3860		ANTIOCHUS THEOS, son of Bala supported by Tryphon, seizes part of the kingdom.
3861		DIDOTUS TRYPHON, after having got rid of his pupil Antiochus ascends the throne.
3863		Demetrius marches against the Parthians, who take him prisoner, and confine him. He had reigned seven years.
3864		ANTIOCHUS SIDETES, brother of Demetrius, after having overthrown Tryphon, and put him to death, is declared king. Cleopatra, Demetrius' wife, marries him.
3873		Antiochus Sidetes marches against the Parthians.
3874	Physcon expels Cleopatra his wife, and marries her daughter, named also Cleopatra. He is compelled to fly. The Alexandrians restore the government to Cleopatra, his first wife.	The Parthians send back Demetrius into Syria. Antiochus is slain.
3877	Physcon re-ascends the throne.	Demetrius is killed by Zebina. Cleopatra, wife of Demetrius, retains part of the kingdom after his death.
3880		ALEXANDER ZEBINA, supported by Physcon, expels Demetrius from the throne, who is killed soon after.
3881		SELEUCUS V. eldest son of Demetrius, is declared king, and soon after killed by Cleopatra.
3882	Physcon gives his daughter Tryphena to Grypus.	ANTIOCHUS GRYPUS, his younger brother, is placed on the throne by Cleopatra.
3884		Zebina is overcome by Grypus and dies soon after.
3887	Death of Physcon. He had reigned twenty-nine years.	Cleopatra designs to poison Grypus, and is poisoned herself.
3890	PTOLEMY LATHYRUS, or SOTER, succeeds Physcon.
3891	Cleopatra, his mother, obliges him to repudiate Cleopatra his eldest sister, and marry Selene his youngest sister.
3891	Cleopatra gives the kingdom of Cyprus to Alexander her youngest son.	ANTIOCHUS THE CYZICENIAN, son of Cleopatra and ANTIOCHUS Sidetes, takes arms against Grypus.
		Cleopatra, whom Lathyrus had been obliged to repudiate, marries the Cyzicenean. She is killed by the order of Tryphena, wife of Grypus.

A.M.	KINGS OF EGYPT.	KINGS OF SYRIA.
3892		The Cyzicenean gains a victory over Grypus, and drives him out of Syria.
3893		The two brothers are reconciled, and divide the empire of Syria.
3897	Cleopatra expels Lathyrus from Egypt: he had reigned ten years. She sets his younger brother Alexander upon the throne.
2903	She gives her daughter Selene, whom she had taken from Lathyrus, in marriage to Antiochus Grypus.	Cleopatra gives her daughter Selene to Antiochus Grypus.
3907		Death of Grypus. He had reigned twenty-seven years. SELEUCUS, his son, succeeds him.
3910		Antiochus the Cyzicenean is overthrown, and put to death.
3911		ANTIOCHUS EUSEBES, son of the Cyzicenean, causes himself to be declared king. Eusebes marries Selene, widow of Grypus.
3912		ANTIOCHUS XI. brother of Seleucus, and second son of Grypus, assumes the diadem, and is killed by Eusebes.
3913		PHILIP, his brother, third son of Grypus, succeeds him.
3914		DEMETRIUS EUCHERES, fourth son of Grypus, is established upon the throne at Damascus, by the assistance of Lathyrus.
3915	Alexander kills his mother Cleopatra.
1916	Alexander is expelled himself: he had reigned nineteen years. He dies soon after. LATHYRUS is recalled.	Eusebes, overthrown by Philip and Demetrius, takes refuge amongst the Parthians. He is re-established upon the throne by their means.
3918		Demetrius having been taken by the Parthians, ANTIOCHUS DIONYSIUS, fifth son of Grypus, is placed upon the throne at Damascus, and is killed the following year.
3921		The Syrians weary of so many divisions and revolutions, elect as king, TIGRANES KING OF ARMENIA. He reigns by a viceroy fourteen years.
3923	Death of Lathyrus. ALEXANDER II. son of Alexander I. under Sylla's protection, is chosen king. He marries Cleopatra, otherwise called Berenice, and kills her seventeen days after. He reigned fifteen years.	Eusebes takes refuge in Cilicia, where he remains concealed. Selene, his wife, retains part of Phenicia and Coele-syria, and gives her two sons a good education.
3935		Syria being unprovided with troops, ANTIOCHUS ASIATICUS, son of Antiochus Eusebes, takes possession of some part of the country, and reigns there during four years.
3939	The Alexandrians expel Alexander. PTOLEMY AULETES, bastard son of Lathyrus, is placed upon the throne.	Pompey deprives Antiochus Asiaticus of his dominions, and reduces Syria into a province of the Roman empire. The family of the Seleucidæ is extinct with him.

SECTION II.—ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, AT THE AGE OF NINE YEARS, SUCCEEDS HIS FATHER ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES IN THE KINGDOM OF SYRIA. DEMETRIUS, WHO HAD BEEN LONG A HOSTAGE AT ROME, DEMANDS, IN VAIN, PERMISSION TO RETURN TO SYRIA. CELEBRATED VICTORIES OF JUDAS MACCABEUS AGAINST THE GENERALS OF THE KING OF SYRIA, AND THE KING HIMSELF IN PERSON. LONG DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE TWO BROTHERS (THE PTOLEMIES, KINGS OF EGYPT) TERMINATED AT LENGTH BY A HAPPY PEACE.

WE have long lost sight of the history of the kings of Syria, and that of the kings of Egypt,¹ which are, for the most part, pretty closely connected with each other. I am now going to resume it, and it will not be interrupted any more.

Antiochus, surnamed Eupator, A. M. 3840. aged only nine years,² succeeded Ant. J. C. 164. his father Antiochus Epiphanes, in the kingdom of Syria. The latter, at his death, sent for Philip, his favourite, who had been brought up with him. He gave him the regency of the kingdom during his son's minority, and put his crown, signet, and all other marks of the royal dignity into his hands; recommending to him, above all things, to employ his whole care in educating his son in such a manner as was most proper to instruct him in the art of reigning.

Philip, on his arrival at Antioch, found that another had already usurped the employment which the late king had confided to him. Lysias, upon the first advice of the death of Epiphanes, had placed his son Antiochus upon the throne, whose governor he was, and had taken upon himself, with the guardianship of the young prince, the reins of government, without any regard to the king's regulation at his death. Philip knew well that he was not at that time in a condition to dispute it with him, and retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding at that court the assistance he wanted to instate him in his right, and to expel the usurper.

Much about the same time, Ptolemy Macron, governor of Coele-syria and Palestine, from an enemy, which till then he had been to the Jews, became on a sudden their friend; moved, as the Scripture says, with the flagrant injustice which had been committed towards them. He put a stop to the rigour of the persecution against them, and employed his whole influence to obtain a peace for them. By this conduct he gave his enemies occasion to injure him. They prejudiced the king against him, by representing him perpetually as a traitor; because he had in reality betrayed the interests of his first master, Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, who had intrusted him with the government of the island of Cyprus, and had given up that island to Antiochus Epiphanes, upon entering into his service. For how advantageous soever the treason might be, the traitor, as is usual, was hated. At length they so far succeeded by their clamours and cabals, that he was deprived of his government, which was given to Lysias; no other post or pension being conferred on him, to support his dignity. He had not strength of mind enough to bear his downfall, and poisoned himself: an end he well deserved for his treason, and the share which he had taken in the cruel persecution of the Jews.

Judas Maccabeus³ in the mean time, was signalizing his valour by several considerable victories over the enemies of the people of God, who continually waged an implacable war against him. The little time that Antiochus Epiphanes survived the favourable inclinations he had expressed for the Jews, would not admit him to revoke in form his decree for obliging them to change their religion. The court of Syria, which always considered the Jews as rebels desirous of throwing off its yoke, and was greatly interested in making a nation so powerful, and so near a neighbour, submit to it, had no regard to some transient demonstrations of the dying prince's favour to them. They always persisted in the same principles of policy, and continued to look upon that nation as an enemy, whose sole view was to shake off their chains, and to support themselves in liberty of conscience with regard to religion. Such were the dispositions of Syria towards the Jews.

Demetrius,⁴ son of Seleucus Philopator, who, since the year in which A. M. 3841. his father died, had remained a hos- Ant. J. C. 163. tage at Rome, was in his twenty-third year, when he was informed of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, and the accession of his son Eupator to the crown, which he pretended to be his right, as the son of Epiphanes's eldest brother. He proposed to the senate his re-establishment upon his father's throne; and to engage them in it, he represented that, having been bred up at Rome, he should always regard it as his native country, the senators as his fathers, and their sons as his brothers. The senate had more regard for the interests of the republic than the right of Demetrius, and thought it more advantageous for the Romans that there should be a king in his minority upon the throne of Syria, than a prince like Demetrius, who might at length become formidable to them. They therefore made a decree to confirm Eupator, and sent Cn. Octavius, Sp. Lucetius, and L. Aurelius, with the character of ambassadors, into Syria, to regulate all things conformably to the treaty made with Antiochus the Great. Their design was to weaken the power of that kingdom by every possible method. The same ambassadors had instructions to accommodate, if possible, the differences between the two kings of Egypt.

Lysias,⁵ terrified by the victories of Judas Maccabeus, formed an army of 80,000 foot, and took with him all the cavalry of the kingdom, with eighty elephants: at the head of all these forces he marched into Judea, with the resolution to settle in Jerusalem, as inhabitants, foreigners that worshipped idols. He opened the campaign with the siege of Bethsura, a fortress between Idumæa and Jerusalem. Judas Maccabeus, and the whole people, besought the LORD, with tears in their eyes, to send his angel for the preservation of Israel. Full of confidence in God, they took the field. When they marched all together, with assured courage, out of Jerusalem,⁶ there appeared a horseman marching before them. He was clothed in a white habit, with armour of gold, and he held a lance in his hand. That sight filled them with new ardour. They threw themselves upon the enemy like lions, killed 12,600 men, and obliged the rest to fly, most of them wounded and without arms.

After this check, Lysias,⁷ weary of so unsuccessful a war, and, as the Scripture says, "believing the Jews invincible when supported by the aid of the Almighty God," made a treaty with Judas and the Jewish nation, which Antiochus ratified. One of the articles of peace was, that the decree of Antiochus Epiphanes, which obliged the Jews to conform to the religion of the Greeks, should be revoked and cancelled, and that they should be at liberty to live in all places according to their own laws.

This peace was of no long duration. The neighbouring people were too much the enemies of the Jews to leave them long in repose. Judas overcame them in many battles. Timotheus, one of the king's generals, assembled all his forces, and raised an army of 120,000 foot, without including the horse, which amounted to 2500. Judas, full of confidence in the God of armies, marched against him with troops very much inferior as to number. He attacked and defeated him. Timotheus lost 30,000 men in this battle, and saved himself with great difficulty. This defeat was followed by many advantages on the side of Judas, which proved that God alone is the source of valour, intrepidity, and success in war. He showed this in the most sensible manner, by the evident and singular protection which he gave to a people, of whom he was in a peculiar manner the guide and director.

A new army was raised of 100,000 foot, 20,000 horse, two-and-thirty elephants, and 300 chariots of war. The king in person, with Lysias the regent of the kingdom, put themselves at the head of it, and entered Judæa. Judas, relying upon the omnipotence of God, the creator of the universe, and having exhorted his troops to fight to the last drop of their blood, marched and posted himself in the front of the king's camp. After having given his troops for the word of battle, VICTORY IS OF GOD, he chose the bravest men of his army, and with them, in the night, attacked the king's quarters. They killed 4000 men, and retired, after having filled his whole camp with confusion and dismay.

Though the king knew from thence the extraordinary valour of the Jews, he did not doubt but they would be overpowered at length by the number of his troops and elephants. He resolved therefore to come to a general battle with them. Judas, without being intimidated by the terrible preparations for it, advanced with his army, and gave the king battle, in which the Jews killed a great number of the enemy. Eleazar, a Jew, seeing an elephant larger than the rest, covered with the king's arms, and believing the king was upon it, sacrificed himself to preserve his people, and acquire a perpetual name. He forced his way boldly to the elephant through the line of battle, killing and overthrowing all who opposed him. Then placing himself under the beast's belly, he pierced it in such a manner, that it fell and crushed him to death underneath it.

Judas, in the mean time, and his troops, fought with extraordinary resolution. But at length exhausted by fatigue, and no longer able to support the weight of the enemy, they thought fit to retire. The king followed them, and besieged the fortress of Bethsura. That place, after a long and vigorous defence, was obliged, for want of provisions, to surrender by capitulation.

From thence Antiochus marched against Jerusalem and besieged the temple. Those who defended it were reduced to the same extremities with the garrison of Bethsura, and would, like them, have been obliged to surrender, if Providence had not relieved them by an unforeseen accident. I have observed, that Philip had retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding assistance there against Lysias. But the disputes which had arisen between the two brothers, who reigned jointly, as has been said elsewhere, soon undeceived him. Finding that he had nothing to expect from that quarter, he returned into the East, assembled some troops of Medes and Persians, and taking advantage of the king's absence during his expedition against Judæa, he seized the capital of the empire. Upon that news, Lysias thought it necessary to make peace with the Jews, in order to turn his arms against his rival in Syria. Peace was accordingly concluded upon very advantageous and honourable conditions. Antiochus swore to observe it, and was admitted to enter the fortifications of the temple, with the sight of which he was so much terrified, that, contrary to his faith given, and the oath he had sworn when ratifying the peace, he caused them to be demolished before he set out for Syria. The sudden return of Antiochus drove Philip out of Antioch, and put an end to his short regency, and soon after of his life.

The troubles occasioned by the divisions between the two Ptolemies, A. M. 3842. Aut. J. C. 162. which we have just now mentioned, rose so high, that the Roman senate gave orders to the ambassadors they had sent into Syria, to proceed to Alexandria, and to use all their endeavours to reconcile them. Before they arrived there, Physcon, the youngest, surnamed Euergetes, had already expelled his brother Philometor. The latter embarked for Italy, and landed at Brundisium.

From whence he went the rest of the way to Rome, on foot, very ill dressed, and with few followers, and demanded of the senate the necessary aid for replacing him upon the throne.

As soon as Demetrius, son of Seleucus Philopator king of Syria, who was still a hostage at Rome, was apprized of the unhappy condition to which that fugitive prince was reduced, he caused royal robes and an equipage to be got ready for him, that he might appear in Rome as a king, and went to meet him with all he had ordered to be prepared for his use. He found him twenty-six miles, that is, at nine or ten leagues distance from Rome. Ptolemy expressed great gratitude to him for his goodness, and the honour he did him; but did not think proper to accept his present, nor permit him to attend him the rest of his journey. He finished it on foot, and with the same attendants and habit he had worn till then. In that manner he entered Rome, and took up his lodging with a painter of Alexandria, who had but a very small house. His design, by all these circumstances, was to express the misery to which he was reduced the better, and to move the compassion of the Romans.

When the senate were informed of his arrival, they sent to desire he would come to them; and to excuse their not having prepared a house for his reception, and that he had not been paid the honours at his entry with which it was the custom to treat princes of his rank, they assured him that it was neither for want of consideration for his person, nor out of neglect, but because his coming had surprised them, and had been kept so secret, that they were not apprized of it till after he had entered Rome. Afterwards, having desired him to quit the habit he wore, and to demand an audience of the senate, in order to explain in a full meeting the occasion of his voyage, he was conducted by some of the senators to a house suitable to his birth; and orders was given to the quaestors, or treasurers, to see him served and supplied at the expense of the public, with all things necessary, during his residence at Rome.

When they gave him audience, and he had represented his condition to the Romans, they immediately resolved to re-establish him; and deputed two of the senators, with the character of ambassadors, to go with him to Alexandria, and cause their decree to be put in execution. They reconducted him accordingly, and succeeded in negotiating an accommodation between the two brothers. Libya and the province of Cyrene, were given to Physcon; Philometor had Egypt and the isle of Cyprus; and each of them was declared independent of the other in the dominions assigned them. The treaty and agreement were confirmed with the customary oaths and sacrifices.

But oaths and sacrifices had long been with the generality of princes no more than simple ceremonies and mere forms, by which they did not think themselves bound in the least. And this way of thinking is but too common. Soon after, the youngest of the two kings, dissatisfied with the partition which had been made, went in person to complain of it to the senate. He demanded that the treaty of partition should be annulled, and that he should be restored to the possession of the isle of Cyprus. He alleged that he had been forced by the necessity of the times to comply with the former proposals, and that, even though Cyprus should be granted him, his share would still be far from equal to his brother's. Menethyllus, whom the elder Ptolemy had deputed to Rome, made it appear that Physcon held not only Libya and Cyrenaica, but his life also, from the goodness of his brother: that he had made himself so much the abhorrence of the people, by his violent proceedings, that they would have left him neither life nor government, had not his brother snatched him from their resentment, by making himself mediator: that at the time he was preserved from this danger, he thought himself too happy in reigning over the region allotted to him; and that both sides had ratified the treaty before the altar of the gods, and sworn to observe their agreement with each other. Quintus and Canuleius, who had negotiated the accommodation between the brothers, confirmed the truth of all Menethyllus advanced.

1 Porphyry, in Cr. Eus. Scalig. p. 60 and 68. Diod. in Excerpt. Valer. 322. Valer. Max. l. v. c. 1. Polyb. Legat. xlii. Epit. Liv. l. xvi.

The senate, seeing that in fact the partition was not equal, artfully took advantage of the quarrel between the two brothers, to diminish the strength of the kingdom of Egypt, by dividing it, and granted the younger what he demanded. For such was then the policy of the Romans. It is Polybius who makes this reflection. They made the quarrels and differences of princes the means of extending and strengthening their own power, and behaved in regard to them with so much address, that whilst they acted solely for their own interest, the contending parties were, however, obliged to them. As therefore the great power of Egypt gave them reason to apprehend it would become too formidable if it fell into the hands of one sovereign, who knew how to use it, they adjudged the isle of Cyprus to Physcon. Demetrius, who did not lose sight of the throne of Syria, and who, on his part, was interested that so powerful a prince as the king of Egypt should not continue in possession of the island of Cyprus, had supported the demand of Physcon with all his influence. The Romans made T. Torquatus and Co. Merula set out with the latter, to put him in possession of it.

During that prince's stay at Rome, he had often the opportunity of seeing Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, and caused proposals of marriage to be made to her. But as she was the daughter of Scipio Africanus, and the widow of Tiberius Gracchus, who had been twice consul and censor, she rejected his offers, and believed it more honourable to be one of the first ladies of Rome, than queen of Libya with Physcon.

Physcon set out from Rome with the two Roman ambassadors. Their plan was to concert an interview between the two brothers upon the frontier, and by means of a negotiation to bring them to that agreement which the senate had fixed. Philometor did not explain himself openly at first. He spun out the affair to as great a length as he could, upon different pretexts, endeavouring to gain time, and taking secret measures against his brother. At length he declared plainly, that he was resolved to stand to the first treaty, and that he would make no other.

The Cyrenians, in the mean time, A. M. 3843. informed of the ill conduct of Physcon, during the time that he was in possession of the government at Alexandria, conceived so strong an aversion for him, that they resolved to keep him out of their country by force of arms. It was not doubted but Philometor had covertly taken pains to excite these disturbances. Physcon, who had been overthrown by the rebels in a battle, having almost lost all hope, sent two deputies with the Roman ambassadors on their return to Rome, with orders to lay his complaints against his brother before the senate, and to solicit their protection. The senate, offended at Philometor's refusal to evacuate the island of Cyprus according to their decree, declared that there was no longer any amity and alliance between him and the Romans, and ordered his ambassadors to quit Rome in five days.

Physcon found means to re-establish himself in Cyrenica; but made himself so generally hated by his subjects, through his ill-conduct, that some of them fell upon him, and wounded him in several places, and left him for dead upon the spot. He imputed this to his brother Philometor; and, as soon as he was recovered of his wounds, undertook again a voyage to Rome. He there made his complaints against him to the senate, showed the scars of his wounds, and accused him of having employed the assassins from whom he received them. Though Philometor was the most humane of all princes, and the least to be suspected of so black and barbarous an action, the senate, who were angry at his refusal to submit to the regulation they had made in regard to the isle of Cyprus, gave ear to this false accusation with too much facility. They carried their prejudice so high against him, that they would not so much as hear what his ambassadors had to say in his defence. Orders were sent to them to quit Rome immediately. Besides which, the senate appointed five commissioners to conduct Physcon into Cyprus, and to put him in possession of that island, and wrote to all their allies near to aid him for that purpose with all their troops.

Physcon, by this means, with an army which seemed to him sufficient A. M. 3847 for the execution of his design, landed Ant. J. C. 157 in the island. Philometor, who had gone thither in person, defeated him and obliged him to shut himself up in Lapitho, where he was soon invested, besieged, and at length taken, and put into the hands of the brother whom he had so cruelly injured. Philometor's exceeding goodness appeared upon this occasion. After all that Physcon had done against him, it was expected that, as he now had him in his power, he would make him sensible of his indignation and revenge. He forgave him every thing; and, not contented with pardoning his faults, he even restored him Libya and Cyrenica, and added farther some amends in lieu of the isle of Cyprus. That act of generosity put an end to the war between the two brothers. It was not renewed; and the Romans were ashamed of any longer opposing a prince of such extraordinary clemency. There is no reader who does not secretly pay the homage of esteem and admiration to so generous an action. Such inward sentiments, which are founded in nature, and anticipate all reflections, imply how great and noble it is to forget and pardon injuries, and what a meanness of soul there is in the resentment of the revengeful.

SECTION III.—OCTAVIUS, AMBASSADOR OF THE ROMANS IN SYRIA, IS KILLED THERE. DEMETRIUS ESCAPES FROM ROME, AND PUTS EUPATOR TO DEATH, ASCENDS THE THRONE OF SYRIA, AND ASSUMES THE SURNAME OF SOTER. HE MAKES WAR AGAINST THE JEWS. REPEATED VICTORIES OF JUDAS MACCABEUS; DEATH OF THAT GREAT MAN. DEMETRIUS IS ACKNOWLEDGED KING BY THE ROMANS. HE ABANDONS HIMSELF TO DRUNKENNESS AND DEBAUCHERY. ALEXANDER BALA FORMS A CONSPIRACY AGAINST HIM. DEMETRIUS IS KILLED IN A BATTLE. ALEXANDER ESPOUSES THE DAUGHTER OF PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR. TEMPLE BUILT BY THE JEWS IN EGYPT. DEMETRIUS, SON OF THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, SETS UP HIS CLAIM TO THE THRONE OF SYRIA. ALEXANDER IS DESTROYED. PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR DIES AT THE SAME TIME.

We have seen that the principal object of the commission of the three A. M. 3842. Roman ambassadors, Cn. Octavius, Ant. J. C. 162. Sp. Lucretius, and L. Aurelius, who went first into Egypt, was to go into Syria, in order to regulate the affairs of that nation. When they arrived there, they found the king had more ships and elephants than had been stipulated by the treaty made with Antiochus the Great after the battle of Sipylus. They caused the ships to be burned, and the elephants to be killed, which exceeded the number stated in that treaty, and regulated all other matters in such a manner as they thought most to the advantage of the Romans. This treatment seemed insupportable, and exasperated the people against them. A person named Leptius was so incensed at it, that in his rage he fell upon Octavius whilst he was bathing, and killed him. It was suspected that Lysias, the regent of the kingdom, had secretly a hand in this assassination. Ambassadors were immediately sent to Rome to justify the king, and to protest that he had no share in the action. The senate sent them back without giving them any answer, to signify, by that silence, their indignation for the murder committed upon the person of Octavius, the examination and punishment of which they reserved to themselves. In the mean time, to do honour to his memory, they erected a statue to him amongst those of the great men who had lost their lives in defence of their country.

Demetrius believed that the displeasure of the Romans against Eupator was a favourable conjuncture, of which it was proper for him to take the advantage, and addressed himself a second time to the senate, to obtain their permission to return into Syria. He took this step contrary to the opinion of the greatest part of his friends, who advised him to make his escape, without saying any thing. The event soon showed him how much they were in the right. As the senate had still the same motives of interest for keeping him at Rome as at first, he received the same answer, and had the mortification to experience a second denial. He had then recourse to the first advice of his friends; and Ptolemy the historian, who was then at Rome, was one of those who pressed him with the utmost warmth to put it in execution with secrecy and despatch. He took his advice. After concerting all his measures, he left Rome under pretence of a hunting match, went to Ostia, and embarked with a small train in a Carthaginian vessel bound for Tyre, that waited for him. It was three days before it was known at Rome that he had stolen away. All that the senate could do, was some days after to send Tib. Gracchus, L. Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucia, into Syria, to observe what effect the return of Demetrius would produce there.

Demetrius, having landed at Tripoli in Syria, a report spread that the senate had sent him to take possession of his dominions, and had resolved to support him in them. Eupator was immediately looked upon as a lost man, and every one abandoned him to join Demetrius. Eupator and Lysias, seized by their own troops, were delivered up to the new-comer, who ordered them to be put to death. Demetrius saw himself established by this means upon the throne without opposition, and with prodigious rapidity.

One of the first actions of his reign was, to deliver the Babylonians from the tyranny of Timarchus and Heraclides, who had been the two great favourites of Antiochus Epiphanes. He had made the first governor, and the second treasurer of that province. Timarchus having added rebellion to his other crimes, Demetrius caused him to be put to death. He contented himself with banishing the other. The Babylonians were so much rejoiced to see themselves freed from the oppression of those two brothers, that upon this occasion they gave their deliverer the title of soter, or Saviour, which he bore ever afterwards.

Alcinus, whom Antiochus Eupator had made high-priest of the Jews after the death of Menelaus, not being able to procure himself to be admitted by them in that capacity, because he had profaned the sanctity of the priesthood, by following the impious customs of the Greeks under Antiochus Epiphanes; gathered together all the apostate Jews, who had taken refuge at Antioch, after having been expelled Judea, and putting himself at their head, came to petition the new king to defend them from the oppressions of Judas and his brothers, venting a thousand calumnies against them. He accused them of having killed all persons of Demetrius's party who fell into their hands, and of having forced him, with all those in his company, to abandon their country, and seek their security elsewhere. Demetrius immediately ordered Bacchides, governor of Mesopotamia, to march into Judea at the head of an army; and confirming Alcinus in his office, he joined him in commission with Bacchides, and charged them both with the care of this war. Judas rendered all the efforts of this first army ineffectual, as he did also those of a second, which was commanded by Nicanor. The latter, enraged at the last defeat of the troops of Syria, and indignant that a handful of men should make head against such numerous and warlike armies, and knowing that they placed their whole confidence of victory in the protection of the god of Israel, and in the promises made in the temple where he was honoured, had uttered a thousand blasphemies against the Almighty and against his temple. He was soon punished for them. Judas engaged him in a bloody battle, and of his army of 35,000 men not one escaped to carry the news of the defeat to Antioch. The body of Nicanor was found amongst the dead. His head and right hand, which he had lifted up against the temple, threatening to destroy it, were cut off, and placed upon one of the towers of Jerusalem.

Judas, after this complete victory, having some relaxation, sent an embassy to Rome. He saw himself continually attacked by the whole forces of Syria, without being able to rely with good reason upon any treaty of peace. He had no aid to expect from the neighbouring nations, who, far from interesting themselves for the preservation of the Jewish people, in concert with the Syrians, entertained no thoughts but of extirpating them. He had been informed that the Romans, equally esteemed for their justice and valour, were always ready to support weak nations against the oppression of kings, whose power gave them umbrage. He therefore thought of making an alliance with that people, in order to support himself by their protection against the unjust enterprises of the Syrians. Those ambassadors were very well received by the senate, who passed a decree by which the Jews were declared the friends and allies of the Romans, and a defensive league was made with them. They even obtained a letter from the senate to Demetrius, by which he was enjoined not to distress the Jews any more, and war was threatened, in case he persevered to do so. But before the ambassadors returned, Judas was dead.

As soon as Demetrius received news of the defeat and death of Nicanor, he gave the command of a powerful army to Bacchides and Alcinus, composed of the choicest of all his troops, and sent them into Judea. Judas had only 3000 men with him when it arrived there. These were struck with such a panic, that they all abandoned him, except 800 men. Judas, with that small number, through an excess of valour and confidence, had the boldness to hazard a battle against so numerous an army. He perished, overpowered by multitudes. His loss was deplored throughout all Judea and at Jerusalem, with all the marks of the keenest affliction, and the government was put into the hands of Jonathan his brother.

Alcinus being dead, after having committed great violence against the true Israelites, and Bacchides being returned to Antioch, the country remained quiet, and was not harassed by the Syrians for two years. Demetrius had most probably received the senate's letter in favour of the Jews, which obliged him to recall Bacchides.

Demetrius, indeed was at this time very cautious in his conduct with regard to the Romans, and used all his endeavours to induce them to acknowledge him king, and to renew the treaty made with the kings his predecessors. Having received advice that the Romans had three ambassadors at the court of Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, he sent Menochares, one of his principal ministers, thither to enter upon the negotiation. Finding, at his return, by the report he made of what had passed, that the good offices of those ambassadors were absolutely necessary to his success on that point, he sent again into Pamphylia, and afterwards to Rhodes, to assure them that he would conform entirely to their will; and by the force of pressing solicitations, obtained at length, by their means, what he desired. The Romans acknowledged him king of Syria, and renewed the treaties made with that crown.

To cultivate their amity, he sent the same Menochares the following year, in conjunction with some others upon an embassy to Rome. They were charged with a crown that weighed 10,000 pieces of gold, as a present from him to the senate, in gratitude for their kind treatment of him during the time that he was a hostage at Rome. They carried also with them Leptines and Isocrates, in order to deliver them up, upon account of the assassination of Octavius. This Leptines was the person who killed him at Laodicea. Isocrates was a Greek, by profession a grammarian, who being in Syria at that time, had upon all occasions taken upon him to vindicate that equally base and unjust action. The senate received the ambassadors with all the usual honours, and accepted the present they brought; but would neither hear nor see two vile men, objects unworthy of their anger; reserving to themselves, without doubt, the right of exacting, when they pleased, a more distinguished satisfaction for the murder of their ambassador.

It was nearly about this time that Demetrius, as I have observed before, established Holopernes upon the throne of Cappadocia. He was soon after expelled and took refuge at Antioch. We are going to see how far he carried his ingratitude towards his benefactor.

Demetrius, who found himself without war or occupation, began to indulge in pleasure, and to lead an idle life, not a little singular and fantastic in the manner of it. He caused a castle to be built near Antioch, flanked with four strong towers, and shut himself up in it, in order to abandon himself entirely on the one side to idleness, not being willing to hear any more mention made of public business, and, on the other, to the pleasure of good cheer and excess of wine. He was drunk at least one half of the day. The memorials, which people were desirous of presenting to him, were never received; justice was not administered; the affairs of the state languished: in a word there was a general suspension of the government, which soon stirred up the whole people against him. A conspiracy was formed for deposing him. Holopernes, who continued at Antioch, entered into this plot against his benefactor, flattering himself with obtaining the crown if the enterprise succeeded. It was discovered, and Holopernes was thrown into prison. Demetrius would not deprive him of life. He chose rather to spare him, in order to make use of him upon occasion against Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, upon whose crown he had some pretensions.

Notwithstanding the discovery, the conspiracy was not suppressed. The malecontents were secretly supported by Ptolemy Philometor, who had the affair of Cyprus at heart; and by Attalus and Ariarathes, who were anxious to revenge themselves for the war Demetrius had undertaken against them in favour of Holopernes. Those three princes in concert together employed Heraclides in preparing some body to personate the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and to set up hereditary pretensions to the crown of Syria. This Heraclides had been, as I have said already, one of the great favourites of Antiochus Epiphanes, and treasurer of the province of Babylon, while Timarchus, his brother, another favourite, was governor of it. At Demetrius's accession to the crown, the two brothers having been convicted of malversation and other crimes, Timarchus had been executed, and the other, having made his escape, had taken up his residence at Rhodes. It was there he took pains to train the man intended for the design I have mentioned. He chose for that purpose a young man named Bala, of mean extraction, but well calculated to act the part assigned him. He modelled him, and instructed him fully in all that it was necessary to say or do.

When he was fully prepared, he began by causing him to be acknowledged by the three kings who were in the secret. He afterwards carried him to Rome, as he did also Laodice, the real daughter of Antiochus Epiphanes, for the better concealing of the imposture. By force of address and solicitations, he caused him to be acknowledged there also, and obtained a decree of the senate in his favour, which not only gave him permission to return into Syria, for the recovery of his dominions, but even granted him assistance for that purpose. Though the senate plainly saw through the imposture, and that all that was told of this pretender was mere fiction, they entered into every thing that was desired of them against Demetrius, with whom they were dissatisfied, and passed that decree in favour of the impostor. With this declaration of the Romans for him, he found no difficulty in raising troops. He seized upon Ptolemæis in Palestine; and there, under the name of Alexander, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, assumed the title of the king of Syria. Many of the malecontents came thither to join him, and form his court.

This news made Demetrius quit his castle and his idleness, and apply himself to his defence. He assembled all the troops he could. Alexander armed also on his side. The assistance of Jonathan was of great consequence in this conjuncture, and both parties made their court to him. Demetrius wrote to him first, and sent him the commission of general of the king's troops in Judea, which rendered him at that time very much superior to all his enemies.

Alexander seeing what Demetrius had done for Jonathan, was thereby induced to make proposals also to him, in order to bring him over to his side. He made him high-priest, granted him the title of Friend of the king, sent him a purple robe and a crown of gold, marks of the high dignity which he conferred upon him; for none at that time wore purple except princes and nobles of the first rank. Demetrius, who received advice of this, still outbid him, to secure to himself an ally of such importance. But after the injuries he had done to all those who had had the true interest of the Jews at heart, and to the whole nation in general, they dared not confide in him, and resolved to treat rather with Alexander. Jonathan therefore accepted the high-priesthood from him; and with the consent of the whole people, at the feast of tabernacles, which happened soon after, he put on the pontifical vestments, and officiated as high-priest.

The place had been vacant seven years from the death of Alcimus. The high-priesthood, which at that time came into the Asmonean family, continued in it till Herod's time, who, from hereditary, as it had been till then, made an employment of it, which he disposed of at his pleasure.

The two kings having taken the field, Demetrius, who wanted neither valour nor good sense, when his reason was not impaired by wine, was victorious in the first battle; but it was of no advantage to him. Alexander soon received new troops from the three kings who had set him up, and continued to support him vigorously. Having, besides this, the Romans and Jonathan on his side, he retrieved his loss, and maintained his ground. The Syrians continually deserted also, because they could not bear Demetrius. That prince beginning to apprehend the event of the war, sent his two sons, Demetrius and Antiochus, to Cnidus, a city of Caria, in order to provide for their security in case of misfortune. He confided them, with a considerable sum of money, to the care of a friend whom he had in that city; in order that if any accident should happen to himself, they might remain there in safety, and wait some favourable conjuncture.

It was at that same time, and perhaps in imitation of Alexander Bala, that Andronicus played the same part in Macedonia. He had retired to Demetrius, who had given him up to the Romans, from the hope of conciliating their favour.

The two competitors for the crown of Syria having assembled all their troops, proceeded to a decisive battle. At first Demetrius's left wing broke that of the enemy whom opposed it, and put it to flight. But being too hot in the pursuit, a common fault in battles, and which almost always occasions their being lost, at their return they found the right, at the head of which Demetrius fought in person, routed, and the king himself killed in the pursuit. As long as he had been in a condition to support the enemy's charge, he had omitted nothing of which valour and conduct were capable, that might conduce to his success. At length his troops gave way, and in the retreat his horse plunged into a bog, where those who pursued him killed him with their arrows. He had reigned twelve years. Alexander by this victory found himself master of the empire of Syria.

As soon as Alexander saw himself at ease, he sent to demand Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy king of Egypt, in marriage. She was granted him: and her father conducted her in person to Ptolemais, where the nuptials were celebrated. Jonathan was invited to that feast, and went thither, where he was received by the two kings with all possible marks of honour.

Ones, son of Onias III.² having been disappointed of the high-priesthood after the death of his uncle Menelaus, had retired into Egypt. He had found means to insinuate himself so well into the favour of Ptolemy Philometor and Cleopatra his wife, that he was become their favourite and most intimate confidant. He made use of his influence at that court to obtain the king's permission for building a temple for the Jews in Egypt, like that in Jerusalem; assuring him that that favour would bring the whole nation over to his side against Antiochus Epiphanes; at the same time he obtained a grant of the high-priesthood to him and his descendants for ever. The great difficulty was, to make the Jews accede to this innovation; it being forbidden by the law to offer sacrifices in any place but the temple of Jerusalem. He overcame their repugnance, though not without difficulty, by a passage in Isaiah, wherein the prophet foretells this event in these terms: "In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of Hosts: the one shall be called the city of the sun, or Heliopolis. In that day there shall be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt; and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of Hosts in the land of Egypt: for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a saviour and a great one, and he shall deliver them. And the Lord shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the Lord in that day, and shall do sacrifice and oblation: yea, they shall vow a vow unto the Lord, and perform it."

The event here foretold by Isaiah is one of the most singular, and at the same time the most remote from all probability. Nothing was more strictly forbidden to the Jews than to offer sacrifices to God in any other place than the temple built by his order at Jerusalem; consequently, how much more, to build a temple elsewhere, especially in a land polluted with the most gross idolatry, as Egypt was, and always at enmity with the people of God! This, however, came to pass exactly as the prophet Isaiah had foretold. I shall not enter into a circumstantial exposition of this prophecy, which would carry me too far from my subject.

Alexander Bala,⁴ finding himself

A. M. 3856. in peaceable possession of the crown Ant. J. C. 143. of Syria, thought he had nothing more to do than to take all the pleasures which the abundance and power to which he had attained would admit. He abandoned himself, therefore, to his natural inclination for luxury, idleness, and debauchery. He left the care of affairs entirely to a favourite named Ammonius. That insolent and cruel minion put to death Laodice, the sister of Demetrius, and widow of Perseus king of Macedonia; Antigonus, Demetrius' son, who continued in Syria when the two others were sent to Cnidos; in fine, all the persons of the blood-royal whom he could find, in order to secure to his master, by that means, the possession of the crown which he had usurped by an imposture. That conduct soon drew upon both the abhorrence of the people.

Demetrius, the eldest of Demetrius' sons, was at Cnidos, and began to be of an age capable of forming and executing plans. When he was advised of this aversion of the people, he thought the occasion favourable for repossessing himself of his right. Lasthenes, the friend in whose house he lived, procured him some companies of Cretans, with which he landed in Cilicia. There soon joined him a sufficient number of malecontents to form an army, with which he made himself master of the whole province. Alexander opened his eyes, and quitted his seraglio to apply himself to his affairs. He left the government of Antioch to Hierax and Diodotus, who is also called Tryphon, put himself at the head of an army, formed of all the troops he could assemble: and upon receiving advice that Apollonius, governor of Coele-syria and Phoenicia, had declared for Demetrius, he sent to demand aid of Ptolemy his father-in-law.

Apollonius' first thoughts were to reduce Jonathan, who persisted in his attachment to Alexander; but he was unsuccessful, and in one day he lost above 8000 men.

Ptolemy Philometor, to whom Alexander had applied in the extreme danger in which he found himself, came at last to the assistance of his son-in-law, and entered Palestine with a great army. All the cities opened their gates to him according to the orders they had received from Alexander to that effect. Jonathan came to join him at Joppa, and followed him to Ptolemais. Upon his arrival a conspiracy was discovered, which had been formed by Ammonius, against the life of Philometor. As Alexander refused to deliver up that traitor, he concluded that he had entered into the conspiracy himself, and in consequence took his daughter from him, gave her to Demetrius, and made a treaty with him, by which he engaged to aid him in reascending the throne of his father.

The people of Antioch, who mortally hated Ammonius, believed it time to show their resentment. Having discovered him disguised like a woman, they sacrificed him to their rage. Not content with that revenge, they declared against Alexander himself and opened their gates to Ptolemy. They would even have set him upon the throne. But that prince, assuring them that he was contented with his own dominions, instead of accepting that offer, recommended to them Demetrius, the lawful heir, who accordingly was placed upon the throne of his ancestors, and acknowledged by all the inhabitants.

Alexander, who was at that time in Cilicia, marched with the utmost diligence, and put all to fire and sword around Antioch. The two armies came to a battle. Alexander was defeated, and fled with 500 horse to Zabdiel,⁵ an Arabian prince, with whom he had intrusted his children. Betrayed by the person in whom he had placed most confidence, his head was cut off and sent to Ptolemy, who expressed great joy at the sight of it. That joy was of no long duration; for he died some few days after of a wound he had received in the battle. Thus Alexander king of Syria, and Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt, died at the same time; the first after a reign of five years, and the second after one of thirty-five. Demetrius, who had attained the crown by this victory, assumed the surname of Nicator, that is to say, the Conqueror.—The succession of Egypt was attended with more difficulties.

A. M. 3859. ter the death of her husband, who Ant. J. C. 145. was at the same time her brother, endeavoured to place the crown upon the head of the son she had by him.¹ As he was yet very young, others laboured to obtain it for Physcon, king of Cyrenaica, the late king's brother, and sent to desire him to come to Alexandria. Cleopatra, thereby reduced to the necessity of taking measures for her defence, caused Onias and Dosithus, with an army of Jews, to come to her assistance. There was at that time a Roman ambassador at Alexandria, named Thermus, who by his mediation accommodated affairs. It was agreed that Physcon should marry Cleopatra, and educate her son, who should be declared heir to the crown; and that Physcon should possess it during his life. He had no sooner married the queen and taken possession of the crown, than, on the very day of the nuptials, he killed her son in her arms.

I have already observed that the surname of Physcon, given to this prince, was properly a nickname. That which he took himself was Euergetes, which signifies the benefactor. The Alexandrians changed it into that of Cacoergetes, that is to say, on the contrary, one who delights in doing harm; a surname to which he had the justest title.

In Syria affairs went on little better.² Demetrius, a young prince without experience, left every thing to Lathenes, who had procured him the Cretans, by whose aid he had ascended the throne. He was a corrupt and rash man, and behaved himself so ill, that he soon lost his master's hearts of those who were most necessary to his support.

The first wrong step which he took, was in regard to the soldiers, whom Ptolemy, upon his march, had put into the maritime places of Phœnicia and Syria, to reinforce the garrisons. If he had left those garrisons in them, they would have very much augmented his forces. Instead of conciliating them, or at least of treating them well, upon some umbrage which he conceived, he sent orders to the troops of Syria who were in the same garrisons, to cut the throats of all the Egyptian soldiers; which massacre was accordingly executed. The army of Egypt, which was still in Syria, and had placed him upon the throne, full of just horror for such barbarous cruelty, abandoned him immediately, and returned home. After which he caused the strictest search to be made for all those who had taken part against himself or his father in the last wars, and punished with death all that could be found. When he believed, after all these executions, that he had no longer any enemies to fear, he broke the greatest part of his troops, and kept only his Cretans, and some other foreigners, in his service. By that means he not only deprived himself of the veteran troops who had served under his father, and who, as being well affected to him, would have maintained him upon the throne, but he rendered them his greatest enemies, by depriving them of the sole means they had to subsist. He found this fully verified in the insurrections and revolutions which afterwards happened.

Jonathan in the mean time seeing every thing quiet in Judea, formed the design of delivering the nation at length from the evils it suffered from the citadel, which the idolatrous Greeks still held in Jerusalem. He invested it, and caused machines of war to be brought, in order to attack it in form. Demetrius,
